Fouad Hussein, a spokesman for the Kurdish regional government, said Sunday that Kurdish officials -- key participants in negotiations on the law -- conveyed their endorsement of the draft in a letter sent to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. He said Kurdish officials asked that national oil policy rely on two separate bills: one that focuses on the industry and another that sets rules for distributing oil revenue.

"The two laws must go together to the parliament," he said.

Maliki had promised that the law would be passed by the end of 2006.

U.S. officials, who have pressured Iraqi officials to enact the law, expressed support for the agreement. "Any movement toward agreement is welcome," said John C. Roberts, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. "Given the complexities of the full range of oil and gas issues, as well as the financial ramifications and the technical issues that need to be addressed as Iraq modernizes its energy sector, good progress has been made already."

Also Sunday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was flown to the Jordanian capital to undergo medical treatment, according to a statement issued by his office. His aides said he had traveled to Amman for a round of checkups after becoming sick "due to the exhausting continuous work during the past few days."

Suicide Blast Kills Dozens At University In Baghdad (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

A suicide bomber pushed past guards at a crowded college campus Sunday and set off a thunderous blast that killed at least 40 Iraqis, most of them female students waiting in line to enter classrooms for midterm exams.

The attack was the second in recent weeks to target the mainly Shiite Muslim Mustansiriya University.

Even as rescue workers mopped up blood from the college grounds, the Iraqi government insisted that the U.S.-Iraqi security plan launched nearly two weeks ago was succeeding.

But radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose followers virtually control the campus, denounced the plan as a failure and said Iraqi government troops and police should take charge of security and that "invaders," a reference to U.S. troops, should leave.

Sadr's comments suggested that he is fed up with the plan, which aims to put thousands more U.S. and Iraqi troops on Baghdad's streets. The anti-American firebrand had agreed to cooperate with Prime Minister Nouri Maliki by drawing down his militia forces, and the result may have been evident in the decreased number of Sunni victims of Shiite death squads found along Baghdad's streets in recent weeks.

No group immediately claimed responsibility for the attack, but it was similar to others on mainly Shiite targets, such as crowded markets, which have appeared designed by Sunni insurgents to inflict maximum suffering.

Mustansiriya University's main campus and its satellite colleges are sandwiched between Shiite-dominated Sadr City and a mainly Sunni area. Students say Sadr's Al Mahdi militia virtually controls the university, enforcing conservative dress codes for women and canceling classes to honor Shiite martyrs.

The militia's presence has made Mustansiriya a sectarian battleground. On Jan. 16, at least 70 students were killed when two car bombs exploded almost simultaneously on the university's main campus, about a mile and a half from the College of Business Administration and Economics, where Sunday's attack took place.

The bomber, identified as a woman, struck at an especially busy time Sunday at the college gate. Two lines, one for female students and one for male students, had formed as students waited to be checked by guards, who patted them down, looked inside their bags and confiscated cellphones and other items that could hide explosives.

As they were being allowed in for 1 p.m. midterms, other students who had sat for morning exams were filtering out or milling in the campus courtyard comparing notes.

One person resisted being searched. The guards became agitated.

Luay Sadek, a business management student who is a Shiite, heard yelling near the gate and moved closer to see what was happening. As he did, the bomb detonated, sending shrapnel and flames across the campus. Sadek saw a wall of fire and the bodies of guards and classmates flying into the air. "Those are the same people I talk to every day," said Sadek, who woke up in Imam Ali Hospital after having lost consciousness.

The words of the wounded underscored the despair and bewilderment of both Sunni and Shiite students as their attempts to do something as routine as take midterms were upended by sectarian and ideological extremism.

"The last thing I expected was that students would be attacked, especially because we are in the middle of a residential area," said Saad Abdalla, a Sunni economics student, who suffered burns and shrapnel wounds to his head. "We felt safe, especially after the application of the new security plan."

Evidence of the blast's ferocity could even be found in tree branches, where a woman's scarf fluttered in the afternoon breeze. Some victims' body parts landed in nearby shops. Sobbing survivors clung to one another and used their clothing to mop up blood in the courtyard, which was littered with shredded notebooks and shoes. At least 55 people were wounded.

"What was really painful to me is seeing the female students' bodies torn apart and thrown here and there," said Ismaeel Ubaidi, who owns a small market about 300 feet from the campus gate. Ubaidi said students had been clustered in small groups when the "indescribable detonation" shattered the calm.

Most of the victims were young women because the female students' line was far longer than the men's, said student Muaataz Jawad, explaining that it had taken longer to check the women because of their purses.

"There were bodies scattered in pools of blood near the gate," said Jawad, a Shiite accounting major who just 10 minutes before the blast had been joking with guards at the gate. After the bombing, Jawad rushed to check on them, but they had died, their bodies so mutilated he could barely recognize them.

"I saw female students weeping and wailing for the friends they lost and male students who cried harder. This is the first time I see men cry like this," he said. "I prayed to God that either he lift this ordeal or take my soul. It was really painful seeing all this chaos."

Iraqi police confirmed witness accounts that the bomber was a woman.

Despite two consecutive days of bloodshed — a bomb in a village west of Baghdad on Saturday killed at least 37 Iraqis — the Iraqi government insisted that the security plan was working, albeit gradually.

"We have got a reduction in violence. And we have got a huge, considerable reduction in the execution-style killings," Iraq's national security advisor, Mowaffak Rubaie, said on CNN. Rubaie was referring to the daily count of bullet-riddled corpses picked up in and around Baghdad, most of them victims of Shiite death squads.

Since the security plan officially began Feb. 13 with the introduction of new checkpoints and thousands more Iraqi and U.S. troops, the number of sectarian executions has averaged less than 20 a day, according to an analysis of morgue and police statistics compiled by The Times. In the weeks before the plan took effect, the average was often more than 30. Police in Baghdad said they found 15 bodies Sunday.

In the northern city of Mosul, however, police said 24 bodies had been found Sunday, a sign of the difficulties security forces are likely to face elsewhere as they concentrate on pacifying Baghdad. Two more bodies, both beheaded, were found in the northern city of Kirkuk.

Rubaie, repeating what U.S. and Iraqi officials have said since the plan was launched, said, "We should look into this plan in terms of months.

"Probably we will see a tangible success or measurable success by Easter time."

But Sadr, in a statement read by an associate, rejected any idea of the plan succeeding and said foreign forces had turned Iraq into "a core for terror."

Sadr's whereabouts remain a mystery. U.S. officials say he fled to Iran before the security plan was launched, but Sadr's associates say he is in Iraq. The cleric has not appeared in public in weeks.

The university bombing came amid a string of smaller attacks across Iraq. Mortar fire and car bombings killed at least three civilians in Baghdad, and a roadside bomb in Kirkuk killed one person.

Also Sunday, the Iraqi government announced that President Jalal Talabani had been flown to Jordan after falling ill with "malaise" as a result of overwork. A brief statement from Talabani's office said that doctors had recommended additional tests but that there was no cause for concern.

U.S. officials said the military had killed two suspected terrorists and captured a senior Al Qaeda leader on Sunday during a raid in Mosul. Five other suspected insurgents were also detained in the raid, the military said in a statement.

Fifteen other suspected insurgents were killed during a recent three-day operation in Salman Pak, a volatile area southeast of Baghdad.

BAGHDAD (AP) — A suicide bomber triggered a ball bearing-packed charge Sunday, killing at least 41 people at a mostly Shiite college whose main gate was left littered with blood-soaked student notebooks and papers amid the bodies.

Witnesses said a woman carried out the attack at the business school annex to Mustansiriyah University, but Interior Ministry officials said it was investigating the reports. The school's main campus was hit by a string of bombings last month that killed 70 people.

VIDEO: String of attacks rock Baghdad

The attack came as a powerful Shiite militia leader bitterly complained that "car bombs continue to explode" despite an ongoing security crackdown in Baghdad and suggested he was rethinking his cooperation.

The statement issued in the name of the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr put increased strains on the U.S.-Iraqi security sweeps — aimed at restoring order in the capital. The cleric said any crackdown that includes American soldiers was doomed to failure.

Al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia pulled its fighters off the streets under intense government pressure to let the 12-day-old security plan proceed. But a relentless wave of Sunni attacks — six alone in the Baghdad area Sunday — has apparently tested al-Sadr's patience as well as many ordinary Shiites.

A return to the streets by the Mahdi Army forces could effectively block the security effort and raise the chances of Baghdad falling into sectarian street battles — the apparent aim of Sunni extremists seeking any way to destroy the U.S.-backed government.

"Here we are, watching car bombs continue to explode to harvest thousands of innocent lives from our beloved people in the middle of a security plan controlled by an occupier," said a statement read by an al-Sadr aide in Baghdad.

Al-Sadr — who has not appeared in public in more than a month — is no friend of Washington and his forces fought fierce battles with U.S. troops in 2004. But he has largely cooperated in the Iraqi political process to avoid strains with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the Shiite leadership.

The statement, however, was highly critical of the U.S. role in the security plan and urged leaders to "make your own Iraqi (security) plans." He said "no security plan will work" with direct U.S. involvement.

The statement — read to hundreds of cheering supporters — was the first public word from the al-Sadr since U.S. assertions earlier this month that he fled to neighboring Iran to avoid arrest. Al-Sadr's aides and other loyalists insist he never left Iraq.

The political situation in Iraq was further thrown into question after President Jalal Talabani, a 73-year-old Kurd, was taken to Jordan for medical tests after feeling ill, his office said. It added there was "no cause for worry," but gave no other details.

Shiite anger at the United States is running high since American soldiers on Friday detained the son of the most powerful Shiite political leader for nearly 12 hours after he crossed from Iran. U.S. officials claim Shiite groups, including the Mahdi Army, receive weapons and aid from Iran. Iran denies the charges.

"To my Shiite and Sunni brothers, I say, 'Let us scorn sectarianism and hoist the banner of unity,'" said the statement from al-Sadr, whose militia is blamed for frequent execution-style slayings of Sunni rivals.

Since the security crackdown began, the number of bodies thought to be victims of Shiite death squads has gone down dramatically in Baghdad, but there has been no respite from violence blamed on Sunni insurgents.

Besides the college blast, at least 18 people were killed — mostly in Shiite districts — in bombings and rocket attacks in the Baghdad area.

Security guards at the Mustansiriyah University annex scuffled with the bomber before the blast, witnesses said. Most of the victims were students, including at least 46 injured, said police

If the bomber is found to be woman it would unusual — but not unprecedented — in Iraq's chaos. The main campus at Mustansiriyah, about 1½ miles away, was the target of twin car bombs and a suicide blast last month that killed 70 people.

The students at the business college were returning to midterm exams after the Iraqi weekend.

A 22-year-old student, Muhanad Nasir, said he saw a commotion at the gate. "Then there was an explosion. I did not feel anything for 15 minutes and when I returned to consciousness, I found myself in the hospital," said Nasir, wounded in the head and chest.

The blast flung blood-soaked notebooks and backpacks among the lifeless bodies and wounded. Cement walls were pockmarked by the hail of ball bearings. Parents rushed to the site and some collapsed in tears after learning their children were killed or injured. Students used rags and towels to try to mop up the blood.

The school is located in a mostly Shiite district of northeast Baghdad, but does not limit enrollment to that group.

In the northern city of Mosul, U.S. troops killed two gunmen in a raid and captured a suspected local leader of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq, the military said. Additional details were no immediately available.

Iraq's Interior Ministry, meanwhile, raised the toll from a suicide truck bombing in the violence-wracked Anbar province on Saturday to 52 dead and 74 injured.

The attack on worshippers leaving a mosque in Habbaniyah, about 50 miles west of Baghdad, was believed linked to escalating internal Sunni battles between insurgents and those who oppose them.

"This cowardly act of violence underscores that the terrorists are the enemies of all Iraqis, regardless of sect," the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said in a statement. "They want Iraq to fail. Now is the time for the Iraqis to come together against these terrorists."

Al-Sadr Calls Crackdown A Failure After College Bombing (AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A suicide attacker struck outside a college campus, killing at least 41 persons and prompting the leader of Iraq's biggest Shi'ite militia to complain that a U.S.-led security crackdown has failed to protect Iraqis.

Many Shi'ites think bombings have continued because the Shi'ite-led government bowed to American pressure and persuaded the radical cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr to take his Mahdi's Army fighters off the streets.

Sheik al-Sadr's statement, read to his followers in Sadr City, is likely to add pressure on U.S. and Iraqi forces to show results in the nearly two-week-old crackdown.

"I'm certain, just like all oppressed Iraqis are certain, that no security plan will work, and no good will come of any occupier," Sheik al-Sadr said in the statement.

"Here we are, watching booby-trapped cars exploding to harvest thousands of innocent lives from our beloved people in the middle of a security plan that is controlled by an occupier who does as he pleases."

U.S. and Iraqi leaders have urged the public to be patient, warning that it will take months before the security operation shows results. President Bush has ordered 21,500 more U.S. troops to Baghdad and surrounding areas, although the last units are not due until May.

Sheik al-Sadr urged Iraq's mostly Shi'ite security forces to "make your own Iraqi plans independent of the Americans."

Most of the victims of yesterday's bombing were students at the college, a business-studies annex of Mustansiriyah University that was hit by a series of deadly explosions last month. At least 46 persons were injured in yesterday's blast.

The attacker detonated a bomb-rigged suicide belt near the main entrance to the college, where students were resuming midterm exams after the two-day weekend in Iraq. Police said that guards confronted the bomber as he tried to enter the college grounds.

A 22-year-old student, Muhanad Nasir, said he saw a commotion at the gate. "Then there was an explosion. I did not feel anything for 15 minutes and when I returned to consciousness, I found myself in the hospital," said Mr. Nasir, who was wounded in his head and chest.

The blast left cement walls pockmarked by shrapnel and twisted parts of the metal gate and turnstile. Parents rushed to the site and some collapsed in tears after learning their children were killed or injured. Students used rags and towels to try to mop up the blood.

The school is in a mostly Shi'ite district of northeast Baghdad, but it does not limit its enrollment to that group. The main campus of Mustansiriyah University, about 1? miles away, was the target of twin car bombs and a suicide blast last month that killed 70 persons.

Earlier, two Katyusha rockets hit a Shi'ite enclave in southern Baghdad, killing at least 10, and a bomb near the fortified Green Zone claimed two lives, police said.

The Green Zone houses the U.S. and British embassies and key Iraqi government offices. The blast was about 100 yards from the Iranian Embassy, but authorities did not think it was targeting the compound.

A separate car bombing in a Shi'ite district in central Baghdad killed at least one person and injured four, police said.

In the northern city of Mosul, U.S. troops killed two gunmen in a raid and captured a suspected local leader of the insurgent group al Qaeda in Iraq, the military said. Additional details were not immediately available.

Iraq's Interior Ministry, meanwhile, raised the toll from a suicide truck bombing in the violence-wracked Anbar province on Saturday to 52 dead and 74 injured.

The attack on worshippers leaving a mosque in Habbaniyah, about 50 miles west of Baghdad, was thought to be linked to escalating internal Sunni battles between insurgents and those who oppose them.

U.S. military envoys and pro-government leaders have worked hard to sway clan chiefs and other influential Anbar figures to turn against the militants, who include foreigners fighting under the banner of al Qaeda in Iraq. The extremists have fought back with targeted killings and bombings against fellow Sunnis.

Al-Sadr Won't Back Security Operation, Statement Says (USAT)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD — According to a statement attributed to Muqtada al-Sadr, the radical Iraqi Shiite cleric has withdrawn support for a security crackdown in Baghdad.

The statement came Sunday, hours after a suicide bomber wearing a vest packed with explosives killed 41 at a college.

The security operation will not work because U.S. forces are involved, according to the statement, which was read by Shiite cleric Abdulzahra al-Suweidi.

"There is no benefit in this security plan because it is controlled by the occupiers," al-Suweidi read in front of throngs of chanting supporters in al-Sadr's stronghold of Sadr City. The United States "is watching car bombs explode, taking the souls of thousands of innocent Iraqi people."

Al-Sadr has not been seen in public for more than a month. The cleric led his Mahdi Army militia in two uprisings against U.S. forces in 2004. His militia has avoided confrontation with U.S. forces this time. There was no indication in the statement that this position would change.

Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki expressed optimism Saturday about the U.S.-backed offensive, which is an attempt to stave off a full-out civil war in Iraq.

At least 41 people were killed when a suicide bomber triggered a ball-bearing-packed charge at the Baghdad Economy and Administration College. At least 46 were wounded. Most of the victims were students.

A string of car bombings and rockets also hit Baghdad on Sunday as U.S. and Iraqi security forces stepped up efforts to stamp out Sunni-Shiite sectarian bloodshed.

In other news:

·Iraqi national security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie told CNN that Iranians had stopped training and providing weapons to Iraqi Shiite militants to give the security plan a chance to work.

"They have changed their position and stopped a lot of their tactics and interference in Iraq's internal affairs," al-Rubaie said Sunday. It was unclear whether he was referring to Iran's government or other Iranians.

·Iraqi President Jalal Talabani arrived in Jordan late Sunday for a medical checkup after he became ill and was rushed unconscious to a hospital, Iraqi Ambassador Saad al-Hayyani said.

Talabani's son Qubad said his father suffered from exhaustion.

"He did not have a heart attack" or a stroke, he told CNN. Qubad Talabani said his father "made his own way off the plane" when he landed in Jordan.

·Thousands of Shiites protested Saturday in Baghdad after U.S. soldiers on Friday detained Amar al-Hakim, the son of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, a Shiite political leader. The son was taken into custody after he crossed from Iran.

·A suicide truck bombing in Anbar province killed 52 and injured 74 Saturday. The attack targeted worshipers leaving a Sunni mosque in Habaniyah, about 50 miles west of Baghdad.

"Now is the time for the Iraqis to come together against these terrorists," the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said in a statement.

The president's son said he was "up and about" and able to communicate.

Iraqi PM Blames Al-Qaeda For Sunni Mosque Attack (AFP)

AFP, February 26, 2007

Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Sunday blamed Al-Qaeda for a deadly bomb attack on a Sunni mosque, saying the blast proved that "terrorists" will attack anyone, regardless of their sect.

A suicide tanker bomb exploded outside a mosque in the western town of Habbaniyah on Saturday as worshippers were leaving, killing at least 40 people and wounding more than 60, a local medical official said.

"Al-Qaeda committed a new terrible massacre resulting in the deaths of dozens of civilians as they finished prayers at a mosque in Habbaniyah," Maliki said in a statement released by his office.

"They don't value holy prayer nor worshippers nor even a mosque," he added.

Habbaniyah is a small town in the so-called "Sunni triangle", lying 80 kilometres (50 miles) due west of Baghdad, where tribal chiefs have vowed to fight Al-Qaeda, a Sunni-led militant group.

Suicide bomb attacks on civilian targets have become a hallmark of Sunni extremist assaults on Iraq's Shiite majority, and it is relatively unusual for such a strike to target Sunni worshippers.

Maliki was at pains to stress that the attack should not be seen as sectarian in nature.

"(Al-Qaeda) is targetting all Iraqis without exception," he said. "They are using a cover of sectarianism to assassinate the people... and to increase sectarian strife in society."

"We strongly condemn this terrible crime which shows how low (Al-Qaeda) can sink," he said, urging people of Anbar province to back "the national effort by our security forces who are chasing the terrorists criminals."

New Iraqi Troops Fly Into Baghdad (AP)

By Kim Gamel,

AP, February 26, 2007

About 130 fresh Iraqi troops from the country's Kurdish north flew into Baghdad on Sunday to join the fight for the nation's capital — with the promise of a $200 bonus, nearly a month's pay.

The mostly Kurdish soldiers — the first to arrive from the northern city of Irbil — were greeted by Iraqi commanders as they filed off the gray C-130 troop transport. They wore camouflage, with machine guns or rocket-propelled grenade launchers slung over their shoulders. Many carried belongings in plastic bags.

The troops represented a fraction of the expected influx of some 8,000 Iraqi reinforcements from the north, the Shiite south and the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province west of Baghdad.

The drafting of troops from the north — most former Kurdish guerrillas who fought for decades against Saddam Hussein's regime — to participate in the security crackdown in the capital has raised concerns as many speak no Arabic and are unfamiliar with the territory and urban warfare.

Many Kurds also refused to leave their autonomous region to fight in far-off Baghdad.

But Lt. Gen. Ali Ghadan, Iraq's ground forces commander, said the Kurds and other troops coming from outside Baghdad had a powerful incentive. Each would receive a $200 bonus in addition to their regular salaries and would only be deployed for three months, then allowed to go home.

The minimum salary for Iraqi soldiers is nearly $300 per month, although some get food allowances, according to the Defense Ministry.

Ghadan said the troops would get another bonus of the same amount if they signed on for another tour after their first deployment.

The bonuses underscore the eagerness of the Iraqi government to show it can rally sufficient forces to allow it to take the lead in the security sweep aimed at clearing the capital of Sunni insurgents and local Shiite militias who have killed thousands in rising violence between the two Islamic sects.

The inability of the Shiite-led government to deliver the promised number of Iraqi forces has been partly blamed for the failure of two previous security operations in Baghdad. President Bush has promised to send 21,500 more American troops to Iraq for the current effort.

Gen. Babaker Shawkat Zebari, the army chief of staff, stressed unity in the armed forces, addressing concerns the Kurdish troops might resent being called to Baghdad because they feel more loyalty to their homeland.

"Baghdad is a beautiful city that desperately needs your help," Zebari, himself a Kurd, said in Arabic after welcoming the troops in Kurdish. "If the terrorists are defeated here, all of Iraq will get back on its feet."

A brigade from Sulaimaniyah, also in the Kurdish north, has reached Baghdad, but it is only 1,000-men strong, not the expected 3,000.

Capt. Amir Wali, a 29-year-old former Kurdish guerrilla who has been integrated into the army, agreed. "I was glad to come here," he told reporters after the ceremony. "We came to defend Baghdad against terrorists."

The Iraqi troops were the first to be brought to the capital in an aircraft piloted by Iraqis, the military said, touting it as a sign the Iraqis are making strides toward taking over their own security.

"Instead of depending on the friendly forces to move such units, now the transportation is done by Iraqi planes. This is a historic event," Ghadan said.

Afghanistan: Taliban Preps For Bloody Assault (NSWK)

By Sami Yousafzai And Ron Moreau

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

There's no mistaking the thrill in Ghul Agha Akhund's voice. The Taliban field commander, speaking by mobile phone from his redoubt in Afghanistan's Helmand province, says the militants' covert network of couriers has brought him a vital message. It's a dark photocopy of a handwritten note, just seven lines to congratulate the group's fighting forces on "getting even with the infidel invaders" last year and to urge them to launch "a more intensive jihad" this year. But Ghul Agha views the scrap of paper as an almost sacred artifact: it bears the signature of the Taliban's Supreme Leader, Mullah Mohammed Omar. "This message from our leader is like tonic medicine," the chieftain says. "It makes us stronger."

In fact, he's doubly excited. This is the second communication he's gotten from Mullah Omar this year—after not one word since the U.S.-led 2001 invasion. (Although not all the information in this report can be independently verified, it came from sources who have proved reliable in the past, and the details are consistent with the established facts.) This January, Ghul Agha received an audiocassette of Mullah Omar praising the virtue of self-sacrifice. "Carry out your Islamic responsibilities as I carry out mine," the officer quotes the tape as saying. "Don't look for promotions or benefits. Just serve the jihad." The message electrified Ghul Agha. "For the last few years, we heard only rumors about Mullah Omar," he says. "Now we hear from him directly!" The commander and his men are energetically preparing to launch an offensive as soon as the snow melts; he hopes this year they will cut off the provincial capital.

Mullah Omar has emerged from the shadows, his field officers say, and with his inspiration they're planning a military push against U.S.-led forces like never before. NEWSWEEK has viewed a new recruiting video in which the Taliban's most notoriously cruel commander, the one-legged Mullah Dadullah Akhund, addresses an audience of some 400 men who are described as trained suicide bombers, ready to die on his order. "Our suicide bombers are countless," he says in a videotaped response to questions from NEWSWEEK. "Hundreds have already registered their names, and hundreds more are on the waiting list." Those claims, while impossible to verify, can't be discounted, either. In an interview that aired on Al-Jazeera last week, Dadullah claimed to have more than 6,000 armed guerrillas in underground hideouts and other staging areas, awaiting the moment to strike. "The attack is imminent," he told the Arabic TV channel.

Western forces are certainly bracing for one. Thousands of reinforcements have deployed to Afghanistan, bringing the Coalition's total armed strength to nearly 50,000, including 15,500 Americans in NATO's ranks and 11,000 others under direct U.S. command. NATO's chief spokes-man in Kabul, Col. Tom Collins, says his force intends to head off the militants' assault with pre-emptive attacks against Taliban strongholds and sanctuaries in Helmand and Uruzgan provinces. The Coalition, with its enormous superiority in firepower, sees no way the Taliban can capture and hold any significant target. "They may hold a small place for days," Collins allows, "but they'll get run out at a high cost." An estimated 3,000 Taliban fighters died in last year's engagements alone. But replacing those losses has been easy—thanks largely to the 47-year-old Mullah Omar.

To Westerners his appeal all but defies explanation. He was always an unprepossessing figure, even during the late 1990s, when he and his followers ruled most of Afghanistan. He seldom gave speeches on the radio, let alone in public, and he traveled out of his home province, Kandahar, to visit Kabul only once. Those who have met him describe him as a seemingly humble—though intelligent—village preacher, shy, inarticulate and utterly lacking in charisma. His manner is awkward, even childlike at times. In the 1980s he enlisted in the fight against the Soviet occupation, which cost him his right eye in a 1989 rocket attack and kept him from completing his religious education. As a result he has always called himself a talib, a "seeker of knowledge"—and his followers became known as the Taliban.

The group's recruiters owe much of their continued success to his saintly reputation. To his followers, Omar stands in bold contrast to the corrupt thugs who have returned to control many parts of Afghanistan and to the foreign-influenced Kabul government. In 1994 Mullah Omar rose to prominence by organizing the Taliban as a vigilante force to fight warlords who had been kidnapping, raping and strong-arming the civilians of Kandahar ever since the Soviets left. While local leaders are nowhere near as rapacious as they once were, villagers complain of some of the same sleazy behavior—crime, corruption, immorality. Omar, by contrast, "looks at things in black and white. There is no middle ground for him," says Rahimullah Yusufzai, a Peshawar-based journalist and expert on the Taliban. "No one has ever found fault with his Islamic character," says Nek Mohammed, one of Omar's former aides.

The Supreme Leader probably never knew what his guest Osama bin Laden was planning in 2001. All the same, Omar rejected America's demand after September 11 that he hand over the Qaeda leader—even though that refusal led directly to the U.S. invasion. "That principled decision enhanced his position among his followers," says Yusufzai. "But to others it shows he's simply stupid and too rigid."

After the Taliban's fall, Omar effectively vanished. His whereabouts were a mystery to everyone including his three wives and nine children, who heard nothing from him even indirectly for a solid year, according to Zabibullah, a senior Taliban official. (Last year one of the wives finally rejoined Omar at his present hideout, Zabibullah says.) Still, Omar did not quit the jihad. As his men regrouped, he gradually emerged from hiding and in 2004 began traveling from camp to camp in remote Taliban-held areas, riding on the back of a motorbike to rally his old troops and recruit new ones. One of the reasons he was able to avoid capture was that few people aside from his close followers know his face. He has always refused to let anyone take his picture, citing Islamic strictures against creating idols. Photos identified as Mullah Omar have circulated in recent years, but the clearest shots proved to be hoaxes or cases of mistaken identity.

Only a few trusted assistants know where the fugitive leader is now. U.S. officials refuse to discuss what they know of his whereabouts and actions, beyond admitting that he's still in charge. "The hard-core Taliban leadership is Mullah Omar and his 27 to 30 subcommanders," says Collins. Afghan President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly charged that Omar is holed up in the Pakistan city of Quetta, protected by Pakistan's military spy agency, Inter-Services Intelligence. That claim was backed up (probably under duress) by Mohammad Hanafi, a reputed Taliban spokesman, after his capture by Afghan forces last month.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf denies the allegation, calling Karzai "ignorant" of what's happening inside Afghanistan. Taliban commanders and political operatives, who admit to frequently visiting Pakistan themselves, agree with Musharraf. "Baseless lies," Dadullah told NEWSWEEK. "He is not there [in Pakistan] in any city." Dadullah and others say they believe he's safely ensconced deep in the remote and rugged mountains of Uruzgan province, where he once lived.

Wherever he's hidden, Omar is closer than ever to many of his followers—not only to long-neglected fighters like Ghul Agha, but even to members of the Taliban's ruling council, the Shura. In the past, according to Mullah Rahman, the group's deputy commander in Zabul province, it could take six weeks for senior Taliban officials to send a message to the leader and get a reply. Now, thanks to the Taliban's military gains and growing network of messengers and mobile phones, the Shura can send Omar a question and get his answer within 24 hours. The leader communicates only via two top aides: former Defense minister Mullah Obaidullah and Mullah Barader, an old friend and one of the first mullahs to join the fledgling Taliban in 1994. Even those two do not see him face to face, instead passing messages by word of mouth, audiotape or handwritten notes. They relay Omar's directives and pep talks to the appropriate Shura members, who in turn disseminate them through the chain of command.

The Supreme Leader tends to focus on moral questions, leaving most military and financial matters to his deputies. His recent communiqués assert that Afghans have a duty under Islam to fight the foreign "invaders" and their "puppets" in Kabul because they will not leave Afghanistan "peacefully." At the same time, he urges his fighters to spare the lives of Afghans who have no part in the conflict. Last year's epidemic of suicide bombings killed more than two dozen foreign troops, but also killed and maimed hundreds of Afghan civilians. "Avoid operations that cause death and injury to innocent people," Omar said in a message marking the end of Ramadan this past December. "We are obliged to target only our enemy."

His word is law—or so his followers say. "No one can or dares to challenge Mullah Omar," says Zabibullah. Last year, for example, he dismissed his Ghazni province commander for "selfishness." And yet not every order is followed. Suicide bombings have continued to rock Kandahar. Dadullah says such attacks are no more than a prelude to bigger things soon to come. "With new war tactics, we possibly will get control of a provincial capital," he told NEWSWEEK. Commander Momin Ahmed, a heavy-set Taliban subcommander in Ghazni province, says provincial commanders have been promised detachments of 30 suicide bombers apiece from the batches of new recruits.

Most Coalition officers shrug at such threats. The militants suffered horrendous casualties last year while failing to stop the spread of NATO control into southern Afghanistan. In a single battle last September for the village of Panjwayi in Kandahar, the Taliban lost more than 500 men. At the same time, Afghan civilians are heartily fed up with all parties. They despise the Karzai government's weakness and corruption; they blame the Coalition for the collateral damage caused by its massive firepower; they don't want Mullah Omar's lightning-rod fighting forces anywhere near their homes. The guerrillas have little to no chance of ever regaining power though force of arms. What they do have in abundance is stubbornness—just like their leader, Mullah Omar. "We respect him even more than we did five years ago," says Ghul Agha. "He refuses to give up, no matter what the odds." That's not the message most Afghan civilians want to hear.

Iraq President Falls Ill, Flies To Amman (AP)

By Shafika Mattar

AP, February 26, 2007

AMMAN, Jordan (AP) - Iraqi President Jalal Talabani fell ill Sunday and was rushed unconscious to a hospital before being flown to neighboring Jordan for an immediate medical checkup, medical and government officials said.

A brief statement issued by Talabani's office said the 73-year-old president had fallen ill because of "continuing hard work over the past few days," but added there was "no cause for worry."

Iraq's ambassador to Jordan, Saad al-Hayyani, said Talabani had not suffered a stroke or a heart attack. He said he suffered from "general fatigue and exhaustion and he needs medical examination to determine what is causing that."

A doctor at Amman's King Hussein Medical City said Talabani would be admitted to the heart center at the facility. Several Arab leaders have been treated at the military hospital in the past, including the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

He said Talabani would be checked into the heart center because the facility has sophisticated and modern equipment to check the president's condition, not because he necessarily suffers from a heart ailment.

"It appears that his medical condition is not worrisome" because he is not being flown in by a helicopter or transported in an ambulance, the doctor said on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak to the media. "He is being driven by a car from Amman airport to the hospital, escorted by his private physician."

A doctor in Sulaimaniyah, Talabani's hometown, told The Associated Press that the president was unconscious when an ambulance rushed him to a hospital there earlier Sunday.

"After his condition stabilized, the doctors advised him to go to Jordan for a complete check up," the doctor said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

Talabani, a Kurd, appeared in public Saturday in Sulaimaniyah where he met with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Massoud Barzani, leader of the self-ruled Kurdish region in northern Iraq.

Senior Kurdish politician Barham Saleh said Talabani was on his feet when he headed for a meeting Sunday with top aides shortly before he left for Jordan. Saleh, a deputy prime minister, said members of Talabani's immediate family accompanied him to Amman.

An official at Talabani's Patriotic Union of Kurdistan party said the president has a long history of fainting when he is exhausted - a condition dating back to his years as a Kurdish guerrilla leader fighting Saddam Hussein's regime decades ago.

The official also spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject.

Baghdad Plan Has Elusive Targets (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The engineer stood aside as Iraqi and American soldiers rifled through his daughter's wardrobe and peered under her bed. He did not mind when they confiscated the second clip for his AK-47, because he knew it could be easily replaced. He demurred when asked about insurgent activity in the neighborhood, afraid to be stamped an informant and driven from his home of 14 years. Face to face with the Baghdad security plan, it seemed to him a bit absurd.

"Obviously, the soldiers lack the necessary information about where to look and who to look for," said the government engineer, who declined to give his name in an interview during a sweep through his western Baghdad neighborhood last Monday. "There are too many houses and too many hide-outs."

American military commanders in Iraq describe the security plan they began implementing in mid-February as a rising tide: a gradual influx of thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops whose extended presence in the city's violent neighborhoods will drown the militants' ability to stage bombings and sectarian killings. The first brigade of 2,700 American reinforcements is patrolling the capital, bringing the total U.S. troop presence in Baghdad to 40,000, and members of three additional Iraqi military brigades have entered the city, though not at full strength. Soldiers have opened 14 of the estimated 30 joint policing stations they will operate in the capital.

But U.S. troops, Iraqi soldiers and officials, and Baghdad residents say the plan is hampered because security forces cannot identify, let alone apprehend, the elusive perpetrators of the violence. Shiite militiamen in the capital say they are keeping a low profile to wait out the security plan. U.S. commanders have noted increased insurgent violence in the Sunni-dominated belt around Baghdad and are concerned that fighters are shifting their focus outside the city.

Military patrols frequently push into neighborhoods where they have been shot at or struck with improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, only to find no one to arrest.

"I don't know who I'm fighting most of the time," said Staff Sgt. Joseph Lopez, 39, a soldier based in the northern outskirts of the capital. "I don't know who is setting what IED."

Many people in Baghdad express deep reservations about the Iraqi security forces' ability and desire to battle their fellow citizens. U.S. soldiers say their Iraqi counterparts are swayed more by the anti-American speeches of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr than by the public appeals of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for even-handed enforcement.

On the streets of the capital, it is impossible to miss the increased military presence. Iraqi police pickups speed down the avenues, sirens wailing, as masked officers fire machine guns to clear their path. Iraqi army soldiers and policemen stand sentry at checkpoint after checkpoint, but more often than not allow cars to pass through without inspection.

"They're just standing and waving at the cars," said Sgt. Haider Hasim, 20, a member of the Iraqi National Guard's 1st Brigade, 2nd Regiment of the 6th Division, who patrols the western Baghdad neighborhood of Amiriyah. "They won't take weapons from their friends."

Commandos and policemen from the predominantly Shiite Interior Ministry have little desire to raid or arrest members of their own sect or residents from their home neighborhoods, said Hasim, whose father is Sunni and mother is Shiite. From what he has seen, the Iraqi soldiers brought in for the security plan are accomplishing little.

"They're doing nothing, they're just sleeping at the camps," he said. "We do not go out if the Americans are not with us."

For the Americans, the security plan depends heavily on pushing along the Iraqi security forces. The so-called joint security stations envisioned under the plan are intended not only to generate intelligence about insurgents and militias but also to bring together Iraqi military and police personnel, who often fail to communicate, as well as U.S. troops. The stations will be scattered throughout the city's 10 newly designated security districts. The plan originally divided the city into nine sectors, but one was split in two.

Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman, said that although part of the stations' function is to encourage Iraqis to visit, their locations would not be disclosed because of concern within the Iraqi government that such information would facilitate attacks.

Under the security plan, the Iraqi government has granted itself broad powers to impose martial law. Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, the Iraqi commander of the effort, said in a speech last week that the government could hold and search individuals "whenever deemed fit." The government can disperse any public gatherings, inspect any public or private property, and "search, control, and seize all parcel post, mail, telegraphs, communication devices as needed," Gambar said.

To prevent car bomb attacks in Baghdad, the U.S. military has adopted a "city manager" approach, looking at "where all the different marketplaces were, the ingress-egress routes, the side roads, the traffic pattern flows," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell told reporters in a briefing last week. But he also acknowledged that as security forces focus on threats from vehicles, insurgents have been shifting tactics, increasingly deploying suicide bombers wearing explosive vests.

Some of the 21,500 additional troops President Bush is sending to Iraq have arrived. Top U.S. commanders are considering sending at least one of the five new brigades to the outskirts of the city and another to Diyala province, which this month has become increasingly deadly for U.S. soldiers.

"This is the very start, and it's too early to make any determinations at all on whether it's working, not working, what effect it's had," said a senior U.S. defense official in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity. "We just don't have all the forces on the ground yet. People are looking for this big D-Day event and it's not going to happen."

Two days after the plan's official start on Feb. 14, Maliki, the prime minister, hailed its "fabulous success." Two days later, a double car bomb attack along a commercial strip in New Baghdad killed more than 60 people. A week after the plan's launch, a truck bomb rigged with tanks of chlorine gas blew up in southern Baghdad, killing seven people. It was among at least three attacks that involved chlorine gas in the past month. U.S. officials warned that it was a new insurgent tactic designed to sow panic and incite further sectarian violence.

At the end of the first week of the security crackdown, Caldwell announced, without providing statistics, a "very significant" decrease in such sectarian violence, while cautioning that it was premature to judge the plan's success.

Death tolls in February provided by an official at the Baghdad morgue, who is not authorized to speak publicly, appear to support Caldwell's statement. The official said that from Feb. 1 to Feb. 13, the bodies of 806 people who died as a result of violence were brought to the morgue, including 211 unidentified bodies, many of them bound, shot and showing signs of torture. Over the next nine days, 244 bodies were brought in, among them 58 unidentified corpses.

But there is still a bunker mentality among residents of the capital, who are afraid to venture out for any but the most necessary errands. The owner of a deserted fabric shop in Baghdad's Zayuna neighborhood, Manaf Ali, said his children continue to attend school only once a week because he is afraid for their lives. A goldsmith working next door at al-Faiq shopping center, Haider Mohammed, 31, sleeps on the floor of an unfurnished apartment close to his shop rather than travel to work from his embattled Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiyah. Both men carry guns.

"How can we notice any change in the streets? We are just like chickens, staying in our cages," Mohammed said. "I am a goldsmith. What am I doing carrying a gun?"

To Ali, 41, there are only small signs of increased order. He welcomes the presence of more soldiers on the streets, and sees fewer Shiite militiamen. "Thank God now the mass abductions and the militias seem to be slowing down, and we are only left with the suicide bombs and car bombs," he said.

Along Palestine Street, a once vibrant commercial district, shop owners were relieved not by the greater military presence, but by the absence of Mahdi Army militiamen from neighboring Sadr City, the impoverished Shiite district and militia stronghold. The owner of a photography studio, a Sunni, pulled from his wallet a receipt for the "tax" that militiamen extract from merchants for their protection. Another merchant said he, too, faced extortion, which costs the equivalent of $30 a month. This month, the "savages" have not been around to collect, said the studio owner, who would not allow his name to be published.

"There needs to be raids against the militias, and not only in Sadr City," said Ahmed Abdul Rahman, 29, who works in an art gallery on Palestine Street. "Until then, this is not real."

Backstory: US Marines 'Invade' The Pop Tucci Diner (CSM)

By Bill Sasser

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

After a frigid night camped under pine trees at an airfield, the convoy of 20 US Marines rolled into this sleepy town just as businesses were opening. The rumble of their Humvees unnerved some local residents. Even more jarring was the sight of the soldiers leaping from their vehicles with weapons.

In the parking lot of the Zion Lodge, a marine scanned the quiet street from behind a .50-caliber machine gun. One elderly man seemed shaken at the sight of marines striding into the Realo drugstore.

Yet this was no hostile invasion. As final preparation for a one-year deployment in Iraq, a US Marine unit recently brought the war home to tiny Trenton, N.C. (pop. 240), and the nearby coastal towns of Pollocksville and Maysville with a three-day training exercise. It was camouflage meets denim, Kevlar helmets meet Tar Heel caps, war-gaming meets the Pop Tucci diner.

It was also significant. The 5th Battalion, 10th Marine Regiment is unusual – the first active-duty unit in the Marine Corps to retrain for civil affairs work in Iraq. That means the 250 soldiers in the group will be departing from their frontline combat role to help Iraqis rebuild their cities and neighborhoods.

The 5/10's six-month retraining has included study of Arabic and the Iraqi culture. The unit will be important in determining whether the US's latest – and perhaps final – initiative in Iraq works. Under the new command of Gen. David Petraeus, US forces in Iraq will be trying to secure, hold, and then help stabilize and reconstruct embattled neighborhoods. Units like the 5/10 will be instrumental in gaining the confidence of local residents and acting as intermediaries between combat troops and civilians, particularly as the US tries to shift more security and reconstruction functions to the Iraqis.

"Our mission is to bridge the gap between a local population and the local military command, to say, 'Hey, sir, if you want to blow up that water tower, you can do it, but you're going to leave X amount of people without water," said Capt. Jim Burgess, who is leading a team of 10 marines and a Navy corpsman in the exercise here. "There are some civil issues you need to take into consideration."

The transition isn't easy for marines, who are trained to kill the enemy rather than engage in the softer skills of negotiation – say, quizzing local residents about their sewer system. "Some of these marines would rather be out on an artillery range pulling a lanyard, so it's important to get them out of their comfort zones preparing for this mission," said Maj. Andrew Dietz, who commanded one of the three training detachments.

While the soldiers were learning new skills, local residents were discovering a few things about Marine training and the rigors of war. The troops were generally greeted as heroes after the initial shock of seeing marines standing guard by doorways and patrolling downtown sidewalks with their M-16s, which weren't loaded.

"We're talking to town leaders to find out what they do and engaging in foot patrols to get to know the locals," said Captain Burgess. "Some are looking at us like, 'Hey, what are you guys doing here?' "

Later that morning, Glen Spivey sat down with a second civil affairs team at Pop Tucci's restaurant. "You get such a mix of emotions when you see them," said waitress Marti Rouse. "The first time they walked in it sort of took us all back, then we got used to having them all here. You're proud of them, and then you worry about where they're going, and now I'm sorry to see them go."

A woman having an early lunch exchanged a knowing glance with her friends as she changed seats for a better view of the men in uniform. "Don't you feel safe?" she asked.

Mr. Spivey explained the mechanics of the town sewer system, which he directs, and the volunteer fire department, which he has belonged to for 46 years. "I was glad to do anything I could to help them prepare for the job they have ahead," said Spivey, who is also commander of the local American Legion post. "I was impressed with the way they rolled in and did these interviews and tried to learn how the systems work."

Maj. Leland Suttee, commander of one of the detachments, said the transition to civil affairs has come with growing pains. "Every marine is trained as a rifleman first, and it's easy for us in an artillery unit to be good at that," he said. "It's easy to go kick down a door, and marines love that, so this is actually much harder for them."

While there's a huge difference between Al Anbar Province and Jones County, N.C., the goal of the exercise was to show marines what a well-run, fully functioning local government looks like. "They will know what the goal is when they go into Fallujah or Ramadi," Major Suttee said. "In Ramadi, we have a burgeoning city government. We need to be able to go in and show them how to take funding from the provincial government, prioritize projects, get contractors to start rebuilding their cities, and get businesses running again."

One morning, 1st Lt. Steven Aguilera and his civil affairs team rolled into Maysville, where they secured the Maysville Milling Co. and interviewed manager James Harper about the business. Mr. Harper, whose father served in the Marine Corps in Korea and for two tours in Vietnam, was born in 1950 at Camp Lejeune, where the 5/10, part of the 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force, is stationed.

Harper's son is also a marine and served during the 2003 invasion of Iraq. "I don't advise any parent watching CNN when their kid is over there, because it will drive you mad," said Harper, an Army veteran himself. "I don't know about this war. This one is hard to figure out, and it would be really hard to have to bury one of your own for it."

Harper explained the basics of operating a mill and some of the social ills of seemingly idyllic Jones County. "We've got a crack epidemic here," he said, pointing to a neighborhood across US Highway 17. "On the weekends during the summer, you can see them set up outside selling it. They have guys riding on bicycles selling it."

Along the tree-lined streets of Trenton, another Marine patrol stopped to introduce themselves to residents and ask who they were, what they do, and what problems they have in town. They passed the Jones County courthouse without a glance at the two war memorials out front, one for a Navy seaman who was killed during World War II, another for Michael Harris Jr., an Army sergeant who died in Saudi Arabia in 1991 during Operation Desert Storm.

Turning down a side street, the patrol parted for a passing pickup truck, apparently driven by another veteran who had emblazoned "68 Viet Nam Vet 69" on the back of his cab. "Check that," one Marine commented.

A moment later, they chatted with a resident walking to her mailbox. "Civil affairs is like customer service – you're out shaking hands, you're trying to be nice to people, and the customer is always right," said Cpl. Jason Talbot.

By lunchtime on the final day of the exercise, most of the marines had exited Trenton. Paula Tucci, who runs Pop Tucci's with her husband, had collected signatures from the arines on a "Pop Tucci's" T-shirt. She pinned the memento on the wall by the front counter.

"It's been a trip having them here this week," she said. "Even though I don't know them, I'm sorry to see them leave."

At Jones Middle School, a civil affairs team engaged dozens of students with an outdoor display of Marine equipment. LCpl. Joel Vannatta reached down to shake the hand of an awed sixth-grader. "When I first joined the Marines, I knew that going to Iraq was a good possibility," said Corporal Vannatta of Jacksonville, Fla. "I would have been disappointed if I had spent four years in the Marines without going. I want to do something with all this training I have."

Fratricide In Iraq's Anbar May Escalate (AP)

By Brian Murphy,
AP, February 26, 2007

The killers started early. Just after sunrise, they tracked the imam to his modest brick mosque, where he was praying on a green carpet. Three masked gunmen muscled past a handful of worshippers and pumped four bullets into the chest of Sheik Adbul Rahman Jawhar al-Karbouli.

His murder Feb. 16 in a village near the Syrian border was barely noticed in Iraq's daily body count. But — like a vivid footnote in a dry collection of statistics — it helps bring the violence among Iraqi into sharper focus.

To much of the world, the meltdown in Iraq is a two-act spectacle: insurgents versus U.S.-led forces and Iraqi allies, and the sectarian bloodletting between Sunni Muslims and the majority Shiites. Yet out in the desert of the western Anbar province there is another story — told one attack at a time — of an internal struggle among Sunnis, between militant factions and those who have stood up against them.

It's a fratricide that may be escalating.

A suicide truck bomb killed more than 50 people Saturday leaving a mosque in the Anbar village of Habbaniyah, 50 miles west of Baghdad. The mosque's imam — like the slain al-Karbouli — had spoken out against the insurgents, which include extremists inspired by al-Qaida.

The showdowns in Anbar demonstrate how the battle for Iraq can reach into every home and mosque. Political and religious leaders are being pushed to choose between the insurgency or the U.S.-backed government.

Heads of the province's powerful desert clans also must decide if they will assist or resist the militants — setting off mafia-style turf wars along tribal lines.

"The first step, before we talk about reconciliation, is to bring the outlaw places under control," said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, a spokesman for the Iraqi military.

No place, it seems, shelters more outlaws than wild Anbar, a huge wedge of badlands and dunes with the Euphrates River as its lifeline.

Supply lines from Syria are thought to lace this vast empty landscape, bringing weapons and goods to Sunni insurgents. Among the militant groups operating here are those loyal to the former regime of Saddam Hussein, as well as al-Qaida in Iraq — which has committed suicide strikes, kidnappings and beheadings, in addition to attacks on U.S.-led forces.

Anbar's capital — Ramadi — is often referred to as Iraq's "wild west." It's the scene of near daily battles that produce a steady flow of U.S. body bags.

As insurgents clash with government forces, Anbar's clan leaders are caught between them.

Clan chiefs often act as judges, policy makers and intelligence chiefs for entire neighborhoods and villages. They also have the firepower at their disposal to enforce their decisions. Both the government and the insurgents need their support.

Some clans have thrown in with the insurgents — providing them with safe houses and protection along the suspected smuggling lines. Others have spurned the al-Qaida inspired "mujahadeen" — such as Jordanian-born leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed by a U.S. airstrike last June — as foreign interlopers.

The result for Anbar's Sunnis has been division and bloodshed.

"Anbar represents the breakdown of Iraq at its most basic levels. It has forced tribes and families to pick sides," said Mustafa Alani, an expert in Iraqi affairs at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai.

The imam al-Karbouli was a victim of this splintering of Anbar along clan lines, one of perhaps hundreds of similar killings since 2003.

Members of his tribe had publicly denounced the insurgents. Al-Karbouli often used his Friday sermons at the Ameen mosque in Karabilah to warn worshippers against joining the "terrorists," said residents of the town, located about 240 miles west of Baghdad.

The 45-year-old al-Karbouli spoke out in other prominent forums. As a member of the municipal council, he tried to rally young men to join the police or military. As a lawyer, he mocked the declarations by al-Qaida in Iraq to establish an Islamic state.

Resident of Karabilah say his opposition to the insurgents cost him his life. "The only reason for this brutal act was his stance against al-Qaida," said one resident, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of fear of reprisals.

Family members refused to release a photograph of the imam. They are worried that insurgents may attack the four children he left behind.

The impact of Anbar's clan-against-clan violence on the people living in this desert landscape is difficult to measure. Reports, however, give a sense of how ruthless and thorough the killers can be.

On Feb. 19, gunmen ambushed a minivan on the main highway from Baghdad to Anbar. The attackers accused the 13 aboard of opposing al-Qaida in Iraq. All 13 were executed, including an elderly woman and two boys, police said. The bodies lay on the roadside for hours.

The same day, a suicide bomber tried to kill Abdul Sattar Abu Risha, leader of the Anbar Salvation Council, an alliance of clans backing the government.

"We give al-Qaida and their supporters these choices: either surrender, kill themselves or we kill them," said Col. Tarik Youssif Mohammed al-Assal, the deputy interior minister in Anbar and the Salvation Council's top security adviser.

The council, he said, uses a network of informants to hunt for insurgent backers and weapons stashes. He declined to give a clear breakdown on how many clans back the militants, but he suggested that the tide was turning.

"Al-Qaida is dying in Anbar," he claimed.

What progres has been made has come — in part — because the Pentagon has learned some painful lessons about dealing with the insurgency here.

During the 2003 invasion, the province was largely bypassed as U.S.-led columns pushed toward Baghdad. Small detachments were sent into the Anbar desert to try to block Scud missile batteries from moving within range of Israel.

But Anbar's expanses were too vast and its population too small to draw much attention after Saddam Hussein's fall.

That all changed in March 2004 when mobs in Fallujah ambushed U.S. security contractors and displayed the mutilated remains of two victims on a bridge over the Euphrates. The intense street-by-street battles that followed foreshadowed the bloody struggles ahead for U.S.-led forces across Anbar.

The Pentagon struck back with offensives to try to block the cross-border networks of suspected foreign fighters. These were the first major campaigns joined by the new Iraqi Army and another allied force: Several hundred Anbar tribesmen pledged to fight against the insurgents, who called themselves the Desert Protectors.

Since then, Washington has tried to expand the ranks of pro-government clans in Anbar by wooing clan leaders. The Pentagon's No. 2 commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, traveled Thursday to Anbar towns near the Syrian border, where he met political leaders and tribal elders.

But it can be difficult to recruit nervous Sunnis to the government's side.

The Shiites can count on the protection of the police, who are led by Shiites, and on their miliitas, including the powerful Mahdi Army of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The Kurds of northern Iraq are protected by their traditional mountain guerrillas, called the peshmerga.

Many Sunnis — who were favored under Saddam — now feel vulnerable without a homegrown armed faction on their side.

"Groups like al-Qaida in Iraq exploit these fears among Sunnis and tell them things like, `We are here to protect you,'" said Alani, the security analyst.

Andrew Exum, a specialist in Iraqi issues at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, believes the White House is still struggling to grasp the "tribal geography and social geography" of Anbar.

"For the most part, the complications of tribal politics remain a mystery for the Americans," he said.

"No doubt they may be getting better at getting some clan leaders over to the government side," he added, "but they still have to make sure that empowering one faction does not appear be at the expense of another group. It's a very difficult place."

U.S. Says Raid In Iraq Supports Claim On Iran (NYT)

By James Glanz And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 25 — A raid on a Shiite weapons cache in the southern city of Hilla one week ago is providing what American officials call the best evidence yet that the deadliest roadside bombs in Iraq are manufactured in Iran, but critics contend that the forensic case remains circumstantial and inferential.

The new evidence includes infrared sensors, electronic triggering devices and information about plastic explosives used in bombs that the Americans say lead back to Iran. The explosive material, triggering devices, other components and the method of assembly all produce weapons with an Iranian signature that has never been found outside Iraq or southern Lebanon, where Hezbollah is believed to have used weapons supplied by Iran, the Americans say.

But critics assert that nearly all the bomb components could have been produced in Iraq or somewhere else in the region. Even if the evidence were to establish that Iran is the source, they add, that does not necessarily mean that the Iranian leadership is responsible.

The raid by American and Iraqi forces discovered a fake boulder made of polyurethane and containing three of the deadliest kind of roadside bombs in Iraq. Smeared with dirt and pebbles to give it the color and texture of a rock, the polyurethane blob was resting in the back seat of a Toyota, apparently in preparation for a roadside attack, American officials said in lengthy briefings with two New York Times reporters last week.

The Toyota, along with a second vehicle and a nearby house described as an assembly point, contained components and other weaponry that the officials believe demonstrate that the bomb parts must have originated in Iran. Called explosively formed penetrators, or E.F.P.'s, bombs like the ones hidden inside the fake boulder are designed to eject molten slugs that slice through American armor with deadly precision.

The assertion that the latest find greatly bolsters the theory of the Iranian origin of the E.F.P.'s is significant because it could provide the United States with a new justification to take action against Iran. But the evidence is unlikely to satisfy skeptics who have been suspicious that the Bush administration is trying to lay the groundwork for attacking Iran. They point to the flawed intelligence used by the administration to accuse Saddam Hussein of harboring weapons of mass destruction before invading Iraq nearly four years ago.

All of the items found in the Hilla raid have been used by Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, said Maj. Marty Weber, a master explosives ordnance technician who has studied many kinds of improvised bombs in the Middle East and elsewhere and is closely involved in the effort in Iraq.

In addition, the shallow concave caps, which are made of copper and change into armor-piercing balls when the E.F.P.'s explode, were smooth and flawless, indicating to the explosives expert that they were manufactured in Iran because of the high precision required to make them so. Also found during the raid were 10 107-millimeter Strella rockets that had Iranian markings.

A Question of Technology

The most specialized part of the E.F.P.'s that were found is the concave copper disc, called a liner, that rolls into a deadly armor-piercing ball when the device explodes. Although American explosives experts say that the liner is deceptively difficult to make properly, the discs in Hilla look like a thick little alms plate or even a souvenir ashtray minus the indentations for holding cigarettes.

The electronics package is built around everyday items like the motion sensors used in garage-door openers and outdoor security systems; in fact, at the heart of some of the bombs found in Iraq is a type of infrared sensor commonly sold at electronic stores like RadioShack.

Still, American military officials appear to be making an attempt to respond to critics who say the evidence is inconclusive. In the course of the detailed briefing on the Hilla discovery, Major Weber said that most of the E.F.P.'s in Iraq use C-4 plastic explosive manufactured in Iran. At the request of the Bush administration, The Times is withholding some specific details about the weapons to protect intelligence sources and methods.

In addition to the Hilla discovery, military officials are expected to disclose at a briefing on Monday details about materials found in a raid in Diyala Province, the mixed Sunni-Shiite battleground north of Baghdad, that, according to one defense official, included enough components to make more than 100 E.F.P.'s. The official asked not to be identified by name because the matter is so sensitive.

Major Weber said the use of precision copper discs combined with passive infrared sensors amounted to "a no-brainer" that the explosive components were of Iranian origin, because no one has used that sort of configuration except Iranian-backed Shiite militias.

Could copper discs be manufactured with the required precision in Iraq? "You can never be certain," Major Weber said. But he said that "having studied all these groups, I've only seen E.F.P.'s used in two areas of the world: The Levant and here," meaning in Hezbollah areas of Lebanon and in Iraq. Hezbollah is thought to be directly armed and trained by Iran.

Skeptics say the new details do not support a conclusion that only Iran could be providing the components. "Iran may well be involved in the supply of these weapons, but so far they haven't proved it," said Joseph Cirincione, senior vice president for National Security at the Center for American Progress, a liberal research and advocacy organization.

"Before we act on the assumption that these are Iranian we've got to rule out all these other possibilities," he said. "The military hasn't done that."

He noted that a related weapon, the shape charge, "has been around for decades. This is not new stuff. There is a vast international arms market selling shape charges from many countries."

New Details

The new information is more substantial than the limited details disclosed earlier this month in Baghdad, said John Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a research group based in Alexandria, Va.

"That initial briefing was not much to write home about," Mr. Pike said. "The points that they are making here are rather more convincing. Whether they're true is a completely different question."

Mr. Pike said he was not swayed by arguments that the copper discs could only be made by equipment in Iran. All that is required are machine tools, he said. "You can buy them. I mean, look at all those cylinders people use for L.P.G. cooking gas. Do you think they are all imported from Iran? Probably not. I bet there are guys all over Iraq who make those things for a living."

But he found other details more persuasive. "The two points they are making about the tradecraft of the fuse and the wrappings of the explosives those are pretty good pieces of evidence," he said. "I will say that, totally apart from any of this evidence, I would be astonished if Iran was not providing military support to the Shia militias. It should be self-evident that they are doing that."

Afternoon Attack

The Hilla raid took place at 1:30 p.m. on Feb. 17 after a tipster reported seeing a tow truck carrying rockets.

The fake rock with three E.F.P. canisters inside was sitting on the back seat of a different vehicle, a Toyota Crown. The trunk of the same car contained various equipment including an infrared sensor, a G.P.S. unit, two compasses and a jug filled with an unknown explosive.

Tools and materials for making fake rocks were found inside the house along with a partially completed rock and two E.F.P.'s. Among the items found there were seven battery packs needed to set off the blasting caps that initiate the E.F.P. explosion, four cans of epoxy foam and three of the infrared sensors.

The E.F.P.'s were designed to inflict maximum damage. The positioning of the sensor and the exact angles of the E.F.P.'s inside the rock were fixed to find weak points in American armored vehicles like Humvees and Strykers.

"The E.F.P. canisters are typically arrayed at angles to minimize the effects of countermeasures," Major Weber said. "They want to hit the truck when it is already well into the kill zone."

The infrared sensors could be armed and disarmed at a distance with cellphones, long-distance cordless phones or radios. That allows the attackers to arm the devices only when American or Iraqi convoys are approaching. Then, when the convoys trip the sensors, the E.F.P.'s explode.

Major Weber said that many of those techniques were clearly Iranian in origin. Critics said that all of them could be replicated by skilled Iraqis or others in the Middle East with a solid knowledge of electronics and basic manufacturing techniques.

Still, Major Weber said, there were other indications of Iranian involvement in Hilla. In the raid, the Iraqi and American troops also found a red 1988 Chevy tow truck carrying 10 Strella rockets under a false bottom in the bed. The rockets had MJ-1 contact fuses and were probably made in China and repainted with Iranian markings — the usual practice for weapons that Iran imports and resells. Following international convention, the markings were in English, not Persian. They indicated that the rockets had been made in 2005 and each carried 18 kilograms of explosive.

As to why the Iranians would leave such obvious markings on the shells, Major Weber speculated that they had simply been taken out of stock and shipped across the border.

Comparisons to Others

Major Weber said he doubted that Hezbollah — the group Mahdi militia leader Moktada al-Sadr has used as a model for his political movement — would have provided the material and technology to the Mahdi militia or to other Shiite fighters in Iraq.

"It is possible, but based upon my experience we have not seen Hezbollah share information or technology on anything until they have been told to," Major Weber said.

"The E.F.P. is their silver bullet," he said, referring to Iran and its allied militias.

Major Weber also said that the use of passive infrared sensors, or P.I.R.'s, was one of the strongest markers of Iranian involvement, based on years of experience indicating that only Iranian-backed groups employ the sensors in that manner. But he also acknowledged that the electronic components needed to make the sensors are easily available off the shelf at places like RadioShack.

Those components are usedin commercial products, such as motion sensors for a lighting system or garage door openers. Those products are opened up, rewired and repackaged. Sometimes on products where multiple beams must be triggered to close the circuit, masking tape is used to cover up some beams so that only one is triggered.

"Every P.I.R. in Iraq has been RadioShack, Digigard or Everspring," Major Weber said. "But in southern Lebanon I never saw them use Radio Shack."

While he maintained that the copper liner also required specialized equipment and skills to make properly, that assertion also rests on some rather subtle distinctions. A senior defense official displayed pictures of a stack of some 30 copper E.F.P. liners seized in a raid in Mahmudiya, a town south of Baghdad. The liners, Major Weber said, were "copycats" stamped in Iraq, not Iran. To the untrained eye, the liners initially looked identical to the genuine ones.

But Major Weber then pointed out that there were slightly visible cracks often running in circles around the tops of the liners when they sat on a table with their concave sides pointing down. Those imperfections were signs that the liners had been made in Iraq, Major Weber said. And because of the imperfections, he said, an E.F.P. made with them would be much less deadly. Such an E.F.P. would fragment rather than curl into a ball, he said, and the fragments would be much less likely to pierce armor.

Iraqi Ministry Casts Doubt On Oil Law (AP)

By Bushra Juhi,

DOJ_NMG_0136287

The Oil Ministry cast doubt Sunday on statements indicating the Kurds had agreed to support a draft oil law that would divide revenues among all Iraqi factions and meet a key U.S. benchmark in Iraq.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government had promised to enact a new oil law by the end of 2006 but missed the deadline due to objections from the Kurds. Many of Iraq's vast oil reserves can be found in the Kurdish north and the Shiite south, and the Kurds wanted a greater role in awarding contracts and administering the revenues.

Massoud Barzani, president of the self-governing Kurdish administration in the north, said Saturday that he and President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, had discussed the latest draft law by telephone with al-Maliki and "the results were good."

Barzani made the comments in a joint press conference with Talabani after a meeting with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in the northern Kurdish city of Sulaimaniyah.

"We reached a final agreement," Barzani said, without elaborating. "We accept the draft."

An Oil Ministry spokesman, however, stressed that the draft law still needed to be discussed at the Cabinet level.

"Today, we got confirmation that Barzani said that they support the draft law but he mentioned nothing about agreeing to it," ministry spokesman Assem Jihad said. "The discussions and the negotiations are still ongoing."

It was unclear if Barzani was saying he supported the idea of a law or the draft as currently worded. Kurdish officials could not be reached for clarification.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she had stressed the importance of making rapid progress on the oil law with Iraqi leaders when she was in Baghdad last week. But she said she recognized the difficulty of the task.

"The oil law is not just an oil law. It's a law about dividing the resources of the country and therefore maintaining the unity of Iraq. So it's not easy," she said on "Fox News Sunday."

Once the Cabinet signs off, the measure goes to parliament for final approval once the legislators return from a recess early next month.

The Bush administration, facing growing pressure to end the Iraq conflict, has been urging the Iraqis to finish the new oil law.

A new law is needed, most outside experts believe, to encourage international companies to pour billions of dollars into Iraq to repair pipelines, upgrade wells, develop new fields and begin to exploit the country's petroleum reserves, estimated at about 115 billion barrels.

Panel: Military Health System Needs Help (WP/AP)

By Seth Borenstein, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Many Iraq war soldiers, veterans and their families are not getting needed psychological help because a stressed military's mental health system is overwhelmed and understaffed, a task force of psychologists found.

The panel's 67-page report calls for the immediate strengthening of the military mental health system. It cites a 40 percent vacancy rate in active duty psychologists in the Army and Navy, resources diverted from family counselors and a weak transition for veterans leaving the military.

The findings were released Sunday by the American Psychological Association.

More than three out of 10 soldiers met the criteria for a "mental disorder," but far less than half of those in need sought help, the report found. Sometimes that's because of the stigma of having mental health problems, other times the help simply wasn't available, according to the task force. And there are special difficulties in getting help to National Guard and Reserve troops, who have been used heavily in Iraq, the report said.

The special task force found no evidence of a "well-coordinated or well-disseminated approach to providing behavioral health care to service members and their families."

The psychology task force, chaired by an active military psychologist and comprised of psychologists working for the military or Veterans Administration, said "relatively few high-quality" mental health programs exist in the military now.

"There are tremendous needs; the system is stressed by these needs," said pediatric psychologist Jeanne Hoffman, a task force member and a civilian pediatric psychologist at Tripler Army Medical Center in Honolulu.

The Defense Department's mental health experts hadn't read the report. Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said the military is proud of its mental health services record, including a new program this year that checks up on service members after they return home to their families.

"For the past four years, DOD has been aggressively reaching out to support our military personnel before and after deployments. This is unprecedented," Smith said in an e-mail to The Associated Press. "We have assessed the health, including the mental health of more than 1 million service members before and after deployments. We have worked with their families and others to address mental health concerns associated with deployments and with war."

One of the major problems is that four out of 10 "active duty licensed clinical psychologist" slots in the Army and Navy are not filled, a problem worsened by the dire need to send mental health experts into war zones, the report said.

That high vacancy rate has several side effects. One is that the psychologists left are overwhelmed, the report said. It found that one-third of Army mental health personnel reported "high burn out" and 27 percent reported "low motivation for their work."

Because of the shortage, there are even fewer stateside therapists to help families of those deployed and to help returning soldiers readjust, the report found.

Hoffman, the pediatric psychologist, said she's seen children regress on toilet training, have severe headaches, stomach pains, and suffer in school because of the stress of having a parent deployed.

And for soldiers and veterans returning home, only 10 to 20 percent of the military's mental health experts are trained to help those with post-traumatic stress disorder, the report found.

"I know guys that are waiting for appointments," said Russell Terry, chief executive officer of the Iraq War Veterans Organization. "I know guys who are dealing with doctors who have no concept of PTSD."

Terry was on the phone with an Iraq war veteran last year when the vet killed himself.

Report co-chair Michelle Sherman, a psychologist at the Veterans Administration Medical Center in Oklahoma City, said the military and VA are "working very hard to meet the needs" of those returning from Iraq.

At VA headquarters, Antonette Zeiss, deputy chief consultant in the agency's office of mental health services, said the report "misses the mark by quite a way." She said her agency didn't have "an opportunity to present data (to the panel) about what the VA is really doing."

Sherman said the panel did seek data from the VA, but when asked if the agency provided information to the psychologists' panel, she said: "I'm not supposed to answer that question."

Zeiss said the VA has been increasing spending on mental health services yearly, opening new centers and hiring more psychological professionals.

"We have the strongest mental health system in the country and we are making it stronger," she said.

But veterans groups disagree.

"The system as it exists today ignores the readjustment needs specific to Iraq and Afghanistan service members," Veterans for America President Bobby Muller said in a statement. "We have to stop throwing money at a problem that requires a complete overhaul. The system is broken."

Troops' Needs Not Met, Psychological Group Says (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya, Usa Today

USA Today, February 26, 2007

Task force: Families vulnerable to war trauma

A task force of the nation's largest group of mental health professionals warns that the U.S. military is not fully addressing the needs of troops and family members traumatized by war.

In a report issued Sunday, the American Psychological Association task force said families are particularly at risk. It noted that 700,000 children have had a parent sent overseas since Sept. 11, 2001, and estimated that 2,733 children have lost a parent killed in Iraq or Afghanistan.

"Many service personnel and their family members are going without mental health care because of the limited availability of such care and the barriers to accessing care," a news release accompanying the study said.

The Pentagon declined to comment on the study but defended its record of treating troops and their families. Spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said physical and mental health screenings before and after deployments have been provided to 1 million troops during the past six years, and mental health teams are sent into combat zones to monitor and assist servicemembers there. She said the military also has created several family support systems.

"No military in the history of the world has done more to identify, evaluate, prevent and treat the mental health needs and concerns of its personnel than the military services of the United States," Smith said.

Among the problems, according to the psychological task force:

·The Pentagon failed to implement the best mental health treatment programs across the military. Rather, plans varied by installation and included only a few that were deemed high quality.

·The military hasn't hired enough psychologists. The study notes a 22% decline in the number of uniformed clinical psychologists in the military and a 40% vacancy among licensed clinical psychologist positions in the Army and Navy.

·Not enough research has been done on the war's impact on military spouses and children. "Given that our country has been at war for nearly six years, the absence of systematic research … is striking," the study said.

Psychologist Ron Palomares, who headed the task force, said the problems the report identified "kind of crept up on us."

Smearing Like It's 2003 (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Even as jurors pondered whether Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff should be convicted for lying about what the Bush administration did to smear one of its critics, there was Cheney accusing another adversary of doing the work of the terrorists.

The fabricate-and-smear cycle illustrated so dramatically during the case of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby explains why President Bush is failing to rally support for the latest iteration of his Iraq policy. The administration's willingness at the outset to say anything, no matter how questionable, to justify the war has destroyed its credibility. Its habit of attacking those who expressed misgivings has destroyed any goodwill it might have enjoyed. Bush and Cheney have lost the benefit of the doubt.

Yet Cheney has learned nothing and forgotten nothing. His latest demon is House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, whom he accuses of validating al-Qaeda's objectives.

"Al-Qaeda functions on the basis that they think they can break our will," Cheney told ABC News on Friday by way of explaining his earlier attack on the speaker. "That's their fundamental underlying strategy, that if they can kill enough Americans or cause enough havoc, create enough chaos in Iraq, then we'll quit and go home."

Cheney added: "And my statement was that if we adopt the Pelosi policy, that then we will validate the strategy of al-Qaeda. I said it, and I meant it."

No doubt he did, and those words illustrate the administration's political methodology from the very beginning of its public campaign against Iraq. Back in 2002 and early 2003, it browbeat a reluctant country into this war by making assertions about an Iraqi nuclear program that proved to be groundless and by inventing ties between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda that didn't exist.

Then, once our troops were committed, anyone who had second thoughts could be trashed and driven back as a pro-terrorist weakling. The quagmire would be self-perpetuating: Once you checked in, you could never leave.

The evidence presented at the Libby trial has demonstrated how worried Cheney was that this scheme could unravel. Thanks to Patrick Fitzgerald, the painstaking prosecutor, we know that Cheney was beside himself over former ambassador Joseph Wilson's July 6, 2003, New York Times op-ed article undercutting the administration's claim that Saddam Hussein had sought nuclear materials in Niger.

Whatever the jury decides, Fitzgerald has amply demonstrated that Cheney directed Libby to destroy Wilson's credibility, partly by leaking that his wife, Valerie Plame Wilson, was a CIA operative who had suggested Wilson was well qualified to investigate the claims in Niger. For Libby, Fitzgerald said in closing his case, Valerie Wilson "wasn't a person. She was an argument, a fact to use against Joe Wilson."

Libby-Cheney apologists have argued over and over that Cheney had a right to be angry because Wilson said that Cheney had sent him to Niger. But Wilson said no such thing. In his New York Times piece, Wilson wrote only that he had been "informed by officials at the Central Intelligence Agency that Vice President Dick Cheney's office had questions about a particular intelligence report." That was true.

The attack apparatus has now turned on Fitzgerald, whose record is that of a thoroughly nonpartisan prosecutor. Fitzgerald's perjury rap against Libby, Cheney allies say, is a cheap attempt to criminalize politics.

Really? Here's what Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) had to say about perjury: "Lying under oath is an ancient crime of great weight because it shields other offenses, because it blocks the light of truth in human affairs. It is a dagger in the heart of our legal system, and indeed in our democracy. It cannot, it should not, it must not be tolerated."

Ros-Lehtinen made that statement not about Libby, but to justify the impeachment of Bill Clinton back in 1998. I have no idea where she stands on the Plame-Wilson case. But it's certainly amusing that so many who were eager to throw Clinton out of office for perjury and obstruction of justice when he lied about sex are now livid at Fitzgerald for bringing comparable charges in a controversy over the rationale for war. Do they think sex is more important than war?

Whatever price Scooter Libby pays, the country is already paying for the divisive practices of a crowd that wanted to go to war in Iraq in the very worst way -- and did exactly that. As a result, we confront the mess in Baghdad and the continued threat of terrorism as an angry, polarized nation.

Town's Elders Plead For Help With Taliban (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa And Carlotta Gall

DOJ_NMG_0136290

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 24 — Taliban fighters who seized control of a remote town in southern Afghanistan three weeks ago have started a campaign of arrests and reprisals against tribal elders and townspeople, according to tribal elders. The elders called on NATO forces and the government to move against the insurgents, even if it means bombing the town.

Five elders from the town, Musa Qala, including a member of its tribal council, traveled to Kabul this week to plead for help, expressing bitterness that neither Afghan forces nor NATO troops responded when Taliban forces overran the town on Feb. 2.

In October, in a controversial deal brokered by the town's 50-member tribal council, both British NATO troops and the Taliban withdrew, and the town enjoyed three months of calm. But the Taliban remained at large in the district, and when NATO forces killed eight of their members in an airstrike last month, their leader seized control of the town, putting elders who did not flee under house arrest and issuing death threats.

Hundreds of families fled, anticipating NATO bombing. NATO airstrikes have continued in the region and have killed several local insurgent leaders, but the elders said that had made the situation harder for the townspeople. "Mullah Ghafoor was killed in an airstrike, and the Taliban started to blame the elders and people for spying for NATO troops," said the main spokesman for the group that came to Kabul, identifying one insurgent leader. Another leader, Mullah Manan, was killed, and the house where his body was taken was bombed, he said.

"Since Tuesday the Taliban started to arrest people and elders and charge them with helping the government," he said. Ten people had been arrested, including an elder who had served as police chief, and one man was hurt and may have died, the elders said. The spokesman and an elder interviewed by telephone said that a Taliban leadership council in Quetta, Pakistan, was ordering the arrests and issuing the death threats.

The elders who spoke asked not to be identified for fear of reprisals from the Taliban. Two said they had received death threats from the Taliban and had fled their homes. Other members of the tribal council were in hiding, they said.

One elder said the Taliban had told him by telephone that they were under strong pressure from Pakistan to seize control of the town and now to go further. "One of the Taliban told me on the telephone, 'Hajji Sahib, I am respecting you like my father, but we are ordered to kill you,' " he said.

One landowner from Kajaki, a neighboring district, said the Taliban had executed 13 people from their own ranks and arrested three more.

About 1,000 Taliban are in Musa Qala's broader district, also called Musa Qala, the elders said. The Taliban have boasted that they control 10,000 fighters in the region.

"We want the government to take back Musa Qala," said one elder who helped broker the October deal. "People are ready to help NATO and the government, but we don't know what we are waiting for."

Asadullah Wafa, the governor of Musa Qala's province, Helmand, was at the NATO airbase at Kandahar discussing the situation with NATO commanders. He said that he was not aware that the Taliban had begun making arrests but that the government and NATO were poised to act. "We have a comprehensive plan to resolve the issue of Musa Qala, and it will be solved very soon," he said by telephone.

Former Afghan Warlords Rally For Amnesty (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

In one corner of a soccer stadium that has seen both athletic contests and executions stands a poster some 20 feet tall of Afghanistan's president, Hamid Karzai. Perhaps appropriately, Feda Mohammad Mujahid has turned away from it.

The 25,000 Afghans crowded into this bare concrete oval hoist up different posters of stern-faced mujahideen commanders who first fought the Soviets, and then each other, before joining with America to oust the Taliban in 2001.

To Mr. Mujahid, wrapped in a white scarf against the winter chill, these are the heroes of Afghanistan's "holy wars," not war criminals. So he has come here to rail against Mr. Karzai and the tyranny of Western nations, which have opposed an Afghan bill that would grant the mujahideen amnesty for war crimes committed during the past 25 years.

"This is a mujahideen nation," he says, as nearby loudspeakers crackle with speeches of defiance. "We want the law of Islam, and the government of mujahideen."

Away from the teeming streets around the stadium, the attitudes of average Afghans take on a different air. Many express frustration that former military leaders who killed thousands and destroyed Kabul in a four-year civil war might never be brought to justice. Yet in a country still divided by tribes, tongues, and traditions, Friday's rally sent a clear message – that even now, Afghanistan's onetime warlords alone have the power to muster the masses.

In this rally, "you saw their continuing ability to mobilize people and to potentially influence politics," says Paul Fishstein, director of the Afghanistan Research and Evaluation Unit, an independent analysis organization here.

Some see amnesty as political ploy

The bill itself, which was recently approved by both houses of Afghanistan's parliament, has attracted international attention largely because it has been portrayed as a self-serving political ploy. Those likely to benefit most from the legislation are legislators and government officials themselves, many of whom are former mujahideen who stepped into the political vacuum following the fall of the Taliban.

Among the speakers at Friday's event were members of parliament, the vice president, the president's top security adviser, an army chief of staff, and an energy minister.

To them, amnesty does offer a measure of self-preservation. The momentum for warlord amnesty here began after the execution of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, a onetime US ally.

Former mujahideen members of parliament "thought that there might be a day that maybe they will face the same thing that Saddam Hussein faced," says Najibullah Kabuli, a member of the lower house of the Afghan parliament, the Wolesi Jirga, who abstained from voting on the amnesty bill because he thinks it is too broad.

"Didn't the US support the mujahideen?" asks protester Abdul Malik, noting how the mujahideen, too, were allies of the United States during the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979.

Even after the fall of the Taliban, the international community could have taken a stronger stand against allowing former warlords into politics, says Mr. Kabuli, the member of parliament. For a country that has been at war for 25 years, "it was not possible to have a government that was free of war criminals," he says. "But it was possible for the government to have fewer of these."

As the political winds have shifted from a focus purely on stability to issues of human rights and good governance, former mujahideen have emerged as an easy target.

A report by Human Rights Watch, for instance, called for several members of the government to be tried for war crimes.

"Human Rights Watch should consider the stability of Afghanistan, otherwise Afghanistan will go toward crisis again," cried security adviser Mohammed Qasim Fahim. "This country we have today was created by the holy war, by the mujahideen, and by their sacrifices."

In this conviction lies the warlords' greatest power. In a nation with a tribal heritage and a history of endless foreign interventions and abandonments, Afghans have come to trust only on those closest to them. As a result, warlords are able to mobilize unshakable support though regional or ethnic alliances.

Protesters say amnesty brings unity

For those who slogged through the mud of Kabul's soccer stadium, thrusting frenzied fists into the air and bearing massive posters of commanders around the field in a triumphal march, the amnesty is partially an act of healing these historic rifts. Mujahideen commanders who once turned Kabul to rubble in their attempts to kill each other were now standing side by side.

"This is a war-torn country," says Mujahid, his hands folded behind his back, counting crimson prayer beads. "We have suffered a lot and we don't want to fight each other again."

"Let's forget about the past and think about a prosperous future," he says. "We want to be united."

A peaceful protest is a part of that message, some say. "We want to show the people of the world that one day we were evil to each other, but we can be peaceful, too," says Mr. Malik.

However, many Afghans and experts alike are skeptical. "These things tend to be cyclical – there tend to be alliances of convenience," says Mr. Fishstein.

Far from the echoes of the soccer stadium, Kabul resident Mohammad Ewaz sits on a stone wall in the hills high above the Kabul plains. In the amber light of late afternoon, he sips his tea, taking a break from the new wall he and his friends are building a few feet away.

Farther down the slope, the remnants of shattered houses, destroyed in the civil war, emerge from the hillside. "This is the work of the people who are asking for amnesty," he says.

"If they are really intending to bring unity, then it is a good idea," he adds. "But if it is just words and nothing else, then I don't think that it is a useful thing."

Why Have So Many U.S. Attorneys Been Fired? It Looks A Lot Like Politics (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Carol Lam, the former United States attorney for San Diego, is smart and tireless and was very good at her job. Her investigation of Representative Randy Cunningham resulted in a guilty plea for taking more than $2 million in bribes from defense contractors and a sentence of more than eight years. Two weeks ago, she indicted Kyle Dustin Foggo, the former No. 3 official in the C.I.A. The defense-contracting scandal she pursued so vigorously could yet drag in other politicians.

In many Justice Departments, her record would have won her awards, and perhaps a promotion to a top post in Washington. In the Bush Justice Department, it got her fired.

Ms. Lam is one of at least seven United States attorneys fired recently under questionable circumstances. The Justice Department is claiming that Ms. Lam and other well-regarded prosecutors like John McKay of Seattle, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona — who all received strong job evaluations — performed inadequately.

It is hard to call what's happening anything other than a political purge. And it's another shameful example of how in the Bush administration, everything — from rebuilding a hurricane-ravaged city to allocating homeland security dollars to invading Iraq — is sacrificed to partisan politics and winning elections.

U.S. attorneys have enormous power. Their decision to investigate or indict can bankrupt a business or destroy a life. They must be, and long have been, insulated from political pressures. Although appointed by the president, once in office they are almost never asked to leave until a new president is elected. The Congressional Research Service has confirmed how unprecedented these firings are. It found that of 486 U.S. attorneys confirmed since 1981, perhaps no more than three were forced out in similar ways — three in 25 years, compared with seven in recent months.

It is not just the large numbers. The firing of H. E. Cummins III is raising as many questions as Ms. Lam's. Mr. Cummins, one of the most distinguished lawyers in Arkansas, is respected by Republicans and Democrats alike. But he was forced out to make room for J. Timothy Griffin, a former Karl Rove deputy with thin legal experience who did opposition research for the Republican National Committee. (Mr. Griffin recently bowed to the inevitable and said he will not try for a permanent appointment. But he remains in office indefinitely.)

The Bush administration cleared the way for these personnel changes by slipping a little-noticed provision into the Patriot Act last year that allows the president to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period without Senate confirmation.

Three theories are emerging for why these well-qualified U.S. attorney were fired — all political, and all disturbing.

1. Helping friends. Ms. Lam had already put one powerful Republican congressman in jail and was investigating other powerful politicians. The Justice Department, unpersuasively, claims that it was unhappy about Ms. Lam's failure to bring more immigration cases. Meanwhile, Ms. Lam has been replaced with an interim prosecutor whose résumé shows almost no criminal law experience, but includes her membership in the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group.

2. Candidate recruitment. U.S. attorney is a position that can make headlines and launch political careers. Congressional Democrats suspect that the Bush administration has been pushing out long-serving U.S. attorneys to replace them with promising Republican lawyers who can then be run for Congress and top state offices.

3. Presidential politics. The Justice Department concedes that Mr. Cummins was doing a good job in Little Rock. An obvious question is whether the administration was more interested in his successor's skills in opposition political research — let's not forget that Arkansas has been lucrative fodder for Republicans in the past — in time for the 2008 elections.

The charge of politics certainly feels right. This administration has made partisanship its lodestar. The Washington Post reporter Rajiv Chandrasekaran revealed in his book, "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," that even applicants to help administer post-invasion Iraq were asked whom they voted for in 2000 and what they thought of Roe v. Wade.

Congress has been admirably aggressive about investigating. Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, held a tough hearing. And he is now talking about calling on the fired U.S. attorneys to testify and subpoenaing their performance evaluations — both good ideas.

The politicization of government over the last six years has had tragic consequences — in New Orleans, Iraq and elsewhere. But allowing politics to infect U.S. attorney offices takes it to a whole new level. Congress should continue to pursue the case of the fired U.S. attorneys vigorously, both to find out what really happened and to make sure that it does not happen again.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

In Brief (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission moved to withdraw charges against a former Halliburton Co. chief financial officer after accusing him more than two years ago of failing to ensure that the company disclosed an accounting change that was material to investors. In a filing in federal court in Houston, the SEC said it wanted to dismiss its pending claims against Gary Morris "in the interest of justice."

Shareholders Push For Vote On Executive Pay (WSJ)

By Erin White And Aaron O. Patrick

Some shareholders are angry about soaring executive pay. Soon, they may get a voice.

Ahead of this year's annual meetings, activist investors have submitted shareholder proposals at roughly 60 companies seeking an advisory vote on executive pay, according to Institutional Shareholder Services. Targets include Citigroup Inc., Wells Fargo & Co., WellPoint Inc. and Northrop Grumman Corp.

The vote would be nonbinding, but activists hope that public censure, or the threat of it, would prompt directors to curb outsized awards and better link pay with performance. The proposals come as new Securities and Exchange Commission rules requiring greater disclosure promise to cast a brighter spotlight on compensation.

One company facing a shareholder proposal, insurer Aflac Inc., agreed earlier this month to give investors a nonbinding vote on executive compensation, beginning in 2009. Others, including Pfizer Inc. and Schering-Plough Corp., are discussing the possibility of similar moves.

This week, U.S. Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, plans to introduce a revised version of his 2005 bill that aimed to give shareholders power to veto executive-pay deals. He will hold a hearing next week on his latest measure, which instead would require advisory votes.

The activists are taking a page from the British. Since 2003, United Kingdom shareholders have cast advisory votes on corporate compensation policies and how much they pay executives. Investors and companies say the practice, which began after the British government passed a law requiring it for all public companies, has generated more discussion between shareholders and boards.

But it hasn't necessarily curbed compensation.

"We have better disclosure and better accountability," says Ian Jones, head of responsible investment at Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd., an insurance company with about $40 billion under management. But "I don't think it's had much effect on the amount of remuneration."

British CEOs have long made less on average than their U.S. counterparts, but pay in both markets has risen at roughly comparable rates in recent years, with some indications pay may have risen faster in the U.K. than in the U.S. The median salary and bonus for CEOs at 250 large and mid-size U.K. companies totaled £610,000 ($1.2 million) in 2005, the latest year for which data are available, according to the U.K. arm of ISS. That's up 9.9% from 2004 and 35.6% from £450,000 in 2003.

In the U.S., median CEO salary and bonus hit $2.4 million in 2005, up 7.1% from 2004, and up 13.7% from $2.1 million in 2003, at 350 large companies studied by Mercer Human Resource Consulting. The companies in the 2003 and 2005 samples varied somewhat.

Stephen Davis, a fellow at Yale University's Millstein Center for Corporate Governance and Performance who has studied the U.K. experience, says the advisory vote has strengthened the link between pay and performance. For example, pay consultants say the practice has pushed British companies to shift executive compensation toward bonuses and away from big salary increases. But Mr. Davis says "Investors still feel...that pay is not yet fully aligned with performance in the way that they would like."

Mr. Davis says companies and investors are on a learning curve, but he says the vote appears to have helped curb severance packages. At the start of the decade, a three-year payout was standard; today, a one-year payout is "virtually universal," Mr. Davis says. But he says directors worry that investors reviewing dozens of pay plans are issuing "cookie-cutter" judgments rather than evaluating packages individually.

Big U.K. shareholders applaud the increased discussion. Talks, often held in advance of annual meetings, are "more meaningful" than the occasional formal presentations managers used to offer shareholders, says Colin Melvin, head of corporate governance at London-based Hermes Pension Management Ltd., which manages $120 billion in assets.

For instance, in 2003, 50.7% of votes cast by shareholders opposed a pay package for GlaxoSmithKline PLC Chief Executive Jean-Pierre Garnier. The pharmaceutical maker later agreed to overhaul its pay policies and end "what might be deemed 'payment for failure,'" according to its 2004 letter to shareholders. Dr. Garnier's total pay package fell slightly in 2004, to $4.56 million from $4.57 million the year before.

Ahead of the 2004 shareholder meeting, Glaxo sent draft copies of its compensation report to large shareholders, according to Richard Singleton, the director of corporate governance at F&C Asset Management. Mr. Singleton emailed Glaxo's then-chairman, Sir Christopher Hogg, suggesting tougher performance targets for executives to earn bonuses. The company added a clause stating performance targets would consider analysts' forecasts.

"I was delighted," Mr. Singleton says. The clause remains part of Glaxo's compensation policy.

A Glaxo spokesman confirmed the clause was inserted in the 2004 report, but he declined to comment on the process. Sir Christopher couldn't be reached.

Tlk doesn't always translate into action. Early last year, London-based investment manager Amvescap PLC decided to pay its departing chairman, Charles W. Brady, a $9 million bonus. ISS's British arm believed the payment was unjustified, according to director of research David Paterson, and considered opposing the compensation report.

Amvescap's company secretary, Michael Perman, told an ISS analyst that executives considered the bonus reasonable because Mr. Brady had shepherded Amvescap through a tough period and had hired a new chief executive. The analyst wasn't convinced, and ISS recommended that investors oppose the compensation report; at the annual meeting, 48% of votes cast did. Mr. Brady did get the bonus.

An Amvescap spokesman declined to comment beyond a written statement from Amvescap Chairman Rex Adams on the day of the vote: "Over the last weeks, Amvescap has initiated direct discussions with many of our company's major shareholders, and we believe we have a good understanding of their views."

Despite the shortcomings, U.K. investors are among those pushing U.S. companies to adopt the advisory vote. In January, a group of 13 institutional investors, nine British, wrote SEC Chairman Christopher Cox to endorse the practice. The group, which collectively has $1.5 trillion under management, said the votes would bolster communication between shareholders and directors, better link pay with performance and "provide a counter-weight" to rising executive pay. Companies in Australia, Sweden and the Netherlands also grant shareholders a vote on pay.

In the U.S., the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees union sponsored "say on pay" resolutions at seven companies last year and 10 so far this year, says Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy for AFSCME. ISS says the resolutions last year won an average of 40% support, which is high for new issues.

This year, AFSCME is co-leading a group of companies and shareholders to discuss the idea. The group includes Pfizer, Intel Corp., Schering-Plough and American International Group Inc., as well as the California Public Employees' Retirement System and other funds.

Some corporate participants in the group think the concept has merit, but they worry about the mechanics. One sticking point: How to give shareholders a voice on elements of a pay package that companies are legally bound to pay, such as an executive's deferred compensation? "You create an expectation that you can do something about it" if investors reject the package, says one person close to the situation.

Alex Kelly, head of investor relations at Schering-Plough, says the company is willing to consider letting shareholders vote on pay. "We're willing to listen," he says.

Other companies oppose the notion. In a statement to be included in its proxy, Wells Fargo argues that an advisory pay vote "would provide no clear or meaningful guidance" because directors wouldn't know which portion of compensation investors objected to. Shareholders already have plenty of ways to tell directors what they think, the company states. Wells Fargo also contends that the U.S. and U.K. corporate systems have "significant differences in regulatory and corporate governance policies and practices."

Other companies aim to keep the proposal off the proxy. WellPoint contended to the SEC staff that the proposal could be kept off the ballot; SEC rules allow companies to exclude proposals in some circumstances, including if it's "misleading." On Friday, WellPoint was notified that the SEC staff agreed "there appears to be some basis for your view." So WellPoint will now keep it off the proxy, a spokesman says. A spokeswoman for proposal submitter Connecticut Retirement Plans and Trust Funds said it won't try to appeal to the SEC. Instead, it will support the say-on-pay idea in other ways, such as by supporting legislation Mr. Frank plans to introduce.

Another company, Northrop Grumman, has also argued to the SEC that the proposal should be kept off the proxy. As of Friday, the company had not heard back, a spokesman said.

Corporate America Fights Back (WP)

By Michael Seigel

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Last time the public was tuned in, the Justice Department was vigorously prosecuting corporate giants such as Enron for massive frauds committed during the waning days of the stock bubble. Assisted by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, government lawyers were racking up victories in the battle against white-collar crime. One recent highlight was the October sentencing of former Enron chief executive Jeffrey Skilling to 24 years in prison.

Now that the public's attention has shifted to matters such as Iraq, however, corporate America has launched a counterattack. Its goal is to derail the Justice Department's efforts to maintain a heightened level of white-collar criminal enforcement. Its success thus far starkly illustrates how power and money influence our criminal justice system.

Big business, represented primarily by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, could not attack white-collar criminal enforcement head-on. Instead, it enlisted the aid of its lawyers, including the American Bar Association and the Association of Corporate Counsel, in a more oblique assault. Their strategy was to mount an all-out offensive against a seemingly obscure trend: the Justice Department's increasing insistence that corporations waive their attorney-client privilege as part of their cooperation with government investigators.

Through experience, government lawyers have learned that the efficiency of white-collar criminal prosecution can be significantly improved when companies facing indictment cooperate and provide relevant information. This way, prosecutors can get to the bottom of complex criminality and promptly indict those responsible. However, unlike an ordinary criminal who cooperates by telling what he knows, a corporation only "knows" what its employees tell it. Often, information relevant to a prosecution has been gathered by the corporation's counsel. Therefore, to cooperate, the corporation must waive its attorney-client privilege.

In a January 2003 document known as the "Thompson Memorandum," Justice told its prosecutors to consider a corporation's willingness to waive its attorney-client privilege in determining whether it ought to be indicted. This is where big business and its lawyers aimed their attack. Treating attorney-client privilege as if it were a sacrosanct American institution, akin to freedom of speech, they claimed that Justice was unfairly using its tremendous power to coerce corporations into privilege waivers. The resultant erosion of the privilege would be catastrophic, they contended. This tactic even garnered the support of the American Civil Liberties Union, and together the various lobbying groups formed the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege.

The coalition's claims are hugely overstated. The government does not "coerce" corporations to waive their attorney-client privilege any more than it "coerces" drug dealers to waive their Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination when they agree to testify. Moreover, the attorney-client privilege is not an end unto itself but a means to an end. Its main purpose is to encourage individuals to be candid with their lawyers.

The coalition says that the prospect of a privilege waiver will cause corporate employees and officers to clam up, eviscerating internal investigations and compliance programs and resulting in more corporate crime. But employees of corporations have known since the Supreme Court's 1981 decision in Upjohn Co. v. U.S. that when they speak to corporate counsel, the decision of whether to keep the conversation confidential resides with the corporation, not with them. The necessity and complexity of legal compliance leads most employees to talk to counsel nonetheless. Little indicates that the recent increase in privilege waivers has upset this balance.

So the Justice Department simply carried on. But it underestimated the power of the forces allied against it. Through intense lobbying efforts, the coalition persuaded Congress to conduct hearings. The same politicians who expressed outrage at corporate fraud a few years back now expressed outrage at the government's vigorous pursuit of it. Eventually, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) introduced a bill that would prohibit federal prosecutors from seeking privilege waivers or considering a corporation's willingness to waive privilege voluntarily when evaluating its cooperation. Realizing that it was in danger of losing, Justice issued the "McNulty Memorandum" on Dec. 12. It reins in prosecutors' ability to request privilege waivers by requiring high-level supervisory approval.

But big business smells blood. Its reaction to the McNulty memo has been negative, and its goal continues to be the outright prohibition of waiver requests. Through reintroduction of the Specter bill, it is pressing its legislative "fix" in the new Congress, and the newly empowered Democrats -- eager for lobbyists' money -- are likely to be as responsive as their Republican predecessors. The result of a waiver prohibition, of course, would be a significant slowdown of white-collar criminal prosecutions -- exactly what the business lobby wants. And the losers, once again, would be the victims of white-collar crime: the American people.

CRIMINAL LAW:

In Alaska, An Oil Player Loses Favor (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

VECO Gets Chilly Treatment From Once-Friendly Politicians As FBI Probe Jolts Statehouse

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- The oil industry has long enjoyed a cozy relationship with the state government here -- not to mention the residents, who receive an annual dividend from the industry.

A Federal Bureau of Investigation probe of influence peddling -- which has focused on one of the oil industry's most powerful players -- is shaking up those ties.

At the center of the turmoil is closely held VECO Corp., the state's largest oil-services company, which has provided construction, engineering, management and other services for pipelines, refineries and other facilities.

VECO has long been one of Alaska's most prodigious campaign contributors; Chairman Bill Allen and top VECO executives have donated a total of more than $1 million to state campaigns since 1998. A year ago, a witness saw Mr. Allen in the gallery of the state legislature passing notes to a Republican politician backed by the company -- at the same time that legislators were debating a measure to cut taxes on the industry.

In August, FBI agents swarmed into legislative offices throughout the state seeking evidence of payments to state lawmakers by Mr. Allen and his executives, according to a warrant. Since then, a cloud from the investigation has hung over the state's capital, Juneau.

In recent months, a number of Alaska politicians have publicly distanced themselves from VECO and refused to take any donations from it. The new governor, Republican Sarah Palin, made a refusal to accept any VECO donations part of her platform when she challenged former Gov. Tony Knowles -- a Democrat who had made a similar pledge.

No VECO executives have been charged in the probe. FBI officials and Mr. Allen declined requests for comment. Amy Menard, an Anchorage attorney representing VECO, said, "There is no question that VECO and some VECO executives have always, from day one, had an interest in politics. But to suggest that there has been improper or inappropriate political contributions is an unfair charge."

In December, one state official was charged in connection with the influence-peddling investigation. The legislator, Tom Anderson, was indicted by a federal grand jury in Anchorage on charges of extortion, conspiracy, bribery and money laundering stemming from an FBI undercover operation in the case. Mr. Anderson, who had accepted campaign contributions from Mr. Allen and other VECO executives, faces up to 115 years and fines of up to $2.5 million. He has pleaded not guilty.

It isn't clear whether his case was related to VECO, nor whether the investigation extends beyond the company. It isn't clear what spurred the initial investigation. According to the search warrants executed in August on offices of VECO and six state legislators, FBI agents were authorized to seize documents relating to VECO, Mr. Allen and several other VECO officials.

For years, regulators paid relatively little attention to the industry here. As the nation's energy supplies have become more uncertain amid political tensions around the world, the Bush administration and its allies have made tapping Alaska's oil reserves a top energy strategy. That has brought attention to the once oil-friendly political scene in Alaska.

The Environmental Protection Agency last year launched a criminal probe into BP PLC's maintenance of its aging oil facilities at Alaska's Prudhoe Bay. BP was forced to shut down the giant oil field for several days during the summer. EPA officials launched a criminal inquiry into corrosion problems on the 800-mile Trans-Alaska Pipeline, which ferries crude across the state to the ice-free port of Valdez, Alaska. The investigations are continuing.

Mr. Allen, who arrived in Alaska in 1968 as a high-school dropout from New Mexico, has built VECO into an oil-services giant, with more than 5,000 employees and $5 billion in world-wide contracts. It has helped companies like BP and ConocoPhillips construct pipelines, transport equipment and design oil-field power plants.

Along the way, the 69-year-old has fashioned himself into one of the state's formidable, behind-the-scenes political forces. From early in his career, he has talked about making sure the oil industry's views are represented in the state capital -- and sometimes gotten in hot water.

In 1983, Mr. Allen co-founded a political-action committee to support five Republican legislative candidates who promised to hold down taxes on the oil industry. VECO and some of its subsidiaries then set up a payroll-deduction plan through which employees donated about $40,000 to the candidates, according to state documents.

Two years later, the Alaska Public Offices Commission fined VECO $72,660, saying the employee contributions weren't properly disclosed. The fine later was reduced to $28,000 on appeal by VECO. The candidates Mr. Allen recommended all went on to win, and later helped vote down a proposal by Democrats to increase taxes on the industry.

In 2002, Mr. Allen spent so much time personally lobbying for legislation in Juneau that state regulators ordered him to register as a professional lobbyist. Mr. Allen complained, saying he considered contacts with legislators his right as a businessman. Soon afterward, the legislature passed a law that critics dubbed "the Bill Allen bill." The law increased the time someone could spend pushing for legislation before being considered a lobbyist to 40 hours each month from four hours -- effectively exempting Mr. Allen from registering as a lobbyist.

In early 2006, then-Gov. Frank Murkowski presented a proposal to give oil producers a tax break as an incentive to build a natural-gas pipeline that would ship an estimated $20 billion of natural gas from the state's North Slope field. Democrats argued that Alaska would be giving away millions in potential revenue. Mr. Allen took up residence in Juneau to help push for the measure. Though it failed to pass in the regular session, it was approved in a special session last summer.

In his December indictment, Mr. Anderson was accused of accepting $26,000 in payments from a consultant for a private corrections company. In return, the indictment claims he agreed to perform unspecified "official acts" to help that person's business, according to a Justice Department news release. The consultant was working as a confidential informant for the FBI.

Federal officials won't discuss the case nor say whether it ties into VECO. But Mr. Allen and VECO did lobby for a private prison in Alaska in 2002. Though much of VECO's business is with the oil industry, the company does other work, including building prisons.

Mike Chenault, a Republican state legislator who co-chairs the House finance committee, said he has voted for oil-industry bills backed by Mr. Allen, but not because he received money from him or anyone else. He professed an admiration for the VECO chairman, who got his start in Alaska in the legislator's district on the Kenai Peninsula. "He's actually fulfilled the Alaskan dream to come up here and do well," Mr. Chenault said.

Papers Show Mixed Result From Legislator's Years In Business (NYT)

By Mike Mcintire

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

It is an oft-told tale that has become part of Albany lore. Long before he became the State Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno borrowed $5,000 to start a telephone equipment company, built it into a profitable business and sold it for $23 million in 1990. Born into poverty, Mr. Bruno became a millionaire.

Or did he?

A review of records and interviews with his former partners showed that while Mr. Bruno indeed built his publicly traded firm, Coradian Corporation, from scratch, its sale did not make him a millionaire. In fact, the company had been steadily losing money, and Mr. Bruno made less than $400,000 from the transaction.

As a result, Mr. Bruno began to pursue other sources of money, and those pursuits are now the subject of a federal investigation.

Some of Mr. Bruno's other business ventures, before and after he sold Coradian, did poorly. In one case, he lost about $150,000 on a real estate project that dragged on for 17 years, a former partner said. And in the past six years, he has lost at least $50,000 on investments in high-tech companies, according to financial disclosure records and interviews with his aides.

Mr. Bruno's mixed success as a businessman might have important implications for a federal grand jury investigation into his financial dealings. Soon after selling Coradian, Mr. Bruno — who has for years complained that being in office has hurt his ability to make money — opened a consulting business out of his home. That business is now the focus of the federal investigation into whether Mr. Bruno provided government favors to his consulting clients, people who have been briefed about the inquiry have said.

Records show that the consulting business has been a consistently reliable stream of income for Mr. Bruno. Yet the firm does not advertise or have a published telephone number and Mr. Bruno has refused to publicly identify its clients, describing them only as "substantial and important business people."

Mr. Bruno, who declined to be interviewed for this article, has consistently defended his right to remain a businessman while serving in the Legislature, asserting that he has never used his power to enrich himself or his business associates.

It is impossible to know the full extent of Mr. Bruno's wealth because he is not required to provide details about his income or assets on disclosure forms made available to the public. There are no indications that he is in financial trouble; he lives on a sprawling farm in Rensselaer County, owns thoroughbred horses and earns $121,000 as majority leader.

But interviews and documents suggested that Mr. Bruno, 77, has remained an active consultant and aggressive investor in part because he felt he needed the money. He suggested as much in an interview with The New York Times in December.

"Nobody wants to hear it, but my being in office has cost me a fortune — millions, literally millions," he said. "I'm worth a hell of a lot less today than I was 30 years ago. That's kind of sad. I'm worth a hell of a lot less now than I was 10 years ago."

By his own account, Mr. Bruno overcame humble origins in upstate poverty by selling ice and frozen food, obtaining an undergraduate degree in business administration and, in the 1950s, teaming with an older businessman, Stanley B. Ringel, to sell insurance and mutual funds. In the late 1960s, Mr. Ringel and Mr. Bruno began selling office telephone equipment, forming what would become Coradian.

Mr. Bruno, who associates said was a gifted salesman, handled the marketing side and pursued a second career in politics, while Mr. Ringel, the chief executive, managed the day-to-day operations. By 1981, Coradian had revenues of $35 million and employed about 500 people.

But a major supplier dropped its contract, profits dried up, workers were let go, and an ailing Mr. Ringel stepped aside as chief executive, allowing Mr. Bruno to take over.

In the years after Mr. Bruno was elected to the State Senate in 1976, questions were raised about possible ethical conflicts, since Coradian received $1.5 million in state contracts from 1983 to 1988, according to The Times Union of Albany. The State Commission on Government Integrity investigated Coradian's contracts with state and local government agencies in 1988, but reported no evidence of wrongdoing.

By 1989, with Coradian hemorrhaging cash and unable to pay its debts, the company was put up for sale. It hired a consultant to interview 24 prospective buyers, but 19 expressed no interest, securities filings showed.

Mitel, a Canadian firm that was a major equipment supplier to Coradian, eventually agreed to buy it, paying $10 million in cash and assuming $13 million in debt. Numerous newspaper accounts since then, including in The Times, have stated or implied that the $23 million sale price resulted in a windfall for Mr. Bruno worth millions of dollars.

In reality, Mr. Bruno owned only enough shares to earn at most $383,000 from the sale, according to the securities filings, and he agreed to remain with the newly merged company for a couple of years at his old salary of $110,000.

George L. Benson, Coradian's president at the time of the sale, recalled recently that "nobody made a lot of money out of it, I can tell you that. It was a graceful exit. That was all it was."

Even before leaving Coradian, Mr. Bruno began pursuing other ways to make money, an effort that intensified after the sale of the company. One of the earliest was a partnership called First Grafton that he created in 1987, along with his brother and some friends, to purchase and develop a large tract of forest into home sites, a project that seemed vexed from the start and would not be completed until just a few years ago.

After two of his original partners bowed out, Mr. Bruno's solution — to replace them with two lawyer-lobbyists he knew from his work at Coradian and the state capital — inflamed old charges of ethical carelessness that had begun to dog his Senate career. The ensuing uproar forced Mr. Bruno to place his interest in First Grafton into a blind trust.

One of the lobbyists, James D. Featherstonhaugh, has represented dozens of special interest groups, including banks, insurance companies, the horse racing industry and labor unions. In December, the federal grand jury investigating Mr. Bruno sent a subpoena to Mr. Featherstonhaugh for First Grafton's records.

Mr. Featherstonhaugh said everyone involved in First Grafton had lost money, and he estimated Mr. Bruno's losses totaled about $150,000 over the 17 years that the project dragged on. Despite that, he said Mr. Bruno "never seemed to be in financial stress." The senator, he said, tended to be frugal.

"He has never struck me as either outrageously wealthy or poor," Mr. Featherstonhaugh said. "He just seemed to me to be kind of O.K."

Mr. Bruno's willingness to mix public and private interests was apparent in another real estate deal he entered into in 1999, when he and his son Joseph bought a small apartment house in Troy from Russell C. Ball, a state contractor whose wife, Dori Evans, served as finance director for the Senate Republican campaign committee, which Mr. Bruno controls.

Mr. Ball's Brooklyn-based company, which does underground utility work, has had contracts on several major state projects, and a couple of years ago he created a nonprofit group that purchased full-page newspaper ads saluting Mr. Bruno. An official familiar with the investigation said the F.B.I. has questioned people about Mr. Ball's relationship with Mr. Bruno. Mr. Ball had no comment.

Not long after buying the building, Mr. Bruno's son decided he wanted out, and Mr. Bruno tapped a friend and neighbor, Joseph L. Magno, to step in and replace his son in the investment and on a $235,000 loan used to buy the property.

"He literally said, 'Will you please help me out,' " said Mr. Magno, who is now a lobbyist. He said that he lost as much as $30,000 on the investment, and that Mr. Bruno lost money as well.

Mr. Magno was not just a friend, but also an investor in high-tech companies. In 2000, Mr. Magno agreed to help Mr. Bruno, the senator secured $150,000 in state money to start a statewide trade association of technology firms headed by Mr. Magno.

The same year, an Internet company called Go2pay, whose directors included Mr. Magno, received $250,000 in state economic development funds, at a ceremony presided over by Mr. Bruno and Gov. George E. Pataki.

Mr. Bruno did not lose money on all his ventures. His financial disclosure statements showed that he seemed to have earned money, on a regular basis, from the consulting business he started, Capital Business Consultants L.L.C.

In a news conference in December when he revealed the F.B.I. inquiry, Mr. Bruno said he provided advice on marketing and business development to lawyers and businesspeople. He declined to release information about his fees or the names of his clients, though some have been identified as a result of the investigation.

One of his first clients was McGinn Smith, an Albany investment firm. Mr. Bruno has invested both personal and campaign funds in companies controlled by McGinn Smith's chairman, Timothy M. McGinn. In 1999, Mr. Bruno reported making an undisclosed amount of money on the sale of stock in Pointe Financial, a bank holding company of which Mr. McGinn was chairman. It was one of Mr. Bruno's few profitable stock investments in recent years.

Another consulting client was Jared Abbruzzese, a businessman and friend who has flown Mr. Bruno around on private jets and who, until recently, was part of a group competing for a statewide horse racing franchise. From 2002 to 2004, Mr. Bruno decided to award $500,000 in discretionary state grants to a company in which Mr. Abbruzzese was a major investor, Evident Technologies.

The F.B.I. is now investigating Mr. Bruno's dealings with both McGinn Smith and Mr. Abbruzzese, people who have been briefed about the inquiry said.

Mr. Bruno has defended his use of state money to support Evident and other businesses, saying his only goal was to create jobs. His aides have also shrugged off questions about his overlapping personal and public interests, saying that Mr. Bruno has been in business and politics so long that interaction with people in both spheres was unavoidable.

To old friends and supporters, some of whom have benefited from the millions in public money that Mr. Bruno has directed to projects over the years, the senator's current predicament is heartbreaking. Mr. Benson, who was once Mr. Bruno's partner at Coradian, said he recently heard about the F.B.I. investigation while listening to the radio and immediately called Mr. Bruno.

"Joe called me back and left a message, saying he was O.K., that he had been re-elected majority leader and that everything was under control," Mr. Benson said from his home in Wisconsin. "But I have to say, he didn't sound all that good."

Brothel Leaders Sentenced (SEAPI)

By COLIN McDONALD, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 24, 2007

3 Chinese face prison, deportation

The three leaders of a ring of Seattle-area brothels and escort services were sentenced in U.S. District Court on Friday to two and three years in prison.

Kesheng Zhu, 38, Rujing Jiang, 36, and Yong Jun Kang, 36, who are all Chinese citizens and in the U.S. illegally, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to transport individuals for prostitution and conspiracy to launder money.

According to court documents, Zhu and his wife, Rujing, started in the prostitution business in 2003 with the opening of the Apple Spa massage parlor in Bellevue as the front for a brothel. The business was sold to Kang in early 2004 for $10,000, then raided that April by the Eastside Narcotics Task Force. Officers found hundreds of used condoms in the massage parlor's garbage.

One of the prostitutes who worked at the spa told investigators that a man, believed to be Kang or Zhu, would arrive at the business at the end of the day, pick up the money and receptionist, then lock the prostitutes inside the building.

Zhu, Jiang and Kang weren't charged with a crime then, but Zhu was deported to China. Jiang remained in the U.S. because she was pregnant with their child. Kang did not show up for his deportation hearing, court documents show.

Zhu then paid to be smuggled back into the U.S., where, with the help of Kang, he set up an escort service by placing ads in The Stranger and Seattle Weekly. Investigators later discovered that Kang had fled to Portland, where he set up a brothel. By May of 2005 Kang was back in Seattle operating another brothel in a private home in Seattle, according to prosecutors.

Both Zhu and Kang used a national network of prostitutes and brothels. That meant women would rotate every eight to 14 days among the brothels. Most of the women were in the United States on expired visas and came from across Asia.

In taped phone conversations used by prosecutors, Kang and Zhu talked with customers as if the brothels were restaurants and the women were food dishes using "kimchee" to refer to a Korean prostitute and "pho dish" for a Vietnamese woman.

During their 21-month investigation, investigators followed Zhu and Kang as they picked up and dropped off women at Sea-Tac Airport and at local hotels, documented Jiang's work as a secretary and manager of a brothel, put tracking devices on vehicles and paid a former customer of Kang's more than $30,000 for information.

In August the investigators arrested Zhu, Kang and Jiang along with six others tied to prostitution in the Seattle area.

Judge John Coughenour sentenced Zhu to 36 months in prison and Kang and Jiang to 24 months each. Because they are all in the county illegally, deportation proceedings to China will begin after they have served their sentences.

Zhu and Jiang will most likely not be reunited with their 2 1/2-year-old son until they are back in China, said defense lawyer Paula Deutsch.

"To become an orphan overnight," Jiang said about her son through an interpreter at her sentencing. "To lose a parent's love, I cannot express how this feels."

3 Chinese Nationals Sentenced To Prison Terms (AP)

AP, February 26, 2007

SEATTLE (AP) - Three Chinese nationals were sentenced to prison terms today in U.S. District Court in Seattle for conspiracy to transport individuals in furtherance of prostitution.

All three individuals will be deported following their prison terms.

The government says one was a brothel operator and two ran an escort service.

36-year-old Yong Jun Kang of Seattle was sentenced to two years in prison for conspiracy to transport individuals in furtherance of prostitution, conspiracy to transport and harbor illegal aliens and conspiracy to launder money. The government says Kang operated brothels in Seattle and Portland, Oregon.

38-year-old Kesheng Zhu and his wife, 36-year-old Rujing Jiang, both of Seattle, were sentenced for conspiracy to transport individuals in furterance of transportation. Zhu was sentenced to two years and nine months, while Jiang was sentenced to two years in prison.

The government says the couple ran an escort service in Seattle that was a front for prostitution, providing prostitutes to customers who called from homes, apartments and hotels in the Seattle area.

4 Alleged Gang Members Ordered Held (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 24, 2007

The suspects all have lengthy criminal records

A federal judge ordered detention Friday for four alleged Texas Syndicate gang members who sought release pending trial.

Seventeen Houston-area men are charged in an indictment that alleges murders, armed robberies and drug trafficking.

The four who will remain detained after a two-day hearing this week are: Francisco Nuncio Jr., 34; Johnny Perez Jr., 35 of Houston; Robbie Lee Danas, 35, of Rosenberg; George Duran, 39, of Baytown.

While saying each was dangerous, U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley declined to call any of them flight risks, noting their families, employment histories and community ties.

Nuncio and Perez face charges that could bring them death sentences. All four have lengthy criminal records and two are convicted murderers.

Perez served time for a killing in the 1980s and had posted a bond for a pending murder charge in Harris County. His lawyer offered a letter from a Houston parish priest calling Perez "a kind, gentle and respectful person.

Duran also was convicted of murder 20 years ago. Nuncio was on federal supervision when he was arrested in a roundup last week and Danas, a six-time felon, is a "habitual criminal," Botley said.

The 11-count indictment is led by a 14-charge racketeering conspiracy, followed by accusations of three murders, five armed robberies along with marijuana and cocaine trafficking charges.

Grounds for detention were based on testimony this week from an FBI agent who has worked for five years building the case. Special Agent Randy Durney said the agency began investigating murders credited to the Texas Syndicate in 2002. The gang was founded in the Texas prison system in the 1970s and employs killing and stealing to enrich its members and preserve its power. Membership is lifelong, Durney said.

"This is a dangerous group of people who have no respect for each other or for the laws of the United States," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim Braley.

Four defendants — Jesus Galvan Jr., Roberto Garza, Michael Thaman and Jerry Villarreal — waived their detention hearings.

Nine others are serving time in various prisons and jails.

Judge: Texas Prison Gang Members To Remain In Jail (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

(AP) HOUSTON A Texas prison gang's violent exploits over the last eight years, including murders and brutal robberies, were detailed over a two-day court hearing that ended Friday with a federal judge ordering four of the members to be held without bond.

Francisco Nuncio, Jr., 34, of Houston; Robbie Lee Danas, 35, of Rosenberg; George Duran, 39, of Baytown; and Johnny Perez Jr., 35, of Houston were part of a group of 17 members of the Texas Syndicate who were the targets of a five-year FBI investigation.

The federal probe resulted in an 11-count indictment charging the men with a variety of crimes in the Houston area, including murder, racketeering, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking.

Six of the gang members, including Nuncio and Perez, face a possible death sentence for their part in several murders.

While the four men who appeared before U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley for their probable cause and detention hearing had such innocuous nicknames as "Porkchop" and "Sleepy," an FBI agent testified they were violent and ruthless individuals who wouldn't hesitate killing members of their own gang.

FBI agent Randy Durney said federal authorities began investigating the gang after learning from confidential sources the group was responsible for a series of murders in the Houston area.

Using wire taps and confidential informants, some who were gang members, Durney said the FBI learned the Texas Syndicate would routinely rob drug dealers at their homes.

One man was shot and killed for 50 pounds of marijuana. At another drug robbery, gang members stole $69,000 and two kilos of cocaine, Durney said.

Texas Syndicate members also killed two men for falsely claiming to be members of the group, Durney said.

During his lengthy testimony, Durney described how gang members would meet, sometimes at bars or at family barbecues, to vote on whether to kill other members.

One member was targeted for murder because he wasn't participating in gang business or regularly attending meetings.

Another was targeted for having an affair with another member's wife. He survived a shooting and was given a reprieve as long as he ended the affair. When he failed to do so, another vote was taken to kill him. But the order was not carried out, Durney said.

Defense attorneys for the four gang members tried to imply the confidential informants helping investigators were lying to protect crimes they had committed.

"Do you have a single eyewitness against Mr. Nuncio that is not participating in the crimes?" Richard Kuniansky, Nuncio's attorney, asked. Durney replied no.

Other defense attorneys said their clients joined the gang in prison simply to survive.

Baton Rouge Woman Pleads Guilty To Fraud (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, February 24, 2007

A Baton Rouge woman pleaded guilty in federal court to one count of making a false claim for disaster assistance benefits.

According to court documents, Latoya Dunn submitted a fraudulent application for FEMA benefits, falsely claiming that her primary residence had been damaged during Hurricane Katrina.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency mailed Dunn a $2,000 check.

Dunn could be sentenced to five years in prison, a fine of $250,000, or both, as well as additional court costs.

Ex-broker In Area Firm Is Charged With Scam; Investment Fraud May Reach $40M (TOLB)

By Mark Reiter, BLADE STAFF WRITER

Toledo Blade (OH), February 17, 2007

The former manager and vice president of a Toledo brokerage firm was charged yesterday in federal court in a $17 million-to-$40 million investment scam.

William A. Sirls of Grosse Ile, Mich., was charged in U.S. District Court in Toledo with money laundering and mail fraud.

A bill of information filed in the court alleges Mr. Sirls, who was manager and vice president of a Toledo Wachovia Securities office, engaged in fraudulent investment transactions to bilk investors, co-workers, and others in a Ponzi scheme.

The scheme, which began in January, 2000, and continued until September, 2006 - nearly 18 months after he left Wachovia, was used to defraud an estimated 45 people, federal prosecutors said.

But Toledo attorney Stephen Hartman said the case against his client emerged only after Mr. Sirls went to authorities late last year and confessed.

"There was no catching him in the act. He turned himself in and voluntarily came in and told authorities about his activities. He never did get caught," Mr. Hartman said.

The two charges carry a possible sentence of 30 years in prison and more than $34 million in fines.

Mr. Sirls, if convicted, would face a substantial reduction in punishment under federal sentencing guidelines because of his cooperation.

Mr. Hartman said his client, the divorced father of two children, confessed to the activities partly out of guilt and to get it off his chest.

"He didn't feel right about it," he said. "A lot of people were shocked after he confessed. Some of the people who were [affected as investors] have been very supportive of him. He has done a lot of work in his life for charities and civic causes.

The government's case alleges that an assortment of fraudulent transactions involving bogus stocks and nonexistent property were used to lure money from investors.

In one method, investors were sold interests in what they were told were the last remaining unsold homes in a newly constructed housing development and that the discounted real estate could be flipped for a profit.

Other investors believed they were earning profits on purported stocks from nonexistent brokerage firms that were made available after the stock was ordered but never paid for by clients.

And investors were falsely promised returns on short-term promissory notes with high rates of interests.

Mr. Sirls also is accused of operating a Ponzi scheme, in which investors are paid returns resulting not from actual investment profits but from funds generated from new investors.

When he left in March, 2005, Mr. Sirls was manager of the Wachovia's former office on West Sylvania Avenue near Talmadge Road in West Toledo.

"At this point, because it is the subject of an ongoing investigation, we decline comment," said Tony Mattera, a spokesman for Wachovia, one of the nation's largest brokerage chains.

Randy Hunt, vice president of Wachovia's downtown Toledo offices in One SeaGate, said he was unaware of any investigation into Mr. Sirls' activities while he was employed at Wachovia.

Mr. Hartman disputed the amount of money that federal investigators believe was taken in the investment scams.

"While we agreed to have him charged in an information, we don't necessarily agree with the amount. We are still looking at the history to determine the actual loss that people suffered," he said.

"A vast majority of people got their money back and, in fact, the vast majority got their money back with interest. But that doesn't excuse what he did."

The reaction of former co-workers and colleagues was disbelief and shock.

"You've got to be kidding. I can't believe it," said John Carroll, the owner of River Road Investors and a former Wachovia employee.

Mr. Carroll knew Mr. Sirls from the days when the Toledo Wachovia offices were under the name First Union Securities.

After learning about Mr. Sirls' resignation two years ago, Mr. Carroll said he called him and wished him well in his future endeavors.

"I am perplexed. I am shocked. You hate to hear about that when it is about someone you like," he said.

An investment broker for nearly 40 years, Mr. Carroll feared that the scandal would harm the reputation of the firm and employees in the industry.

"It gives brokerages a bad name and drags down everybody who is in the business," he said.

Montana Man Sentenced To 15 Years In Online Luring Case (SEAPI)

By Casey McNerthney, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 24, 2007

Federal investigation part of nationwide effort

A Montana man was sentenced in federal court Friday to five years in prison and 15 years of supervised release for traveling to Washington state and attempting to have sex with a minor.

Andy Maxfield, 55, was arrested September 12 at a Holiday Inn in Kent, where police say he intended to meet a 13-year-old girl. He had been investigated since June 2006 when he entered an online chat room under the screen name "Gentlooking4fun" and contacted a federal investigator posing as the girl's mother, Department of Justice officials said.

Maxfield engaged in sexually explicit chat with the undercover officer, who posed as the girl, according to court documents. The former bus driver also made arrangements to engage in sexual activity with the minor, the documents said.

In online conversations, Maxfield told the 13-year-old he would teach her about sexual activity and that she was not to tell anyone about it because he would go to jail, Justice Department spokeswoman Emily Langlie said.

Maxfield brought condoms to the Holiday Inn hoping to meet the mother and daughter, but met federal agents instead, according to court documents.

"The United States Attorney's Office is committed to the aggressive prosecution of sexual predators like Maxfield," said Jeffrey C. Sullivan, U.S. Attorney for the western district of Washington.

U.S. District Court Judge Thomas S. Zilly said the 15-year period of federal supervision following his imprisonment was appropriate for the case.

Maxfield's case was brought as part of Project Safe Childhood -- a nationwide initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse. The program was launched in 2006, following a year when federal prosecutors charged 1,447 child exploitation cases involving child pornography, coercion and enticement offenses, according to the Department of Justice.

Sex-offender Residency Laws Get Second Look (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

Oklahoma state Rep. Lucky Lamons was a police officer for 22 years. He calls himself a "lock-'em-up kind of guy."

Yet Lamons wants to loosen his state's law that bans registered sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of a school or day care center. He says it forces many offenders to live in rural areas where they are difficult for authorities to monitor. Also, he says, it does not differentiate between real predators and the type of men he recalls arresting for urinating in public, a sex offense in Oklahoma.

"We need to focus on people we're afraid of, not mad at," says Lamons, a Tulsa Democrat who wants the rules to focus more on high-risk offenders.

Lamons is among a growing number of officials who want to ease the "not-in-my-backyard" policies that communities are using to try to control sex offenders. In the past decade, 27 states and hundreds of cities have reacted to public fear of sex crimes against children by passing residency restrictions that, in some cases, have the effect of barring sex offenders from large parts of cities. They can't live in most of downtown Tulsa, Atlanta or Des Moines, for example, because of overlapping exclusion zones around schools and day care centers.

Now a backlash is brewing. Several states, including Iowa, Oklahoma and Georgia, are considering changes in residency laws that have led some sex offenders to go underground. Such offenders either have not registered with local police as the laws require or they have given fake addresses. Many complain they cannot find a place to live legally.

The push to ease residency restrictions has support from victims' advocates, prosecutors and police who say they spend too much time investigating potential violations.

They're battling a mountain of momentum, however, because residency restrictions remain popular.

New or expanded ones have been proposed in 20 states this year. Some legislators are reluctant to pare back restrictions they passed only recently.

"We ought to give it time to work," says state Rep. Jerry Keen, author of Georgia's law, passed last year, which bans sex offenders from living, working or loitering within 1,000 feet of where kids gather. Keen, Republican majority leader of the House, says Georgia's rules put children's safety before the convenience of sex offenders.

Illinois Attorney General Lisa Madigan has a similar view. "We're trying to protect children," she says. "We're dealing with people raping children. These are horrible crimes." She says Illinois' restrictions target those who have seriously hurt children.

Others see growing problems with the residency laws.

Broad restrictions provide a "false sense of security," says Nancy Sabin of the Jacob Wetterling Foundation, which fights child exploitation. She says such laws do not protect the more than 90% of abused children who suffer at the hands of people they know. And many of the laws bar offenders from living near schools but do not stop them from loitering there, she says.

Most of the restrictions also lump all sex offenders together, even though some are child rapists and others may be 18-year-old men who had sex with underage girlfriends. There is no national breakdown of sex offenders by severity of their crimes.

"You can't paint sex offenders with a broad brush," says John Walsh, host of Fox network's America's Most Wanted. He says residency laws are worthwhile only if they can be enforced, and tens of thousands of the nation's 600,000 sex offenders are giving police fake addresses.

Walsh prodded Congress to pass a law last year — named for his son Adam, who was abducted and killed 25 years ago — that makes failure to register a felony for serious sex offenders such as rapists and child molesters. Those are the people Walsh says residency rules should target.

Some state lawmakers are trying to move in that direction:

·Iowa — Legislators began holding hearings in January on the effectiveness of a 2002 law that bars sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of a school or day care facility. Sen. Keith Kreiman, Democratic co-chairman of the Judiciary Committee, says he expects the law to be revised but not repealed. "It is very politically risky to even hold hearings," he says, because lawmakers who change the rules could be called "soft on crime."

State figures show sexual-abuse convictions have remained steady since the law took effect, but the number of sex offenders failing to register has more than doubled. Sen. Jerry Behn, a Republican who wrote Iowa's law, says it may be overly broad. He says he's talking to colleagues about how to focus on "true predators."

·Oklahoma — Like Lamons, other legislators say they'll try to narrow their state's restrictions. "Let's apply them to those who are the highest risk to society," says state Rep. Gus Blackwell, the Republican majority whip.

Sgt. Gary Stansill, head of the Tulsa Police Department's sex-crimes unit, says the current law applies to too many offenders and that he spends "way, way too much of my time" trying to enforce it. He says he investigates as many cases of sex offenders not registering as he investigates rape reports. He considers less than 10% of the state's 8,000 convicted sex offenders to be high-risk and is lobbying lawmakers to focus on them.

·Georgia — Republican state Rep. Robert Mumford, vice chairman of a judiciary panel, says he plans to propose a bill to scale back the state's law. With the backing of the Georgia Sheriffs' Association, he suggests removing many bus stops and churches from the list of areas where offenders are banned.

·Kansas — On Feb. 12, the state Senate passed a bill that extends for another year Kansas' moratorium on local governments restricting where sex offenders can live.

Some cities have rejected such restrictions. Among them: Topeka; Maplewood, Minn.; and Covington, Ky.

Several offenders have challenged residency rules in court, claiming they unfairly punish offenders who have served their time. In December, New Jersey Superior Court Judge Valerie Armstrong rejected a local ordinance as too broad. She said it had several flaws. For example, she said, it violated U.S. law that says being on a sex offender registry cannot disqualify someone from housing.

Many of the state laws are known as "Jessica's Laws" because they were passed or expanded after the slaying in Florida of 9-year-old Jessica Lunsford in 2005. Her neighbor, convicted sex offender John Couey, is on trial for the crime.

The surge in residency restrictions happened in the absence of research proving that they work.

"Residency restrictions have a lot of unintended consequences," says Jill Levenson, professor of human services at Lynn University in Boca Raton, Fla. She says many offenders are "more likely to resume a life of crime" if pushed into rural areas, because they have less access to jobs and mental health services that bring them needed stability.

Levenson surveyed 135 sex offenders in Florida, which passed a law in 2003 barring those who hurt children from living within 1,000 feet of where kids gather. Most said they had been careful not to commit crimes near their homes, so residency rules made little difference. Others said that even outside restricted areas, they live near kids.

Sex offenders seeking victims are likely to go to another neighborhood so they won't be recognized, the Minnesota Department of Corrections found in a 2003 study.

In Colorado, convicted molesters who committed more offenses lived no closer to schools or child care centers than those who had not re-offended, according to a report in 2004 by the state's Department of Public Safety.

In Arkansas, however, Jeffrey Walker of the University of Arkansas found in 2001 that child molesters are nearly twice as likely to live near schools than those convicted of sexually assaulting adults. Walker says he doesn't know why that's the case, or whether proximity to kids makes them more likely to offend again.

The need for housing for paroled sex offenders in Illinois is "close to crisis levels" because of residency restrictions, says Jorge Montes, chairman of the Illinois Prisoner Review Board. He says it's in a Catch-22 situation, because without a place to live, a parolee cannot be released.

"We go into cyclical incarceration," he says, adding that more than 400 sex offenders are doing parole in prison because they have no place to go. He says many are not child predators.

Janet Allison, 45, a mother of five in Georgia, says she was forced to move from a four-bedroom home in downtown Dahlonega to a two-bedroom mobile home "way off on a dirt road" because she is a convicted sex offender and her former home was within a quarter-mile of a church.

Allison's situation also reflects how residency laws can affect those who aren't sexual predators. Allison says she was arrested five years ago for allowing the 17-year-old boyfriend of her pregnant daughter, then 15, to move in with them. She was convicted of being a party to child molestation.

Allison didn't go to prison, but three of her children were put in foster care, and she's not allowed to have contact with her daughter or grandson. "I didn't touch anyone," Allison says. "I just thought I was protecting my daughter."

Keen, author of Georgia's residency law, says it applies to all released sex offenders, regardless of their offense, because the state has not classified them by risk. He says those released in the future will be assessed, and the restrictions will target more serious offenders.

Dyersville, Iowa, is among the cities with the strictest residency laws for sex offenders: It bars them from living anywhere in the city.

Mayor Jim Heavens says the city did so to protect public safety and property values. "We consider this a crude tool, but at least we can do something. We're not trying to banish people," he says, adding that the city might make an exception for sex offenders who pose little risk to public safety.

Researchers who study sex offenders say that other approaches could be more effective in dealing with released sex offenders than broad residency laws:

·More checks by probation officers — David Finkelhor of the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire says the best way to monitor offenders is to require frequent meetings with well-trained officers.

·Mandatory therapy — Kim English of Colorado's Division of Criminal Justice recommends having freed offenders attend therapy in group residential centers.

·Polygraphing — Levenson says lie-detector tests also can be helpful, along with electronic monitoring and required driving logs.

Illinois is inviting officials from other states to a conference in April to discuss the effects of residency restrictions.

"Somebody is going to end up with a huge problem," says Frances Breyne of the Kansas Department of Corrections, "unless we all get on the same page."

CIVIL LAW:

Ga. Whistleblower Shakes Up U.S. Dept. Of Education (AJC)

By Bridget Gutierrez

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 26, 2007

Reading Teacher From Savannah Shows Flaws In Federal Progam

Savannah — Cindy Cupp strode into the kindergarten classroom at Heard Elementary Academy and launched into an introduction.

"Good morning, boys and girls! My name is Dr. Cupp, and I'm the reading doctor," she enthused as a girl giggled. "I'm not going to give shots or anything. I'm just going to listen to you read."

Cupp has been teaching children to read for 35 years. She's so good at it, she rose to the top — becoming Georgia's director of reading instruction — before she retired and created her own brand of "Dick and Jane" textbooks. But four years ago, Cupp found herself in a fight over her storybooks that led from her port city all the way to Washington.

Cupp had no idea what she was getting into in 2003 when she tried to have her "Dr. Cupp Readers" approved for use in Reading First, a major federal initiative promising to make all children successful readers by fourth grade. Cupp just figured her company could benefit from the $6 billion flowing to schools for new reading programs.

Now, after years of pursuing perceived wrongs that blocked Cupp Publishers from winning lucrative contracts, she stands as a key whistle-blower whose complaints helped touch off a federal audit of the Georgia Department of Education, a shake-up at the U.S. Department of Education and possible congressional hearings on conflicts of interest that may have compromised Reading First.

"This is what one person on a mission can do," said Dick Allington, a University of Tennessee education professor who has been critical of the handling of Reading First, a linchpin of President Bush's signature No Child Left Behind Act. "It was just sheer persistence on her part."

Nearly 150 elementary schools, including some in Atlanta and in Clayton and DeKalb counties, are serving 53,000 Georgia students through Reading First. So far, nearly $100 million has been spent statewide on textbooks, training and reading specialists.

Cupp's curriculum — which teaches children to read with phonics instruction, where students decipher the sounds letters make, and by tutoring in common words — is used in about 80 elementary schools. Only three are part of Reading First.

State and federal officials have said mistakes made in implementing the program have been corrected, but deny taking any intentional actions that may have favored big national publishers with connections over smaller companies such as Cupp's.

"It is a very effective program," said Katherine McLane, a spokeswoman at the U.S. Department of Education. "It's very regrettable to see it viewed in this light, rather than in the light of its merits."

Turned down by state

When Sheree Bryant, an associate superintendent for instruction in Butts County, wanted to apply for Reading First funds, her school system about 45 miles south of Atlanta already had used Cupp's program in one class with success. But the state education department, which was doling out the grants, initially turned down Butts' request, which included funding for Cupp's material.

Reading First rules required use of materials proved effective through research, a hallmark of the program. Some experts the state hired to review systems' applications for Reading First funds had never seen Cupp's curriculum, which uses stories about "Jack" and "Jilly" — a pair of cape-wearing turtles — to teach new words. Yet, according to Bryant and Cupp, her books received poor marks, dooming Butts' proposal.

After Cupp complained to state officials, they relented, but only allowed Butts County to use Cupp's readers on a limited basis. By then, Cupp said, most systems had selected other materials.

Clifford Johnson, a reading expert at Georgia State University, which is aligned with another literacy program called Reading Recovery, also complained to the State Board of Education about department officials.

"They let it be known if you didn't adopt a certain type of material you wouldn't get Reading First funds," Johnson said. "Now, Cindy and I disagree on her program. But ... there ought to be freedom of choice and fair access to the public money."

After months of feeling thwarted in her attempts to get her series approved for Reading First schools, a friend suggested Cupp contact the Office of the Inspector General, a state agency created to root out corruption, waste and abuse in government. In March 2005, Cupp filed a complaint alleging that, as a small-time publisher, she was largely prevented from selling to Reading First schools.

An Oregon connection

The day she met with the agency, Cupp started to wonder why department officials acted the way they had. Why, for instance, did Georgia use a University of Oregon guide to screen textbooks such as Cupp's before they could be used in Reading First classrooms?

Unable to sleep, Cupp logged on to the Internet, began running searches on the university, and stumbled onto a newspaper article — "Oregon education professors wield influence with Bush" — that reported that the university had developed methods and a program for teaching students to read that had influenced the president's policies. One of those professors, the article said, was a longtime adviser to Bush.

For the first time in two years, Cupp said, she realized her problems went beyond Georgia. "I cried," Cupp recalled. "I thought: If there's that much strength ... that's coming from that high up in government, then what did one little person like me think I was gonna do?"

What Cupp did was begin researching the players behind Reading First, using e-mail and the Internet. She began finding professional connections between experts hired to assist with Reading First's national rollout, including some of those Oregon professors, and large textbook publishers for whom they also worked.

Emboldened, Cupp sent a complaint to the inspector general at the U.S. Education Department that May, alleging that Reading First had been rigged to force schools to use a handful of select products. Two weeks later, Robert Slavin, an education researcher at Johns Hopkins University, filed a similar complaint, saying his program, Success For All, also had been shut out. In August 2005, the Reading Recovery Council of North America followed with a third plea for an investigation.

"She was the first to submit a complaint. We would have done so anyway, but she gave us, perhaps, a model and a little courage to go forward with it," said Slavin, who began probing Reading First when he saw schools drop his program to get funding. "Filing a complaint like this is an extraordinarily dangerous thing to do. You don't do it unless you have exhausted all other alternatives."

Conflicts of interest

Much, but not all, of what Cupp found through her Internet sleuthing turned out to be true. In two recent reports, the federal inspector general gave a scathing review of the program that detailed rampant favoritism for certain teaching methods; conflicts of interest with consultants, including some of those Oregon professors, who were hired to advise states on products they themselves had authored; and willful disregard for the law, which prohibits the federal government from dictating specific curriculums.

Last month, the agency issued an audit of Georgia's program, which also backed Cupp's claims of bias, although she was not named. State officials have played down the audit, which charged that they ran the program with no written policies, hired consultants who had blatant conflicts of interest or didn't meet standards, and created mandates for publishers such as Cupp that were not part of approved guidelines.

Wanda Barrs, chairwoman of the State Board of Education, said through a spokesman that she was pleased the audit didn't find any malfeasance. "I know other states have been audited and the resulting reports were much harsher than what Georgia received."

Today, Cupp says her phone frequently rings with calls from staffers at the U.S. House Committee on Education and Labor, which is considering holding hearings on Reading First, and from journalists, including from ABC News and the New York Times, which has published a profile of her. This month, she received an award from the Wisconsin State Reading Association for her role in exposing the problems that led to a shake-up of federal employees overseeing Reading First and stronger policies to avoid conflicts of interest.

Now Cupp is waiting to hear whether the U.S. Department of Justice will open another investigation as she continues her life's work: visiting schools to assist teachers, checking students' progress and prescribing remedies for those who struggle.

As she walked down the hallway to leave Heard Elementary recently, Cupp stopped abruptly. "This is my song, can you hear it?" she asked as she stepped toward a classroom where kindergartners were singing.

"These are the letters of the alphabet! No we are not finished yet! Come join in and clap with me! As we learn the letters from A to Z!"

Within seconds, Cupp was in front of the class — smiling, clapping and leading her song.

Overly Punitive? (WP)

REGARDLESS OF what you think about tobacco companies, you should welcome last week's Supreme Court decision that repudiated an $80 million ruling against Philip Morris. Beyond question in this case was that the tobacco giant had misled Jesse Williams, a longtime cigarette smoker who died of lung cancer, into believing that smoking was not dangerous and that it therefore was culpable for his illness. The issue instead revolved around how the jury calculated the size of the punitive damages it awarded Mr. Williams's estate -- almost all of the $80 million package.

The majority held that the Oregon court considering the case should have made clear to the jury that it was not to punish Philip Morris directly for the harm it might have caused smokers other than Mr. Williams. During the trial, the plaintiff's lawyer asked the jury to consider the ill health the deceptively advertised product might have produced in other Oregonians. The result was a fat punitive award, though it is unclear how much the jury heeded the plaintiff's counsel when it settled on the amount. Regardless, the high court has set an important precedent: Defendants should not be punished for injuries they might have caused "strangers to the litigation," as Justice Stephen G. Breyer wrote in the majority opinion. Otherwise, they would not have a fair chance to defend themselves against the hypothetical harm they might have done to an unspecified number of people under varying conditions.

The question the court did not answer is whether the punitive award the jury handed down was "grossly excessive," a standard that the court established in the past but has not concretely defined. The court has indicated that punitive damages generally should be a single-digit multiple of the base compensation a jury awards a plaintiff. That vague standard and the current majority's sidestepping of the issue reflect the difficulty judges have had in establishing clear limits on the often outrageous size of punitive awards.

Capping punitive damages is a task suited for state legislatures, and it's one states should complete. States should also ensure that punitive damages -- meant to serve the public interest by punishing companies for wrongdoing, not to enrich plaintiffs -- go into public coffers.

Arlington Officials Scramble To Make Ice Center Fully Accessible (AP)

By Sarah Karush, Associated Press Writer

ARLINGTON, Va. (AP) - When Arlington County officials unveiled a new ice complex to serve as the Washington Capitals' practice facility, they emphasized it would also be a community resource serving diverse groups, particularly the disabled.

So Rosemary Ciotti, who lives nearby and uses a wheelchair, was particularly dismayed when she visited the new facility shortly after it opened in November and discovered there was no room in the bleachers for her to watch the action on the ice. Despite its $42.8 million price tag, the Kettler Capitals Iceplex is not compliant with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

"It makes you want to bang your head against the wall," said Ciotti, a member of the county planning commission.

Another disabled Arlington resident, Sheri Denkensohn, said she visited the iceplex after hearing about the problems from Ciotti. Outraged by what she saw, she filed a complaint with the Justice Department.

Arlington officials say such glitches are common in construction projects. They say they already have addressed most of the ADA problems that were noted by building inspectors before the facility opened and are working to correct the problem with the bleachers.

In April, the Special Hockey International Tournament is expected to draw 1,500 people to the iceplex. In March, USA Disabled Hockey and other groups are hosting a sled hockey clinic there. Officials said the bleachers should be fixed in time for both events.

Construction of the iceplex was paid for by the county, and the Capitals signed a long-term lease. The 137,000-square-foot facility, built atop a seven-story public parking garage in Arlington's Ballston neighborhood, has two NHL-sized rinks, office space and locker rooms, as well as a Capitals training center with a weight room and medical facilities. It also houses the front offices of the Capitals and the WNBA's Washington Mystics.

The complex has regular ice time for skating programs and youth, high school and college hockey. In addition, the Capitals are donating 500 hours of ice time a year for "economically disadvantaged and physically and mentally challenged members of the community," according to a county news release issued in November.

But when the project was finished, officials learned they had committed several ADA no-no's: A men's room urinal was several inches too high, and a locker-room shower was half an inch too narrow. A door in front of a wheelchair ramp was too heavy.

But the biggest problem was the bleachers. Wheelchairs are supposed to be able to access the front row, but the only place for them at the ice rink is at the back, where they would block the exit, Ciotti said.

"There's really no lawful place to sit in your wheelchair," she said.

Tom Newman, real estate development director for Arlington Economic Development, said the mistake happened during last-minute changes to the project.

"It sort of got forgotten in the rush to get the building finished," he said.

Newman estimated it would cost $30,000 to $40,000 to fix the bleachers. He said the county would get it fixed first and then figure out who should pay for it.

A message seeking comment was left for William Drury, president of Reston-based Architecture Inc., the iceplex architect.

Ciotti, who joined the planning commission after the iceplex was nearly complete, worries the changes won't address all the concerns of disabled residents _ even if they do satisfy the legal requirements.

"What we keep saying is we want to be at the table and we want to see the fix," she said.

Ciotti said Arlington is by and large a hospitable place for the disabled. But she is frustrated that people still need to be reminded about ADA requirements.

"Architects know the ADA. They know what they're legally bound to do," she said. "The law is 17 years old."

Sharpton's Ancestor Was Owned By Thurmond's (WP)

By Robin Shulman

NEW YORK, Feb. 25 -- The Rev. Al Sharpton, the prominent civil rights activist, is descended from a slave owned by relatives of the late senator and one-time segregationist Strom Thurmond, a genealogical study released Sunday reported.

"It was probably the most shocking thing of my life," Sharpton said of learning the findings, which were requested and published Sunday by the New York Daily News. He called a news conference to respond publicly to the report. "I couldn't describe to you the emotions I have had . . . everything from anger to outrage to reflection to some pride and glory."

Sharpton, 52, said he had suspected that his forebears may have been slaves but had never attempted to confirm that or find out any details.

"I had never really traced my family history, particularly on my father's side, since my parents separated when I was going on 10 years old," he said.

The newfound knowledge that his great-grandfather was a slave, Sharpton added, gave him a new perspective on his life.

"You think about the distance that you've come, you think about how brutal it was, you think about how life must have been like for him. And then you start wondering whether or not he would be proud or disappointed in what we have done," Sharpton said, with his eldest daughter, Dominique, 20, at his side.

The revelation was particularly stunning for the juxtaposition of the two men's public lives.

Sharpton, known for his fiery rhetoric and a tendency to intervene as an advocate in racially charged incidents, ran for president in 2004 on a ticket promoting racial justice. Thurmond made his own bid for the presidency in 1948, promising to preserve racial segregation, and in 1957 he filibustered for more than 24 hours against a civil rights bill.

After his death in 2003, though, it became clear that Thurmond had a complicated history with issues of race. A 78-year-old retired schoolteacher, Essie Mae Washington-Williams, revealed that she was the offspring of his extramarital relationship with his family's black housekeeper.

"In the story of the Thurmonds and the Sharptons is the story of the shame and the glory of America," Sharpton said Sunday.

The genealogy study was produced by researchers for the Web site Ancestry.com. Daily News reporter Austin Fenner initially asked them to research his own roots. He then approached Sharpton and asked if he would permit an investigation of his family history as well, for use in a story. Sharpton agreed. Neither the Daily News nor Sharpton paid for the research.

The research was led by chief Ancestry.com genealogist Megan Smolenyak, who was also the lead researcher for the 1997 PBS series "Ancestors" and has written several books on the subject. She was assisted by researchers including Tony Burroughs, who has been honored by the National Genealogical Society. They used documents including census, marriage, death and military records over a three-week period to examine Sharpton's family roots.

They found that Sharpton's great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, was a slave owned by Strom Thurmond's distant cousin.

Coleman Sharpton was given as a gift to Julia Thurmond, whose grandfather was the late senator's great-great-grandfather, said Mike Ward, a spokesman for Ancestry.com. Coleman Sharpton was later freed.

Al Sharpton met Strom Thurmond once with his friend James Brown, the late singer, who knew Thurmond and wanted to pay him a visit while in Washington.

"I was not happy to visit him because of what he had been all his life," Sharpton said.

Sharpton said his family origins in Edgefield County, S.C., brought him nearer to his closest mentors, Brown and the Rev. Jesse Jackson, who had lived nearby. Sharpton said he mused with Brown's family about whether their families might have a shared past.

"I told his daughters last night about this, and we all wondered whether some of James Brown's family might have been slaves with my great-grandfather," Sharpton said.

While some of Thurmond's relatives contacted by the Daily News expressed skepticism about the report, Doris Strom Costner, a cousin of the late senator, said Sharpton should be proud to know his family's connection to hers. "He's in a mighty good family," she said by telephone from Edgefield, S.C.

Asked how she feels to learn of evidence that her family owned slaves, she said: "I can't help it. I'm 74 years old, and I certainly can't help it. I don't feel one way or the other." Most white South Carolinians at the time owned slaves, she said.

Sharpton said he hoped the news of his roots would help heal the lingering wounds of slavery.

"If we open the scars just to leave them open, we've done a misdeed to both sides," Sharpton said. "We should open them and deal with them toward healing them so we can come together on some genuine level."

Staff writer Rob Stein and staff researcher Rena Kirsch in Washington contributed to this report.

Sharpton Learns His Forebears Were Thurmonds' Slaves (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

On the eve of the Civil War, in segregated Florida, a white man died in debt at age 40, leaving his wife, Julia Thurmond Sharpton, alone to raise their four children and to honor his financial obligations.

Determined to offer a helping hand, Mrs. Sharpton's father-in-law, a plantation owner in South Carolina, gave her a gift: four slaves, two adults and two children, who would work to pay off the money owed.

In that transaction, the bloodlines of two emblematic figures of the next century, each representing an opposite side of America's racial divide, intersected. Mrs. Sharpton was a first cousin, twice removed, of Senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, a longtime segregationist. And one of the slaves given to her, Coleman Sharpton, was the paternal great-grandfather of the Rev. Al Sharpton, one of the most vocal and recognizable civil rights leaders of our time.

The connection, sealed in a slave contract signed in 1861, might have remained unknown had it not been for a Web site's efforts to publicize its extensive collection of African-American genealogy records, a reporter's curiosity and Mr. Sharpton's willingness to let researchers dig into his family's past, a topic he often avoids discussing in public.

The results of the investigation, pieced together from census documents, slave narratives and birth and marriage registries, were unveiled yesterday in The Daily News, with the front-page headline, "Shock of My Life!"

"In the story of the Thurmonds and the Sharptons is the story of the shame and the glory of America," Mr. Sharpton said at a news conference at the office of The Daily News yesterday, with the older of his two daughters, Dominique, standing behind him.

"The shame is that people were owned as property, and the shame is that I'm the heir of those who were property to the Thurmond family," he said. "The glory is that Strom Thurmond ran for president in 1948 on a segregationist ticket; I ran in '04 on a ticket for racial justice, and that shows what America can become, if you're determined to beat" discrimination.

Mr. Sharpton said he had not heard from the Thurmonds and had no immediate plans of contacting them. "This is not family," he said firmly. "This is property."

While news of Mr. Sharpton's link to Mr. Thurmond might have tickled the public's curiosity, its impact was tame when compared with the shock of four years ago, when Essie Mae Washington-Williams, the daughter of the Thurmond family's black maid, stepped forward to acknowledge that she was the senator's daughter.

Ms. Washington-Williams, as well as Mr. Thurmond's other daughter and two sons, did not return phone calls last night.

Mr. Sharpton was born in Brooklyn on Oct. 3, 1954, the son of Alfred Charles Sharpton and Ada Richards. His parents divorced before he turned 10; he and his father have since had a distant relationship, he said yesterday.

Ancestry.com approached The Daily News last month seeking to publicize its African-American ancestry database, which it says contains 55 million historical documents. A reporter asked Mr. Sharpton if he would agree to have the Web site's researchers look into his family history. Mr. Sharpton said he had never considered investigating his lineage and did not know that his father's side of the family had roots in South Carolina.

The researchers tracked three generations of Mr. Sharpton's ancestors to the pre-Civil War era, eventually uncovering the slave contract, also known as indenture, in the Liberty County Courthouse in Bristol, Fla., about an hour west of Tallahassee.

The contract registered the ownership transfer of Coleman Sharpton, along with a woman and two boys, presumably his wife and sons, to Julia Thurmond Sharpton.

The familiar middle name spurred Megan Smolenyak, the Web site's chief family historian, to "play six degrees of separation," she said, reviewing Mrs. Sharpton's own past and establishing a blood connection between her and Senator Thurmond.

Coleman Sharpton took his surname from his owners, as was common practice among slaves, Ms. Smolenyak said. After emancipation, he worked as a wood hauler, at least until age 65, as recorded in the 1900 census.

"I cannot redo what happened to my great-grandfather, but I can make him say that I'm glad my great-grandson redeemed what happened," Mr. Sharpton said.

"I would hope that this story will make America deal with the pains of its past and present, the continued fight for social equity," he added. "But I also would hope that it would encourage obligation of many of us in the African-American community that have ourselves not lived up to the dreams and hopes of those who suffered before us."

NEW YORK (AP) — Genealogists have revealed that the Rev. Al Sharpton is a descendent of a slave owned by relatives of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond — a discovery the civil rights activist on Sunday called "shocking."

Sharpton learned of his connection to Thurmond, once a prominent defender of segregation, last week through the Daily News, which asked genealogists to trace his roots.

"It was probably the most shocking thing in my life," Sharpton said at a news conference Sunday, the same day the tabloid revealed the story.

Some of Thurmond's relatives said the nexus also came as a surprise to them. Doris Strom Costner, a distant cousin who said she knew the late senator all her life, said Sunday she "never heard of such a thing."

"My momma never would talk to me about nothing like that," Costner said of ancestors who owned slaves. "She only talked to me about good things."

The revelations surfaced after Ancestry.com contacted a Daily News reporter who agreed to have his own family tree done. The intrigued reporter then turned around and asked Sharpton if he wanted to participate. Sharpton said he told the paper, "Go for it."

The genealogists, who were not paid by the newspaper, uncovered the ancestral ties using a variety of documents that included census, marriage and death records.

Thurmond, of South Carolina, was once considered an icon of racial segregation. During his 1948 bid for president, he promised to preserve segregation and, in 1957, he filibustered for more than 24 hours against a civil rights bill.

Sharpton, who ran for president in 2004 on a ticket of racial justice, said he met Thurmond only once in 1991 when he visited Washington, D.C., with the late soul singer James Brown, who knew Thurmond. Sharpton said the meeting was "awkward."

"I was not happy to meet him because what he had done all his life," Sharpton said.

Thurmond was seen as softening his segregation stance later in his life. He died in 2003, at 100. The long-serving senator was originally a Democrat but became a Republican in 1964.

Thurmond's children have acknowledged that Thurmond fathered a biracial daughter. Essie Mae Washington-Williams' mother was a housekeeper in the home of Thurmond's parents.

Telephone message left by The Associated Press on Sunday for Strom Thurmond Jr. and an attorney who once represented Thurmond's biracial daughter, Essie Mae Washington-Williams, were not returned.

UCLA To Establish Unique Law Chair (LAT)

By Larry Gordon

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Thanks to a more than $1-million donation from a gay male couple who hope one day to marry in California, UCLA's law school is planning to establish what is described as the nation's first endowed academic chair in sexual orientation law.

The cash gift from John McDonald and Rob Wright will help fund the research of a still-to-be-named professor at UCLA Law School's Williams Institute on Sexual Orientation Law and Public Policy. That 5-year-old think tank investigates such topics as anti-homosexual discrimination, the impact of the military's don't ask-don't tell policies and the demographics of same-sex couples who have adopted children.

"This is going to support legal scholarship, legal research and education that covers a whole area so fundamental to creating change," said McDonald, a retired businessman and attorney who earned his bachelor's degree at UCLA. "We just think this is one of the best things we've ever done."

The UC system recently approved an agreement to accept the money, but formal establishment of the chair awaits a review to ensure that it matches UC's research and teaching missions and is not too narrowly drawn, system officials said. Although the research topics may upset social conservatives, approval is expected.

The donation for the chair was announced publicly in connection with a Williams Institute conference Friday at the Westwood campus.

Though some universities have chairs in gay and gender studies, those have been in the humanities and social sciences and not in a law school, said Brad Sears, executive director of the Williams Institute. A professor from the current UCLA law faculty will be appointed to the chair in three to six months, and the funds will help pay for such things as teaching assistants and research costs, Sears said.

"This is a big step," he said, expressing his gratitude to the donors.

The gift for the chair was described by experts across the country as giving a prestigious boost to a budding field of scholarship. "It is a terrifically exciting and important development. And it is another marker that sexual orientation law has come into its own as an important field of study," said Suzanne B. Goldberg, a Columbia University law school professor, who runs a clinic on those topics for students at that New York school.

Jennifer Pizer, a senior counsel for Lambda Legal, the national gay civil rights organization, agreed. She said that an endowed chair would be especially noteworthy because UCLA is such a well-respected school and a state university.

Pizer was among the conference speakers Friday who discussed laws that allow gay marriage in some European countries and the panoply of lawsuits involving the issue in the United States. In the keynote address, before an audience of about 150, Boris O. Dittrich, a former member of the Dutch Parliament, spoke about how his legislation led the Netherlands to be the first nation in the world to recognize homosexual marriage, starting in 2001.

McDonald and Wright, who split their time between homes in Colorado and West Hollywood, have lived together for nearly 25 years and have registered as domestic partners. But they said they faced financial and legal burdens that a heterosexual couple would not.

For example, they made costly inheritance and insurance arrangements that "would have been totally unnecessary" for a straight married couple, Wright said. And when they travel, they always take legal documents that name each other as caretakers in case of a medical emergency, he said.

McDonald, 74, was the chief executive of Mullikin Medical Enterprises, a medical and hospital management firm that was sold in 1995. Wright, 58, worked in advertising and real estate.

If gay marriage were approved in California, the pair "would do it instantly," McDonald said.

The state Supreme Court this year is expected to review an appeals court ruling that upheld a prohibition on same-sex marriage in California. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in 2005 vetoed a bill that would have permitted gay marriage and said the issue was a matter for the courts to decide.

McDonald and Wright previously donated $100,000 so the Williams institute could offer training for judges and lawyers in sexual orientation law. They are well known in the gay community for a $1.5-million donation in 1996 to the Los Angeles Gay & Lesbian Center, which then named its headquarters building after them.

The couple stress that they want the professor who takes the McDonald/Wright chair to avoid partisan advocacy and stick to objective research on a wide range of legal topics involving same-sex relationships, including adoption and property settlements after gay couples break up. But they clearly hope that such studies will aid the campaign for gay marriage and other gay rights issues.

The institute, which has a staff of 12, is named after its prime donor, Charles Williams, a UCLA alumnus who was a senior executive for Sperry Corp. Williams has given a total of $10 million to the institute, Sears said.

Williams, who was at Friday's meeting, said he wanted to help establish an academic research unit rather than an advocacy group. "You don't get change in the law or in public policy by saying it's a nice thing to do or it's right or it benefits people. You only do it by proving, through research, the facts," said Williams, who lives in Malibu.

The institute's recent studies have found, among other things, that more homosexuals live openly in rural areas of the United States than in the past and that nearly half of skilled nursing homes in the Los Angeles area will not treat HIV patients. Though the overwhelming majority of Friday's participants appeared to support gay marriage, Sears stressed that the institute seeks to present both sides of the issue. For example, last year it and Brigham Young University in Utah co-sponsored debates on the topic.

Conspiracy Weary (WSJ)

In today's paranoid political climate, any bow toward reality is welcome. So we thought you'd like to know that an independent team of computer scientists has absolved touch-screen voting machines of stealing an election in Florida's 13th Congressional District last November.

Republican Vern Buchanan won his seat by a mere 369 votes over Democratic challenger Christine Jennings, who has nonetheless refused to concede and has sued to demand a new election. Ms. Jennings claims that faulty software was the cause of 18,000 "undervotes," or incidences where voters cast ballots in other races but not in the Congressional contest, in what is a mainly GOP district on the Florida Gulf Coast south of Tampa.

However, eight computer experts from several universities looked at the iVotronic software and last week concluded unanimously that it "did not cause or contribute to the CD13 undervote." Ms. Jennings and her allies at People for the American Way aren't giving up and are demanding to see the source code themselves. Naturally, they're also claiming that one of the scientists who conducted the audit is known to have voted for President Bush. Some people will believe anything, but Ms. Jennings looks worse with each day she continues to rage against the machines.

Energy Firm Accepts $45 Billion Takeover (WP)

By Steven Mufson And David Cho

Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Buyers Made Environmental Pledge

TXU, the largest energy provider in Texas, agreed last night to a $45 billion buyout that would not only be the largest private-equity deal in history but would also feature an unusual twist: The buyers have promised environmental groups they would cancel a slew of coal-fired power plants on the firm's drawing boards.

The buyout firms' deal with environmental groups, which could become a landmark in the battle over climate-change policy, would force an abrupt turnaround in the strategy of TXU, which has defied environmentalists' and congressional criticism of its plans to expand coal use and carbon dioxide emissions.

The environmental agreement was the idea of the private-equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, which made it a condition of the acquisition, according to several sources involved in the negotiations, who gave details of the deal on condition of anonymity because it had not been announced yet.

Texas Pacific's head, David Bonderman, is no stranger to creative deals in the energy sector or in the cause of environmentalism. Bonderman sits on the boards of the World Wildlife Fund and the Grand Canyon Trust. He was a key figure in negotiating with power plants in Arizona to reduce air pollution over the Grand Canyon. In the TXU case, he tasked William K. Reilly, who had led the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H.W. Bush, to reach out and negotiate with environmental groups.

If shareholders approve the acquisition, TXU would back federal legislation that would require reductions in carbon dioxide emissions through a cap-and-trade system. It would shelve plans for eight of 11 coal-fired plants that current TXU executives had proposed for Texas and would drop plans to build new coal plants in Pennsylvania and Virginia. The company would also double its spending to promote energy efficiency, to $80 million a year, for five years.

"We think this is really a big deal, a watershed moment in America's fight against global warming," said Jim Marston, regional director of Environmental Defense in Austin and who helped forge the environmental accord in a 17-hour negotiating session with the buyout firms on Wednesday. He said it would reshape the electricity sector in Texas and alter the attitudes of Texas congressmen toward climate-change legislation.

The buyout firms also promised to cut TXU's emissions of carbon dioxide, the most prevalent of greenhouse gases scientists blame for global warming, to 1990 levels by 2020. This matches the targets contained in legislation passed last year in California but exceeds anything TXU is obligated to achieve. When the three new coal plants are on line, the company's emissions are projected to be nearly 20 percent higher than they were in 1990.

In return, Environmental Defense, which has been leading the fight against TXU's coal expansion plans, would drop its objections to the three large new units, including two 800-megawatt units at Oak Grove, Tex., and a 600-megawatt plant at Sandow, Tex. The private-equity firms held an initial round of talks on Friday with another environmental group that opposes the Oak Grove units.

The unusual talks between the buyout firms and environmental groups began Feb. 14. Reilly, who now heads a Texas Pacific subsidiary that invests in water projects in the developing world, called Fred Krupp, president of Environmental Defense.

"Reilly told us that they were negotiating to buy TXU but that they would not go through with the deal unless they could re-create the company as a green electricity generator," Marston said.

Last Tuesday, Marston got a phone call asking him to get on a plane in two hours and fly to the Texas Pacific headquarters in downtown San Francisco. Talks began 8 a.m. in a Texas Pacific conference room, and by 1 a.m. Thursday, they had a three-page list of commitments. Then the buyout executives flew in a private jet to Austin to discuss them with Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) and other state leaders.

Although the deal is not a contract and wasn't signed, the buyout firms say they intend to fulfill the commitments.

The board of TXU met last night to vote on the leveraged buyout, which would eclipse the previous record of $31.3 billion, paid for RJR Nabisco in 1989. That deal was the subject of the popular journalistic account "Barbarians at the Gate." Texas Pacific and KKR would pay about $70 per share for TXU, or about $32 billion, and assume more than $12 billion in debt. The deal could be officially announced as early as today.

Bonderman is trying to ensure that this buyout has a happier ending than a utility deal he attempted in 2004. Then, Bonderman tried to acquire Portland General Electric from the bankrupt Enron, but it ended up as a public relations disaster. Despite efforts to assuage customers and grass-roots groups, the buyout sparked picketing and vociferous opposition from Oregon legislators. The state's utility commission rejected the proposal in 2005.

This time, Bonderman was personally involved in the initial meetings with environmental groups. He assigned Reilly to lead the negotiations. He and his partners at Kohlberg Kravis Roberts also told TXU that they would walk away from the deal if the energy giant didn't scale down its coal plant expansion plans as a concession to environmental groups.

"I think anyone doing an energy investment in today's situation has got to be sensitive of the change in the attitudes of the culture and the change in the attitudes of the country, and particularly the attitudes of Congress," said a person involved in the negotiations who spoke on condition of anonymity because the deal had not yet been announced.

But there are financial advantages to the environmental agreement, as well. When they acquire companies, private-equity firms typically try to cut costs rather than expand operations. TXU had estimated that the ambitious coal plant expansion would cost at least $10 billion; others suggested that with soaring construction costs, the ultimate price tag could be much higher.

Many power industry executives said they doubted TXU ever meant to build all 11 plants. "I think it is a bit of a gimmick," said the chief executive of another utility, who spoke on condition of anonymity for business reasons. He said that deregulation of the utility business in Texas has opened the state to competition on power generation. But with TXU claiming to build so much new generation, "who's going to jump in and say they don't believe them?"

Sources involved in the negotiation said TXU's assets -- which encompass a retail business with 2.4 million customers; more than 50 generating plants, including a nuclear facility; and a power wholesale business -- would not be split up if the deal gains approval from shareholders.

A turnaround at TXU would represent a reproach to C. John Wilder, TXU's chief executive, who in the past has criticized new technology that burns coal with fewer greenhouse gases as too expensive or technologically unsound. Although he is expected to retain his position at TXU, Wilder would be expected to consult with a new environmental advisory board that would include representatives from Environmental Defense and the Natural Resources Defense Council in San Francisco.

TXU Sale Going Forward (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, February 26, 2007

Plans for coal-fired plants may be abandoned

DALLAS – Directors of TXU Corp., the largest electric producer in Texas, gave tentative approval Sunday to sell the electric company to two private-equity firms that would abandon plans to build eight new coal-fired power plants, according to people close to the situation.

Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group were offering about $32 billion plus the assumption of more than $12 billion in TXU debt, which would make it the largest private buyout in U.S. corporate history.

Final details were still being worked out late Sunday, and TXU was expected to announce a deal early Monday, said the people, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the companies had not officially announced the deal.

Since a turnaround that began in 2004, TXU has become highly profitable, but the dramatic rise in its stock price had stalled, making it an attractive takeover target.

KKR and Texas Pacific Group agreed over the weekend to drop most of TXU's ambitious plans for building eight new coal-fired power plants, a move designed to win support for the deal from environmentalists and other critics of the company.

The new buyers also agreed to support a mandatory national program to cap emissions of greenhouse gases and pledged not to build coal-fired plants outside Texas.

TXU is the largest electric provider in Texas, with 2.3 million customers. Wall Street expects TXU to report this week that it earned more than $2.5 billion last year.

If TXU shareholders approve the sale, the deal would eclipse the previous record private buyout, KKR's $25.1 billion purchase of RJR Nabisco Inc. in 1988.

An obstacle to a TXU sale had been the company's controversial proposal to build 11 new coal-fired power plants in Texas. Environmentalists and civic leaders in some cities, including the mayors of Dallas and Houston, are fighting the company's plans.

TXU has acknowledged that the new plants would produce 78 million tons of carbon dioxide each year, more than doubling the 55 million tons the company releases now.

The Natural Resources Defense Council said the new buyers have agreed to withdraw permit applications for eight of the 11 proposed plants and decline to propose new coal plants outside Texas and support caps on emissions linked to global warming. The buyers also agreed to support a system of trading credits for cutting emissions, called cap and trade.

KKR and Texas Pacific declined to comment publicly. TXU officials did not return phone calls.

TXU's coal play was already in trouble. Last week, a state court judge blocked Texas Gov. Rick Perry's order to speed up the process of gaining permits for six plants. Hearings on the proposal were delayed four months, until June 27.

According to people close to the situation, the buyout firms approached environmental groups and a few Texas legislators in the past week with a plan for making the deal palatable.

"Certainly the sponsors were conscious of a large audience beyond just the (TXU) shareholders," said one of those with knowledge of the process.

David Hawkins, director of the Natural Resources Defense Council's climate center, said he was approached by an old friend, William Reilly, who led the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H.W. Bush and negotiated terms of the TXU agreement for Texas Pacific Group.

The environmental terms "don't have everything that we would have liked, and it's not a legally binding document, but it's a new direction for this company," Hawkins said. He added that having the support of a large Texas-based power company could help pass global-warming legislation and "make the difference in whether hundreds of coal plants get built" in coming decades.

Even if the buyout fails, Hawkins said it would now be much harder for TXU to build new coal-fired plants in Texas because potential buyers agreed to drop most of them.

The agreement between the environmental groups and the private-equity firms would let TXU build three new coal plants in Central Texas at sites called Oak Grove and Sandow.

Shares of TXU soared in after-hours trading Friday, when news of the offer leaked out. The shares closed regular trading at $60.02, up $2.38, or 4.1 percent on the New York Stock Exchange.

At that price, TXU has a market value of about $27.5 billion, far higher than late 2002, when the shares sunk to about $5 apiece.

The company responded by selling off troubled units in Europe and Australia and getting out of the natural gas business to focus on producing and selling electricity to 2.3 million customers in Texas.

Besides the coal controversy, TXU has also been under attack from consumer groups and legislators over high rates and compensation paid to its chief executive, C. John Wilder, who was hired in early 2004.

In 2004, TXU lost $386 million but paid Wilder $55 million, mostly in stock-related bonuses that kicked in as the company's shares soared. TXU returned to profitability in 2005, earning $1.72 billion.

The company is scheduled to report its final 2006 results Tuesday, and analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect it to post a profit of $5.54 per share, or more than $2.5 billion. Forecasts call for only slightly smaller gains in each of the next two years.

TXU's electric rates have risen sharply since deregulation. Some state legislators propose to cap electric rates and force TXU to sell generating plants.

Within hours of the news Friday that the company could be sold, state Rep. Sylvester Turner said he was worried that private buyers "will further bleed residential and small business ratepayers." The Houston Democrat said the deal should force the Legislature to reconsider electric deregulation.

POWER PLAY Bidders Try To Pre-Empt Gridlock In TXU Deal (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith, Dennis K. Berman And Henny Sender

Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Long a Tempting Target, Utilities Have Proved Elusive for Buyout Firms

For years, cash-rich buyout firms have tried to break into the lucrative electricity business only to be rebuffed by wary regulators, consumer groups and environmentalists. Now, in what would be the biggest leveraged-buyout ever, an investor group is hoping it has cracked the code.

A total of seven firms -- led by Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and Goldman Sachs Group -- are close to signing a deal to buy utility powerhouse TXU Corp. for $32 billion plus more than $12 billion in TXU debt, according to people familiar with the matter. In a creative twist, the firms have moved quickly to pre-empt opposition from powerful environmental groups while seeking support from various regulators and politicians. Already, the potential buyers have promised to cancel plans to build all but three of the company's 11 coal-fired plants under development. And they are planning to placate consumers with rate reductions.

The deal marks a quantum leap in the political sophistication of the buyout world, and may signal a broader remaking of private equity's image in the utility industry. Buyout firms have generally received a chilly reception from utility regulators because they're seen as temporary, profit-driven caretakers not answerable to public shareholders or sensitive to consumers. If the prospective TXU buyers can overcome that perception, they could potentially open the door for more private-equity investors.

A successful deal will also create a chance to profit from a central predicament facing today's utility industry: a public that hungers for more and more electricity to burn, but has limited will to build new plants for providing it.

But it's far from a sure thing. Regulators at all levels of government could trip up the deal. It may also be subject to complaints from consumers who regard reasonably priced electrical service as a basic right.

Twice before, two of the private-equity investors involved in the deal -- KKR and Texas Pacific -- have tried to buy utilities and come up short after running into a buzz saw of criticism from state officials and consumers.

The firms are attempting to get out in front of TXU's many detractors and make concessions early, so that dislike of TXU's operating practices does not taint the deal.

On Saturday, two big environmental organizations that had fought TXU's plans to build the new coal-fired operations in Texas agreed to support the deal on the assurance that the buyers would cancel most of the plants.

There is an element of stagecraft at work, too. TXU already had plans to cut six of those plants, said people familiar with the effort. The plants that remain on the drawing board are responsible for the lion's share of the profits of the entire 11-plant project, said another person close to the company.

Private-equity firms once shunned utilities as capital-intensive, regulated and low-return businesses. But now, in a world of cheap debt, their steady and predictable cash flows have made them desirable targets.

One reason the buyers have zeroed in on TXU: It possesses unrivaled power in a state that has removed nearly all price controls for the sale of electricity. It owns the largest fleet of power plants, 19 in total, and serves the most customers.

Under the tenure of Chief Executive C. John Wilder, TXU became one of the nation's most controversial utility companies, known for turning off the service of late-paying customers, boosting rates rapidly and building plants that produce huge amounts of harmful gases. It also became one of the most profitable utilities in U.S. history.

In 2003, Texas Pacific announced its intention to buy Enron Corp.'s Oregon utility, Portland General Electric. The deal attracted widespread opposition because Texas Pacific was seen as a short-term investor that wouldn't have customers' interests in mind. Among the firms Texas Pacific had acquired were Burger King, Continental Airlines and retailer J. Crew. Texas Pacific told investors in 2005 that its returns, before taxes, have averaged 55% a year. The Oregon utilities commission eventually rejected the Portland General deal on the recommendation of its staff.

Also in 2003, KKR announced an agreement to buy UniSource Energy Corp., an Arizona utility, for $2.85 billion in cash and debt. That effort ended in late 2004 when the Arizona commission, on a 4-to-1 vote, rejected KKR's bid. In both cases, rate concessions didn't look substantial enough to overcome fear of the risks to customers if service deteriorated amid cost-cutting.

This time around, it was clear that the buyers needed a more strategic approach. At the heart of the potential new owners' campaign for support lies Texas Pacific representative William Reilly, a former administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H.W. Bush. Mr. Reilly became the public face for the buyout group largely because of his reputation among environmentalists. David Bonderman, co-founder of Texas Pacific, has a similar reputation. He is touting his board membership of World Wildlife Fund as evidence that the group will behave responsibly.

The two men have a solid history together. Back in the late 1970s, Mr. Reilly tapped Mr. Bonderman -- then a Washington, D.C., lawyer -- to write a supporting brief for environmentalists before the Supreme Court. Later, when Mr. Reilly served as chairman of the board of World Wildlife Fund, he asked Mr. Bonderman to join the group's board. Mr. Bonderman, in turn brought Mr. Reilly to Texas Pacific.

Still, Mr. Reilly was stunned five or six weeks ago when Mr. Bonderman walked into his office at Texas Pacific and asked for his help in connection with the planned buyout of TXU, according to people familiar with the matter. Initial conversations with environmentalists quickly made the two realize that the campaign would not be easy.

The efforts to woo conservation groups quickly focused on the Environmental Defense Fund, along with Public Citizen, one of the two key plaintiffs in environmental litigation against the Texas utility and the Natural Resources Defense Council.

On Wednesday, Jim Marston, an attorney with the Environmental Defense Fund, went to San Francisco to listen to Texas Pacific's case in a meeting that went from 8 a.m. to 1 a.m. the following day.

Many of the proposals that Texas Pacific and KKR came up with were developed in connection with Green Strategies, a consulting firm based in Washington state headed by Roger Ballentine, a former Clinton White House staffer.

Under Mr. Reilly, the potential owners are also planning a sustainable energy advisory committee that would include Mr. Marston and a representative from the Natural Resources Defense Council as well as a host of prominent Texans. About six days ago, Michael MacDougall of Texas Pacific, along with Fred Goltz and Marc Lipschultz from KKR reached out to James Baker, the veteran Texas politician and former cabinet member, to serve in an advisory capacity at TXU. One of the first things he asked was about environmentalists' position on the deal, according to people familiar with the matter.

On Thursday, the investors took their campaign to Texas Gov. Rick Perry. Mr. Bonderman and Henry Kravis of KKR led the delegation, which included Mr. MacDougall and Mr. Goltz, in a 90-minute meeting at the governor's mansion. "The governor gave them the message that Texas is in dire need of new capacity," said Robert Black, Mr. Perry's press secretary.

Support of the governor and the legislature is critical both to approval and to the financial viability of the deal. There are several bills before the Texas legislature now which if enacted could have a negative impact on the potential profitability of the buyout.

The buyers will need all the goodwill they can get -- and must address more than just the environmental issue. Consumer resentment of TXU runs high in Texas, where under deregulation the company has aggressively moved to raise power prices that are now among the highest in the nation. In a bid to win over consumers, the private-equity buyers have put out the word to Texas lawmakers that they plan a 10% rate reduction. Already, some lawmakers who have been briefed are unimpressed. Texas state Rep. Sylvester Turner of Houston says he believes rates should drop at least 30%.

Mr. Turner said Sunday the sale "is causing me to re-evaluate the market we created in 1999. I have serious questions about the direction we're headed and the impact on consumers who never wanted deregulation to begin with."

Per terms of the deal being contemplated, Mr. Wilder and other top executives would remain at the company, while rolling over their 5% ownership stakes into the new ownership plan. They would then have access to options that could give them another 5% stake over time. Private-equity firms generally need the support of management when making a bid for a public company. By giving management equity, that support is usually forthcoming. Mr. Wilder appears to be entitled to change of control payments that could be worth $65 million or more.

On Tuesday, TXU is expected to show record earnings for 2006. In the first nine months of 2006, it earned $2 billion on operating revenues of $7.5 billion, nearly double its profits a year earlier on a slight increase in revenues.

Insiders have described Mr. Wilder as brilliant but "tone deaf" to the niceties of the utility business. Regulated utilities, traditionally, are generous community givers and are solicitous of politicians and regulators. Erle Nye, the longtime chief executive whom Mr. Wilder replaced, typified the courtly utility chief; Mr. Wilder seemed brusque by comparison.

TXU did not return calls seeking comment.

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller said TXU has communicated poorly with elected officials. She's never met Mr. Wilder and said he has refused to meet with critics to discuss a long list of grievances that range from the coal plants, which she opposes, to nagging problems like perpetually burned-out street lights in downtown Dallas, undermining a $190 million redevelopment effort.

"Large swaths of downtown have been dark and scary," she said. "How's customer service going to get better with a bunch of outsiders running the company from New York or San Francisco?"

The buyers have tried to show that the company's tone will change. Tom "Smitty" Smith, director of Public Citizen, an advocacy organization, said he met with a KKR representative on Friday who said, "You've been a frequent critic of TXU, let's open a dialogue."

Mr. Smith -- a loud critic of both TXU's consumer relations and its coal-plant program -- said he found the overture "refreshing," particularly since he'd been trying to get a meeting, he says, with Mr. Wilder for more than a year to express concerns.

Whether the new owners could come to terms with the management of TXU was also a big question. But at a long meeting 10 days ago, Messrs. MacDougall and Goltz met with Mr. Wilder to review the specific commitments the two planned to make to reduce hostility to their bid.

Among the several u-turns: TXU was planning to introduce coal-fired plants into Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania. Indeed, David Hawkins of the NRDC already had 16 lawyers trying to derail the proposed move. The new owners promised environmentalists that there would be no such expansion if their bid went through, these people say.

Once environmentalists get over the euphoria of getting eight coal-fired plants off the table, however, some may wonder whether they got enough out of the bargain. After all, they've garnered an agreement that the buyers won't build plants they never had permission to build. But prior to the deal, it appeared that the opposition was at least making it difficult for TXU to navigate the approval process.

One administrative judge recommended that permits on an early project be denied because he didn't believe TXU could deliver the pollution reductions it had promised.

In a separate victory last week, challengers -- including a coalition of Texas cities led by the Dallas and Houston mayors and the Chickasaw Indian nation in Oklahoma -- were given four months to prepare cases and line up expert witnesses to challenge the TXU plan.

TXU was advised by Credit Suisse and Lazard, with attorneys Cravath Swaine & Moore and Sullivan & Cromwell. The buyers were advised by Citigroup, Goldman Sachs, J.P. Morgan Chase, Lehman Brothers, Morgan Stanley and attorneys Simpson Thacher & Bartlett and Vinson & Elkins.

Citigroup, J.P. Morgan Chase, Lehman and Morgan Stanley are also smaller investors in the deal.

A Buyout Deal That Has Many Shades Of Green (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

New York Times, February 26, 2007

About two weeks ago, Fred Krupp, the president of a nonprofit advocacy group called Environmental Defense, received an unusual phone call.

William K. Reilly, the former administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H. W. Bush, was on the other end. But before Mr. Reilly would explain the reason for his call, he said he needed an assurance from Mr. Krupp that he would keep the conversation confidential.

After receiving such a pledge, Mr. Reilly dropped a bombshell: the TXU Corporation, the Texas energy giant that had become the whipping boy of the nation's largest environmental groups, was in talks to be sold to a group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and Texas Pacific Group, two large private equity firms.

Mr. Reilly, who works for Texas Pacific, said he wanted to negotiate a cease-fire. If the investors succeeded in taking over TXU, Mr. Reilly said, they would commit themselves to scale back significantly on TXU's plan to build 11 new coal plants and adhere to a strict set of environmental rules. In return, he wanted the support of Mr. Krupp and his peers, who had spent the past several months waging a bitter and public war against TXU.

Last night, after several weeks of marathon negotiations that brought together both environmentalists and Wall Street bankers, the board of TXU was moving toward a vote to accept the bid from Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific for about $45 billion, which would be the largest buyout in history.

The deal would be noteworthy not just for its size, but for the confluence of business decisions and environmental concerns that drove the ultimate transaction. Because private equity firms are unregulated and historically have valued their privacy, neither Kohlberg Kravis nor Texas Pacific were eager to become an "enemy combatant" of the environmental groups, people involved in the talks said. Reducing the coal plant initiative will also free up billions of dollars in planned spending that the firms will be able to use for other projects or to help finance the transaction.

Within TXU, the controversial plan to build a raft of coal plants had become so damaging to its stock price that its board had been privately weighing a plan to scrap part of the project, said people involved in the talks, bringing the number of new plants to 5 or 6 from 11. Shareholders had sent the stock on a roller coaster ride from more than $67 a share to as low as about $53 over concerns about the risk and vast expenditure; the stock closed at $60.02 on Friday.

Indeed, it was the quick drop in TXU's stock price that got the attention of Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific, which look for undervalued companies and try to turn them around. Together, both firms approached C. John Wilder, TXU's chief executive, in January with an offer for the company, these people said.

At the time, neither Kohlberg Kravis nor Texas Pacific told TXU about their ambition to scale back its controversial coal plants. But behind the scenes, both firms had been developing a new strategy for the company with the help of Goldman Sachs, their lead adviser.

Goldman Sachs has been a longtime proponent of reducing carbon emissions. Its former chief executive, Henry M. Paulson, now the secretary of the treasury, was also the chairman of the Nature Conservancy, an environmental activist group.

Texas Pacific's co-founder, David Bonderman, is member of the board of the World Wildlife Fund, and Mr. Reilly is chairman emeritus. Mr. Bonderman called Mr. Reilly to help work on the deal and create what they ultimately called The Green Group, a committee of advisers that included Mr. Reilly, Roger Ballentine of Green Strategies and Stuart E. Eizenstat, the former chief domestic policy adviser for President Jimmy Carter.

"We didn't want to be on the wrong side of history," said a person involved in the bidding group who was not authorized to talk about the transaction before its formal announcement, which is expected today.

Under the terms of the deal, Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific will pay $69.25 a share for TXU, people involved said. Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley, Lehman Brothers and Citigroup are expected to take small stakes in TXU as well as help finance the debt with J. P. Morgan Chase. In addition, the investor group will assume more than $12 billion of TXU's debt.

The deal represents about a 17 percent premium over TXU's closing price on Thursday before word of the deal began to leak and was reported Friday on CNBC after the market closed.

It is unclear whether shareholders will agitate for a higher price from the investor group or push for other suitors to emerge. Several recent "go private" deals have drawn opposition from shareholders who expressed concern that they were being shortchanged.

The investor group has not laid out any specific plans to grow revenues through alternatives to the coal plants, but TXU is not likely to lose money, at least initially, as a result of scaling back. Three of the plants are already in the works and other eight that will be canceled would not have been built for years.

And the group will be getting more than just a utility. TXU is in the midst of an experiment to run broadband Internet over its power lines as part of a venture with Current Communications.

Both TXU, which was advised by Credit Suisse and Lazard, and the investor group spent weeks holed up in three conference rooms at the Gaylord Texan, a hotel just outside of Dallas. With armies of bankers and lawyers that frequently numbered more than 40, the group negotiated the buyout deal, including an unusual provision that will allow TXU to seek higher rival bids over the next 50 days. This clause could potentially create a bidding war, perhaps bringing other private equity firms and utilities into an auction.

Mr. Bonderman and Henry R. Kravis, the founder of Kohlberg Kravis, pleaded their case to the Texas governor, Rick Perry, on Thursday in person at his mansion, mindful that Oregon had rejected Texas Pacific's deal to buy Portland General and that Arizona had rejected Kohlberg Kravis' deal to buy UniSource Energy. The pair has also reached out to James A. Baker, a Texan and former Reagan cabinet member.

But perhaps the most difficult talks were with the environmentalists, who often seemed more like Wall Street negotiators than green activists.

Mr. Krupp of Environmental Defense used his conversation with Mr. Reilly as an opportunity to negotiate even harder for further concessions. The men agreed that Mr. Krupp's lieutenant, James D. Marston, who was leading the charge against TXU in Texas, would meet with Mr. Reilly and other representatives of the buying group. And representatives from Natural Resource Defense Council, another climate-control advocacy group, was brought into the discussion to help formulate a plan that all sides could agree on.

So last Wednesday, Mr. Marston flew to San Francisco, where he found himself face to face with Mr. Reilly over breakfast at the Mandarin Oriental hotel. There, over scrambled eggs and croissants, Mr. Reilly laid out a plan that included reducing the coal plants from 11 to 3.

Then the men went to Texas Pacific's conference room overlooking Alcatraz and the San Francisco Bay for a day-long negotiation that stretched until early the next morning. The group, which included Mr. Reilly, Mr. Bonderman and Frederick Goltz of Kohlberg Kravis, worked out a "10-point plan" that included a commitment by the investors to return the carbon-dioxide emissions by TXU to 1990 levels by 2020 and support a $400 million energy efficiency program.

When an agreement was finally struck, at 1 a.m. the next morning, Mr. Reilly grabbed a bottle of pinot noir from his colleague's office to toast the group. But he couldn't find a corkscrew. So he ran back to the Mandarin Oriental to borrow one.

Not all of TXU's historical opponents are popping corks. Some noted that a decision by one company did not sway the others that are building plants. In Dallas, Laura Miller, the mayor and leader of a coalition of municipal officials that has spent $600,000 fighting the TXU plants, said the agreement with the environmental groups might not get TXU as much help as it wanted.

Ms. Miller pointed out that one of the three surviving projects, a plant near Waco, is still opposed by local officials and had drawn a negative recommendation from a panel of Texas judges. She said she hoped that TXU's plans would leave an opening for cleaner projects, like a proposal to build a power line to West Texas, where power producers propose to build large wind farms.

For TXU, One Of The Street's Fabled Barbarians Is Back In The Hunt (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

New York Times, February 26, 2007

He has been there, done that, and now, close to 20 years after clinching the grandest buyout deal ever, Henry R. Kravis seems to be doing it again.

As always, the raw numbers loom large: $45 billion for the proposed buyout of the TXU Corporation, compared to $39 billion for the Blackstone Group's recent deal with Equity Office Properties and $25 billion for his RJR Nabisco takeover in 1988.

As this era's generation of hedge fund executives and private equity moguls use their billions to buy art, assume leadership roles in New York's cultural institutions and publicly celebrate their successes, they are working from a two-decade-old playbook of one of Wall Street's oldest masters, Mr. Kravis himself.

In contrast to the giddy exuberance of this era's newly minted billionaires, however, Mr. Kravis, who is 63, is making his resurgence not only as a cornerstone of New York's social and financial landscape, but also as a seasoned executive whose survival of a series of tough business setbacks and personal tragedies during the 1990s has given him a more measured perspective.

"Look, don't congratulate us when we buy a company, congratulate us when we sell it," Mr. Kravis said in an interview he gave to the Academy of Achievement. "Because any fool can overpay and buy a company, as long as money will last to buy it."

It's a telling comment, and according to people who know him it has become a favored maxim for Mr. Kravis, one that he trots out whenever anyone tries to praise him for a large deal. In this heady period, a deal maker's time on the mountaintop can be short indeed.

Just last year, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company was involved in a $33 billion takeover for the health care provider HCA Inc., that was the largest ever until the Equity Office deal. Last year, K.K.R. distributed $837 million in fees to investment banks, an amount that surpassed all other buyout firms.

Mr. Kravis's wider renown largely came from the RJR deal, memorialized in the best seller "Barbarians at the Gate." But the deal itself, the culmination of a frenzied bidding war that was in some ways reminiscent of the battle for Equity Office Properties, did not come close to producing a satisfactory return.

K.K.R. reaped extraordinary riches from its early deals — minting $7.4 billion from an investment in Safeway that prompted a rush of private equity imitators, for example — but the firm's failures were also monumental and industry-rattling. K.K.R.'s billion-dollar loss in Regal Entertainment — one that it shared with Hicks, Muse, Tate & Furst, now called HM Capital Partners — was one of the biggest ever.

Born in Tulsa, Okla., the son of a successful oil and gas executive, Mr. Kravis worked as an investment banker at Bear Stearns in the late 1960s. By the early 1970s, leveraged buyouts were the work of a small sideline industry that largely focused on family-owned businesses. Even in 1976, when Mr. Kravis, his first cousin George R. Roberts and Jerome Kohlberg Jr. all left Bear Stearns to found today's firm, the deals were just a couple of hundred million dollars in size. (Mr. Kravis's initial investment in the firm was $10,000; his two colleagues invested $10,000 and $100,000 respectively)

During the 1980s buyout boom, fueled by the easy availability of high-yield debt, K.K.R.'s returns led the industry. According to Fortune magazine, its first five funds averaged close to 37 percent. Mr. Kravis became a trustee of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and Mount Sinai Hospital, and the lush dinner parties he put on with his second wife, Carolyne Roehm, came to define the mores of that decade, as captured in Tom Wolfe's "Bonfire of the Vanities."

But in the 1990s, Mr. Kravis's luck changed. Tragically, his 19-year-old son Harrison was killed in a car crash in 1991 in Colorado. A run of less-than-stellar investments led to fund returns that fell considerably short of earlier successes. A clutch of private equity competitors began to assert their presence in the field, and while K.K.R. remained influential, it was by no means dominant.

Mr. Kravis's public profile also underwent a shift.

In 1994, he married Marie-Josée Drouin, a Canadian economist, who now sits on the boards of Ford Motor, the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center and the Robin Hood Foundation, and is president of the Museum of Modern Art.

Short and sleek, with slicked-back graying hair, Mr. Kravis looks more than ever like a central establishment figure as opposed to the bomb thrower he once was (he is a prominent supporter of Senator John McCain; a trustee at the Council on Foreign Relations; and a member of the exclusive club for chief executives, the Business Council).

But in the industry he had such a hand in creating — and that is now sending shock waves through the global economy — Mr. Kravis is again making his presence felt. K.K.R. is near completion of a $16 billion fund, and last year became the first of the giant buyout firms to list shares of a fund to raise money, $5 billion to be specific, from smaller investors.

"He is the Roger Clemens of the industry. He was a winner when he was 20 years old, and he is winner in his 60s," said James B. Lee Jr., vice chairman of JPMorgan Chase and a banker to Mr. Kravis for close to 30 years. Mr. Lee also disputes the notion that landing the biggest deal is what drives Mr. Kravis. "Henry does not keep score that way," he said. "What matters to Henry is being an agent of change in the alignment of capital and management."

While Mr. Kravis's relentless, hands-on management style has changed little over the last 30 years, the growth of larger and more complex deals has forced K.K.R. to alter its approach in managing the many companies in its portfolio.

In the 1980s, as a result of the small amounts of equity invested in deals, turning companies around depended largely on feats of fast financial engineering. With the recent flood of private equity capital, buyout firms are investing higher proportions of equity when they take firms private, which places a larger onus on them to work with management to effect longer-term results.

When K.K.R. adds a new company to its portfolio now, executives at the firm, in the spirit of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's first 100 days in office, outline a 100-day game plan that sets specific targets to be met for each of the 100 days.

Mr. Kravis, a billionaire several times over, still has the drive to succeed that pushes all business titans. But, in Mr. Kravis's own words, he also is driven by a deeper anxiety. "It's the fear of failure," he said in the Academy of Achievement interview. "Of not wanting to fail. That makes people as great as they are. I know that's what pushes me, a lot."

Tribune Mulls Revamp As Auction Founders (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Despite considering a late-breaking bid from Chicago real-estate magnate Sam Zell, Tribune Co.'s board is inching closer to a "self-help" restructuring deal it will implement on its own, say people familiar with the situation.

The board met with its advisers Saturday for an update on the five-month-old auction. Unlike the past couple of board meetings, it issued no statement afterward. Tribune -- which owns the Los Angeles Times, the Chicago Tribune and 23 television stations -- has promised shareholders a resolution of the auction by March 31.

Mr. Zell's offer to take the company private emerged after the deadline for offers last month. People familiar with the situation noted that his proposal is structured in a way that would take time to implement, a strike against it for executives.

Mr. Zell didn't return a phone call seeking comment.

The board's preferred plan continues to be a recapitalization involving a spinoff of Tribune's TV stations and the payment of a big dividend to shareholders. Such a plan could involve buying out part of the 20% stake in Tribune held by the Chandler family, the company's biggest shareholder and the instigator for the sale process last year.

One option under consideration is for the Robert R. McCormick Tribune Foundation, the company's second biggest shareholder, to use part of the money it would get in the dividend payout to buy out part of the Chandler stake, according to people familiar with the matter. Such a deal is possible because the foundation has strong ties to Tribune management. Its board includes three current Tribune executives -- who have recused themselves from voting on the charity's shares in the sale process -- and two former executives. The foundation and a related charity own about 14% of Tribune.

Sale of part of the Chandlers' stake could cost the family its three board seats.

Tribune fielded offers for months before opting to explore a self-help deal. The company on Friday said its January revenue fell 5% from a year earlier to $442 million, mainly due to weakness in newspaper advertising. The January numbers, which the company presented to potential bidders weeks ago, pushed Tribune's management to lower its internal projections for the full year, according to people familiar with the matter.

Tribune Considering Late Offer From Real Estate Magnate (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

The Tribune Company, in discussions about its future, is weighing a proposal from Sam Zell, the Chicago real estate maverick and billionaire who sold his huge office development company this month for $39 billion in the biggest leveraged buyout ever.

A special committee of Tribune board members was close to settling on an internal overhaul when Mr. Zell made a last-minute entry into the discussions, people close to the situation said.

His bid for Tribune all but eliminates other offers — including one from the Los Angeles billionaires Ronald Burkle and Eli Broad — from consideration.

Mr. Zell, 66, has never owned a major media property, but gained the nickname the “Grave Dancer” for his ability to spot and exploit undervalued properties in the real estate business.

His proposal would involve buying the entire company with the participation of an employee stock ownership plan, these people said. Although the deal would be highly leveraged, the employee stock plans have many tax advantages, including the ability to write off interest on debt.

Tribune has received two other bids, but considered both inadequate and has been putting together what it called a self-help plan in which it would spin off its two dozen broadcast outlets, keep most if not all of its 11 newspapers, and borrow money to pay shareholders a large dividend.

It has also been considering ways to buy out the Chandler family, the company’s biggest shareholder, possibly with the help of the McCormick Tribune Foundation, the second largest.

The Tribune Company declined to comment yesterday.

The board committee is taking Mr. Zell seriously enough that it has slowed its deliberations, which continued over the weekend, to explore his proposals further. It intends to reach a decision no later than the end of March.

Tribune’s newspapers include The Los Angeles Times, which is the nation’s fourth-largest paper, as well as The Chicago Tribune, The Baltimore Sun and Newsday.

It is not clear how the newspapers might change if Mr. Zell had a controlling stake in them. He told The Chicago Tribune last month that “there is no difference” between running a newspaper and managing any other for-profit business.

The Chicago Tribune first reported Mr. Zell’s interest this month. It also reported that the Tribune Company was exploring selling its newspapers in Stamford and Greenwich, Conn., to Gannett, the nation’s biggest newspaper company, and might consider selling the Chicago Cubs baseball team.

Mr. Zell sold his Equity Office Properties Trust, the biggest office landlord in the United States, to the Blackstone Group in an auction on Feb. 9. He proved a cagey negotiator. When Blackstone first approached him, he said he was not interested and dismissed its approach as a flirtation. Months later, he accepted it, saying he did so because it was all cash and higher than he expected. He made almost $1 billion from the sale.

Of the two other bids, one came from the Chandlers, who proposed taking the company private in a deal that valued Tribune at $7.6 billion, or $31.70 a share. The second was from Mr. Broad and Mr. Burkle, valuing it at $34 a share. A third bid from the Carlyle Group, just for the broadcast stations, has been dismissed.

Zell Joins Auction To Buy Tribune (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin And James Politi

Financial Times, February 26, 2007

Sam Zell, the Chicago billionaire, has entered the frame for the Tribune auction, making a proposal for the media group ahead of a weekend board meeting, according to people familiar with the matter.

The value of Mr Zell's offer was not known, although these people suggested that the company's advisers were initially sceptical that it would outweigh the merits of a company-led restructuring. Tribune and Mr Zell could not be reached for comment.

Tribune, which owns 23 television stations as well as the Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune and other papers, put itself up for sale last year under pressure from one of its largest shareholders. So far, the sale has drawn scant interest, forcing Tribune's board to push back their self-imposed deadline to the end of the first quarter, and highlighting investors' concerns about the future of the newspaper business.

Until Mr Zell, a real estate mogul, stepped in, Tribune had been weighing a combined offer from two billionaires, Eli Broad and Ron Burkle, and one from the Chandler family, which had originally pressed for the company's break-up. Neither, however, represented a premium to Tribune investors.

As a result, Tribune officials were leaning toward a "self-help plan," according to people familiar with the matter, in which the company would be split into newspaper and broadcasting divisions and offer investors a dividend. The downside of the plan is that it would add to the company's debt load, and could limit its financial flexibility.

The Zell offer would include the participation of Tribune's employee share ownership plan, according to reports in the Chicago Tribune and Los Angeles Times, allowing the bidders to take advantage of special tax breaks associated with the plan.

XM's Mark On Northeast D.C. (WP)

By Thomas Heath, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Fate of Headquarters Uncertain if Sirius Merger Goes Through

XM Satellite Radio chief executive Hugh Panero and his top engineer were exploring an abandoned printing plant in Northeast Washington back in 1999, looking for a home for their growing space-age radio company.

"This is the greatest place I can imagine," Panero recalled saying to himself, noting its spacious rooms and 20-foot ceilings. Not even the spent bullets strewn across the roof dissuaded him, he said last week -- though the engineer, a retired Air Force brigadier general, "thought I was nuts."

XM bought the building. The company invested $70 million in high-tech and aerospace hardware. And as it grew into a $4.3 billion enterprise that today employs more than 700 people, it helped turn the area around New York and Florida avenues NE from a strip of boarded-up buildings into a growing commercial center with a Metro stop, office and condo space and the future headquarters of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

But XM itself has been on a wild ride, losing more than $3 billion over the past seven years. Its stock, which had rocketed from $2 to nearly $40 a share , closed at $15.10 Friday, four days after the company announced its plan to merge with its New York-based rival, Sirius Satellite Radio.

The $13 billion deal is far from a lock, because the companies will have to overcome antitrust regulatory hurdles. But inside XM and elsewhere in Washington there was concern that the District might lose a company that had added some cutting-edge glamour to a business community better known for its government contractors.

"That's been a feather in our cap that XM Satellite has made their headquarters in the District," said James J. Abdo, chief executive of Abdo Development, which has a big project about a mile up New York Avenue.

It was certainly a change for the neighborhood when the Allman Brothers crew unloaded a couple of semis full of equipment into the XM Performance Theater, where the band spent three days re-recording its classic "Eat a Peach" album for a show called "Then . . . Again . . . Live." Jethro Tull did the same thing with "Aqualung." Janet Jackson stopped by on a publicity tour and talked for four hours on various shows. Tori Amos and Ludacris came by.

Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin, who would run the merged company, said in an interview that XM's headquarters building is a valuable asset and that he might even expand its workforce. But there was an anxious mood last week in the XM hallways -- where dimly lit studios have names like XM Kids and Liquid Metal, and the conference rooms are labeled Sinatra, Springsteen and Hendrix.

"There are definitely people who are nervous," said programming director Billy Zero. "Without a doubt, there's going to be some overlap. I'm a creative guy. I'm an innovator. Hopefully, I will be part of that team. That's what it's going to be about -- pulling the most creative and innovative people onto the next leg of this tour."

Scott Walterman, director of news programming, said he worried that most of the operation would be shifted to New York.

"I've done Manhattan when I was younger," said Walterman, 48, who has been with XM since 2001. But, he added, "you do what you've got to do and go where you've got to go at the end of the day. Nobody knows how everything is going to play out."

Like many of his colleagues, he's uneasy about the idea of merging with a longtime rival. "It's kind of like the collapse of the Berlin Wall," Walterman said. "You fight an enemy for six years and now you are allied with them."

"It might take us a few more days to get on the bandwagon and huzzah," said Bob Edwards, the former National Public Radio mainstay who hosts an XM show weekday mornings. People are in "a period of adjustment because we've been in this toe-to-toe battle with these guys, and now we're brothers and sisters. If it helps the company and saves satellite radio and makes it viable, then we're all for it. It's already helped my stock."

XM has been a Washington company since 1998, when founder Gary Parsons purchased one of two available satellite-radio spectrum licenses from the Federal Communications Commission and subleased space at 23rd and M Streets NW to be near the FCC and Capitol Hill. He recruited Panero, 51, who was working for a start-up pay-per-view network in Colorado, soon after.

They started shopping their idea for a subscription radio service to investors such as General Motors, which put up $75 million. The company initially raised $250 million.

"I turned down the investment several times because the whole proposition seemed like a long shot," said Mark D. Ein, a Washington venture capitalist who later signed on as an investor. "But Hugh sold his vision, and his vision became true. It's one of the great business success stories in Washington ever."

By the time XM went public in 1999, it needed a headquarters. "We wanted to be easily accessible to the bands touring the East Coast," said XM spokesman Chance Patterson, who was a consultant to XM for the accounting firm KPMG at the time. "It seemed like a stretch that Paul McCartney or P. Diddy would want to hang out near Dulles," where AOL and other tech firms are located.

They found the abandoned building that had been home to Judd & Detweiler, the master printers who for decades produced National Geographic magazine. The corner of Florida and New York avenues was minutes from Interstate 95, and not far from downtown D.C. nightclubs and the Verizon Center, so entertainers could swing by after performances.

Panero liked the idea that a Metro stop was planned nearby. He loved the building's red-brick, retro look, which reminded him of the homes of other start-ups. And he took into account the fact that if the neighborhood improved, so would the value of XM's headquarters. (The building is fully paid for.)

Mayor Anthony A. Williams heard about XM and saw a chance to bring an entirely new industry to a blighted area. He offered a package of tax breaks to save XM millions of dollars and help seal the deal.

"I viewed it as . . . a kind of iconic, symbolic statement that convinces people that an area is turning around," Williams said. "It was a signature investment."

"They have really helped to transform that neighborhood," said Barbara B. Lang, president of the D.C. Chamber of Commerce.

Panero, who will not be part of the company if the merger goes through, said no decisions have been made regarding management and responsibilities after the companies combine, but he said he expected there would still be a strong presence in Washington.

"What has been said is we have to continue to run the company as separate companies until the merger is closed," Panero said. "When it closes, the plan is to take advantage of great talent that exists in both companies. Clearly, there will be redundancies. But these are growth companies."

In Brief (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

As leaders at the state level decided much more needs to be done to address climate change, five Western states -- California, Arizona, New Mexico, Oregon and Washington -- will announce at the National Governors Association annual winter meeting today a regional strategy to reduce global-warming emissions. State leaders will sign a memorandum of understanding that commits them to pursue clean-energy technology and market-based solutions toward greenhouse-gas emissions. The governors there are following New York and New England states, which established a regional compact to restricting power-plant emissions in their region.

British Growth Augurs Rate Rise

Britain's economy grew at its fastest pace in more than two years in the final quarter of 2006, reinforcing expectations that the Bank of England will need to raise interest rates again. Strong consumer spending helped the economy to grow by 0.8% quarter on quarter in October-December, data from the Office of National Statistics showed, marking the highest quarterly growth rate since April-June 2004. In year-on-year terms, GDP growth stood at 3%, its highest rate since the third quarter of 2004. Business investment expanded 11.1% in annual terms -- its highest growth since 1998.

China Polices Securities Market

China has set up a top-level task force to clamp down on illegal activities in the securities market, a government report said. The committee will formulate and interpret rules to crack down on illicit activities in the industry and help related agencies pursue suspected crimes, according to the report on the central government's Web site.

Investigator Sends Bonds Letter Urging Cooperation (SFC)

By Mark Fainaru-Wada And Lance Williams, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, February 26, 2007

But player can't comply with Mitchell's request, lawyer says

Major League Baseball's top steroids investigator has urged Giants star Barry Bonds and other players tied to the BALCO drug scandal to submit to interviews and turn over their medical records, The Chronicle has learned.

But Bonds' lawyer said Sunday that the Giants star cannot cooperate with baseball's steroids investigation as long as he remains the focus of a possible perjury indictment.

In a Feb. 1 letter, George Mitchell, the former U.S. Senate majority leader who is threatening that Congress may intervene if his investigation of performance-enhancing drug use in baseball is thwarted by lack of cooperation, urged Bonds and the other players to cooperate for the sake of the game.

"Nothing is more important than the integrity of the game of baseball," he wrote.

Copies of Mitchell's letter, which was read to The Chronicle by a person with knowledge of the investigation, were sent to Bonds, Detroit Tigers outfielder Gary Sheffield and other players.

Bonds, Sheffield and six other present and former players testified in 2003 before the federal grand jury that investigated the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid ring. The players were implicated in the use of BALCO's banned drugs, according to evidence in possession of federal investigators, but none was accused of a crime.

Mitchell's letters were accompanied by medical waiver forms that, if signed, would allow baseball investigators access to a player's past, current and future medical records.

Contacted for comment, Michael Rains, Bonds' lawyer, said he had told Mitchell that Bonds wanted to help but was unavailable as long as he faces possible indictment.

"I said, 'I'm sorry, but I have to give him that advice,' " Rains said.

For almost two years, federal authorities have been investigating whether Bonds testified falsely when he told the BALCO grand jury that he had never knowingly used banned drugs. As recently as November, then-U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan refused to comment on the status of the probe, Rains said.

Sheffield, who denied knowingly using steroids when he testified, also appears to be off-limits to Mitchell. His lawyer, Paula Canny, said she advised Sheffield that Mitchell's requests for information violate terms of baseball's labor contract.

"There are things more important than baseball -- like the integrity of collective bargaining agreements," she said.

Canny said "dozens" of players -- including many not connected with BALCO -- received letters, and she said that the players union also has written to Mitchell about his request. She declined to characterize the union's letter, and the union declined immediate comment.

Mitchell sent letters to the players two weeks after he warned baseball owners that the game "has a cloud over its head" because of the steroid scandal and faces a likely congressional investigation if its own probe of drugs in sports falls short.

Commissioner Bud Selig ordered the Mitchell investigation in March 2006, amid steroid concerns fueled by the BALCO scandal. But the probe stalled, in part because the players union advised players not to submit to questioning without a lawyer present, and in part because prosecutors in the BALCO case asked prospective witnesses not to talk to Mitchell and his legal team.

In his warning to owners, delivered Jan. 18 at a meeting in Phoenix, Mitchell cited another concern: He said some clubs were balking at providing his investigators with relevant documents.

Mitchell's letter to the players comes at a time when Bonds is set to resume his pursuit of Henry Aaron's career record for home runs -- and when a new federal prosecutor, acting U.S. Attorney Scott Schools, has taken charge of the Bonds perjury investigation.

In his grand jury testimony in 2003, Bonds denied knowingly using banned drugs. But federal investigators have significant evidence that Bonds had used steroids and other banned drugs for years, according to sources familiar with the BALCO case.

In 2005, a federal grand jury began investigating whether Bonds had lied under oath. Witnesses have included former Bonds girlfriend Kim Bell; former Giants trainer Stan Conte; Bonds orthopedist Dr. Arthur Ting; Harvey Shields, Bonds' stretching coach; Giants equipment manager Mike Murphy; and BALCO vice president James Valente, who pleaded guilty in the BALCO case.

Last summer, when the grand jury's term was about to expire, some prosecutors wanted to indict Bonds for perjury, according to two people with knowledge of the investigation who asked not to be quoted by name.

But Ryan, who had run the BALCO investigation since its beginning in 2002, wavered. At that point, according to the sources, officials from the Internal Revenue Service and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, agencies that had investigated BALCO, began lobbying the Justice Department in Washington in an unsuccessful attempt to push for an indictment.

Instead, the call was left to Ryan. He chose to transfer the perjury investigation to a new grand jury, while pressuring Bonds' former trainer, Greg Anderson, to testify. Anderson has been imprisoned for contempt of court since before Thanksgiving for refusing to cooperate.

If Schools, the new U.S. attorney, seeks an indictment of Bonds, the government's evidence of steroid use in baseball might become public in court proceedings -- and thus available to Mitchell. If the perjury investigation is dropped, Mitchell might get access to the prosecutor's witnesses and documents from the government itself.

Mitchell's letter was the second he has sent attempting to get information from players associated with BALCO. In April 2006, Mitchell asked players to provide him with an array of documents, including their drug test results and their phone and medical records dating back to 1998.

What Mitchell hasn't done, though, is request the kind of help the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency received from Congress in 2004. Then, fearful of drug cheats competing at the Summer Games in Athens, Congress subpoenaed BALCO documents from the Justice Department and gave them to USADA. The anti-doping agency used the documents to bring charges against four sprinters, including then-100-meter world record holder Tim Montgomery.

Rains, Bonds' lawyer, said he hopes the new U.S. attorney in San Francisco will bring a fresh eye to the BALCO case, now in its fourth year, and drop the investigation of Bonds. In the meantime, he said, he has filed Freedom of Information Act requests in an effort to learn how much money the federal government has spent investigating BALCO.

Five men pleaded guilty to drug charges in the case. BALCO founder Victor Conte received the stiffest sentence: four months in federal prison.

Charles Scheeler, a lawyer involved in the Mitchell investigation, didn't respond to a call requesting comment. Luke Macaulay, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco, declined comment.

Chronicle staff writer John Shea contributed to this report.

Ashtabula Druggy Goes To W. Va. Prison (ASB)

Ashtabula Star-Beacon, February 23, 2007

JEFFERSON - - Ashtabula County convicted drug dealer fugitive Thomas J. MacWilliams is headed to 12 years and seven months in federal prison after being sentenced Feb. 14 by U.S. District Court Judge Irene M. Keeley in Clarksburg, W.Va.

The 42-year-old MacWilliams fled Ashtabula County in 2005 after being convicted by Common Pleas Court Judge Gary Yost of drug-related conspiracy charges. Yost sentenced MacWilliams to four years in an Ohio prison, then released him for 30 days to get family affairs in order.

At the end of 30 days, MacWilliams failed to report to the Ashtabula County Sheriff's Department to begin his incarceration. He was reported to have fled to a remote section of West Virginia, according to investigators with Trumbull, Ashtabula, Geauga Law Enforcement Task Force (TAG).

A year-long search ended on May 7, 2006 when MacWilliams was apprehended by Harrison County drug task force officers in a remote area known as Hoot Owl Hollow in Burnsville, W.Va. TAG and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officials had received numerous tips on MacWillaims whereabouts, according to TAG task force commander Sgt. Jeff Orr.

West Virginia authorities arrested the former New Lyme Township resident, who was using several trailers to grow marijuana and distribute it. He was arrested along with a female companion.

Additional drug charges were filed against MacWilliams by Gilmer County and Harrison County law enforcement officials. He pleaded guilty to the West Virginia charges of aiding and abetting by using the trailers for marijuana cultivation, possession and distribution between Dec. 2005 to May 7, 2006.

Prior to his sentencing, MacWilliams was held in custody at the Harrison County jail in Clarksburg. The defendant was labeled a career offender by Keeley, who made it binding after learning about his past criminal history.

The Ashtabula County drug-related convictions ended up with a court forfeiture order seizing MacWilliams' assets. Seized were 900 pounds of marijuana, $76,400, five vehicles, two Harley-Davidson motorcycles, a Honda four-wheel all-terrain vehicle and a car wash.

MacWilliams is expected to be brought back to Ashtabula County as soon as legally possible, Orr said Wednesday.

"If he would have just stayed here and done his four years in an Ohio prison instead of fleeing; now he faces 19 to 20 years in prison. The grand jury also indicted him on escape charges," Orr said.

MacWilliams' original prison sentence from Yost may be tacked on consecutively or back-to-back, according to Orr. Keeley, in her sentence, requires MacWillaims to face three years of federal supervised release plus recommended him for the prison bureau's 500-hour substance abuse treatment program.

Cali Drug Cartel's Betrayer Tells His Story (LAT)

Miami — THE official end of the notorious Cali cocaine cartel came late last year here with little more commotion than the rap of a judge's gavel.

The Colombian drug lords Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 63, and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, 67, entered guilty pleas and were ushered off to federal prison for the next 30 years — no Miami Vice-like dramatics, no bodies riddled with gunfire in the manner of Medellin rival Pablo Escobar.

But behind the bloodless fall of the ruthless Orejuela brothers and collapse of their $7-billion-a-year empire lies a little-known story of daring and betrayal.

Aiding U.S. drug agents unexpectedly and at great risk was a senior cartel official, the head of security and intelligence for the syndicate. For years he had protected the bosses, their wives and children. Then, he crossed them.

"It was very risky, but I was trapped in a nightmare, in a totally corrupt environment. I had to escape," he explained.

Federal prosecutor Edward R. Ryan called the defection a shock and "a very personal betrayal" to the Cali bosses, leaving the man marked for death. He is still "No. 1 to be killed," Ryan said.

The man has lost much of what he once took for granted: his home, his country, his name, even his past.

From somewhere deep inside the federal witness protection program that harbors him and his family, he has shared pieces of his story in sporadic telephone conversations with a reporter.

"Obviously, I'm not looking for celebrity — it would jeopardize our safety," he told The Times. "But people should know what I know now. My story should start by saying, if you are invited into such an organization, stop — stop and run away.

"Don't think you can ever fully escape."

He used to be Jorge Salcedo.

THE wonkish, soft-spoken family man was an unlikely drug gang recruit. He held university degrees in mechanical engineering and industrial economics. He started his career designing forklifts and other machinery. Later he ran an oil recovery business.

His father was a retired Colombian army general and respected diplomatic figure. The son was an officer in the army reserves, but he regarded himself more as an engineer than a soldier. He became proficient in electronic surveillance, which increasingly drew him into counter-terrorism assignments.

His military service in the late 1980s coincided with one of Colombia's bloodiest periods.

Anti-government guerrilla groups unleashed waves of kidnappings that terrorized the nation. Some targeted the rich drug lords. At the same time, rival cocaine cartels were warring with one another, killing scores of police, judges, politicians and innocent bystanders.

Military leaders grew restless because of the security failings of an impotent and corrupt government and tried to fill the vacuum, sometimes taking military actions without approval from officials in Bogota, the capital.

Enter Salcedo. He was secretly dispatched to Europe by military leaders to assemble a team of mercenaries. In an unusual move largely financed by Medellin cartel bosses, he was to organize an off-the-books, paramilitary operation — an armed assault on a guerrilla mountain fortress called Casa Verde.

It was aborted at the last minute. However, word of Salcedo's role reached Cali, 185 miles southwest of Bogota. The drug bosses there, engaged at the time in a vicious feud with Escobar and the Medellin, summoned the 41-year-old engineer to visit.

"Some people in Cali want a word with you," Salcedo was told in a phone call in January 1989.

"I had to go. It was not an invitation I could refuse," he said. "In Colombia, even honest people have to deal with the cartels." The next morning, he caught the first Avianca flight to Cali.

THE compound of Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela filled a city block. In addition to living quarters, it contained a large swimming pool, a tennis court and half of a soccer field.

Salcedo was escorted to a wing of the residence that contained Miguel's offices — with marble floors, wood paneling, leather furniture, fine porcelain and four cartel dons who were waiting to see him.

Jose Santacruz Londono got right to the point. Pablo Escobar of Medellin was "a bandit … a criminal … a crazy guy" who was threatening to kill their wives and children. Miguel, the younger of the two Orejuela brothers, was even more direct: He wanted Escobar dead.

Escobar was the most powerful criminal in the world. The Cali brothers earlier had dispatched an unsuccessful hit squad to Medellin, 155 miles northwest of the capital. But it was the would-be assassins who ended up dead. All six of them. Another attempt with a massive car bomb succeeded only in injuring one of Escobar's children.

The Cali dons knew Salcedo had ties to mercenaries. They knew he helped plan the aborted raid on the guerrillas. They told him his skills were required to end Escobar's reign of terror and to help protect them and their families.

Thus was Salcedo drafted into the Cali cartel.

"I did not feel I was a criminal," Salcedo recalled. "I had been fighting against the guerrillas. Now I was against Pablo Escobar."

ALMOST immediately, Salcedo helped devise an assault on Escobar's Medellin compound.

Two heavily armed Hughes 500 helicopters, painted in the olive green of Colombia's national police, flew a 12-man team of Salcedo's mercenaries to a mountain staging area.

But descending through a cloud bank, one of the choppers hit a mountaintop. The pilot was killed. The attack had to be abandoned.

A second assault was planned, this time from a base in Panama. The mostly British mercenaries were in hotels for nearly two months awaiting orders to attack. Salcedo said they got bored and rowdy.

"It was difficult to keep these wild people quiet," he said. "They fought, they drank, they wanted women every day — they were like mad dogs."

Finally the raucous strangers attracted so much attention, including television news coverage, that Salcedo was forced to scrap yet another mission.

Meanwhile, Salcedo beefed up security for the Orejuela brothers and their extended families — a mother, four sisters, in-laws, wives and children.

"The families were huge. We had about 150 persons dedicated to caring for the safety of these people," Salcedo recalled.

Local police helped. Some were on the cartel payroll. Some regularly shared information with Salcedo.

"Miguel and Gilberto were able to corrupt anyone," he said. Finally, Escobar went to prison, where he continued to run his cartel and menace rivals from his cell. Salcedo was ordered to arrange an aerial bomb attack on Escobar's wing of the prison.

"It was an absurd idea. I told them it was unlikely to succeed. But Miguel said, 'Do your job,' " Salcedo recalled.

He traveled to El Salvador and, through a military contact, purchased four 500-pound bombs for about half a million dollars.

Waiting at a rural airstrip for the dawn arrival of a cargo plane from Cali to retrieve the illicit munitions, Salcedo was distressed to see an executive jet swoop out of the clouds. Its limited cargo space wasn't designed for bombs. Only three fit, stacked in the passenger cabin.

Local authorities closed in. The leftover bomb was abandoned. Salcedo barely escaped El Salvador and arrest before the botched pickup was exposed.

The episode drew international attention, and another assault plan was junked.

There was no turning back for Salcedo. The Colombian government now knew he had worked for the Cali cartel. And the Medellin gangs knew he was plotting to kill Escobar.

But in Cali, Salcedo found personal safety as he settled in to managing security for the Orejuela family.

"I had nothing to do with drugs. I told myself I was not one of them," he said.

SALCEDO had arrived in Cali just in time for a business boom. The early 1990s were, he said, the golden years for the cartel.

Business improved even more after December 1993, when Escobar died in a blaze of gunfire. The Medellin boss had escaped from prison, and from continuing Cali assassination plots, in 1992 only to be tracked down by national police 15 months later. Police were guided to his hide-out by radiophone signals. He and his bodyguard were gunned down as they tried to flee across the rooftops.

The Orejuela brothers promptly absorbed much of the Medellin cartel and ultimately controlled 80% of the international cocaine market. At its peak, the family ran what one U.S. Justice Department official told Congress was "the most prolific and successful criminal enterprise in history."

Then came the crackdown.

In Miami, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents targeted the Cali cartel's distribution organizations. Smuggling routes from Florida to Texas were compromised and had to be replaced. Key operatives were arrested and had to be bribed, or killed, to keep silent. Shipments of dope and money were lost.

In Bogota, the Clinton administration pressed Colombian political leaders to arrest major traffickers.

"Miguel was getting paranoid," Salcedo said. "He saw traitors everywhere."

Desperate for protection from what they feared most — extradition to the United States — the cartel bosses poured millions of dollars into the bank accounts of Colombian politicians. The new constitution included a no-extradition provision for native Colombians.

As U.S. prosecutor Ryan later would note, then "the bodies began to show up."

THE far-flung cartel was directed by Cali-based Colombians, but its operatives included many non-

Colombians susceptible to extradition. The "extraditables" came to be seen as security risks.

WITHIN a week of his first conversation with a U.S. agent, Salcedo faced his first life-threatening decision. He knew where Miguel would be in the morning. He had been summoned to the hide-out to give an impatient Miguel a detailed report.

"He wanted to know what I was doing" to complete the assassination of Pallomari. Instead of preparing his report, Salcedo called in federal police.

The raiding party that hit Miguel's door about dawn the next morning included two DEA agents and an elite search team under Gen. Jose Serrano, chief of the Colombian national police.

Inside the apartment they found … no one.

Many safe houses were known to conceal vaults built into the walls for magician-like escapes. The Bogota team listened, tapped on cement walls and floors, then pulled out power drills and bored into suspicious areas.

Across town, Salcedo's pager went off. Still no sign of Miguel, the agents told him. He sensed doubts about his information.

Salcedo insisted that the drug lord was there. He also directed the raiding party to a desk in one of the rooms. It had a thick top, he said, that concealed a secret compartment.

Searchers dismantled the desk. Its secret chamber gave up a trove of records that delighted Serrano — "30,000 checks, cartel payments to police, 150 politicians, reporters, everyone," Salcedo said.

The sensational evidence was rushed back to Bogota.

About that time, however, cartel-friendly police arrived at the search site. They noted the physical damage — broken desk and holes in the walls — and found that the search team lacked a proper warrant. Furthermore, the American drug agents were armed, a violation of Colombian law.

Under threat of arrest, the U.S. agents and Serrano's team abandoned their search for Miguel Orejuela.

Salcedo soon learned of "the horrible situation."

On a cartel radiophone he overheard a call between Miguel and his son, William. The drug boss had just been rescued from an escape vault with the help of a local police captain.

He had emerged bleeding, an angry, wounded bear, apparently injured by one of the power drills.

Listening in on the phone conversation as Miguel reported to his son the details of his ordeal, Salcedo's only thought:

"What a nightmare. I am dead."

SALCEDO was a prime suspect, one of only five to 10 people who knew where Miguel had been hiding.

The American DEA agents insisted on taking him into protective custody immediately. But Salcedo refused, knowing that more time was needed to evacuate his extended family from Colombia.

"I decided to play on the fact that I might not be discovered," Salcedo said. "I immediately started investigating the leak."

The ploy seemed to deflect suspicion. It bought time. Salcedo used it to help steer accountant Pallomari toward the DEA. He also helped agents raid a cartel bomb-making site and a weapons storage warehouse with hundreds of machine guns.

"The risk was so incredible," Agent Kacerosky said in testimony. "I had to advise him to be [more] careful."

Salcedo and his U.S. handlers arranged to meet in a rural area outside Cali.

"If I was seen talking to an American, I would be killed," he said. "So we always arranged our meetings in the woods. This time it was near a sugar cane plantation."

It was nearly dark. Salcedo in his silver Mazda sedan was joined on an isolated dirt road by two U.S. agents crammed into a small, rented car.

"It should have been the perfect lonely place," Salcedo said. But suddenly police surrounded them. By unnerving coincidence, they were looking for the killer of a taxi driver.

The police demanded identity papers and prepared to search their cars. Salcedo knew that if the DEA agents were identified, their case would be blown and his life would be in even more jeopardy.

He took the police aside and pulled out 500 pesos.

"What are you doing in the middle of a cane field?" one officer inquired. Salcedo said he responded:

"Don't ask — just take this and go."

When they pressed for information, Salcedo told them: "We are homosexuals. They are foreigners and will be very embarrassed by any questions."

The policemen took the 500 pesos and drove off.

FROM mid-July into August 1995, Salcedo continued to play a dual role — the man in charge of security for Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, and his secret betrayer.

He stayed close to Miguel and his family, at every opportunity sharing car rides and meeting with them alone to let his vulnerability erode suspicions.

The family became most concerned about accountant Pallomari. In the wrong hands, his extensive records of bribes and business dealings posed a greater threat to operations than the inconvenience of the brothers spending a few years of lavish confinement in a Colombian jail. Salcedo feigned progress toward setting up an assassination.

A police raid was scheduled one night to arrest Pallomari at a hiding place. An incident also was arranged so he would inexplicably die in custody.

That night, Salcedo arrived just ahead of the police. He told Pallomari he was about to be arrested and would die in jail. Though Pallomari did not trust Cali's chief of security, the fearful accountant went along to another hide-out.

"How did you know where to find me?" Pallomari asked the next day.

"I said, 'Guillermo, I've been taking care of you a lot.' "

But Salcedo's ability to protect Pallomari and himself was nearly exhausted. Then he got another opportunity and called his DEA contacts in Bogota.

AT dawn on a Sunday in August, four weeks after the failed raid that left Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela wounded, another police strike team arrived outside an apartment building in Cali.

Accompanied by two U.S. agents, the 15-man team of Colombian national police poured silently into the building.

Miguel heard them too late. He was arrested without incident in his underwear, scurrying for a vault in the wall.

Almost immediately, people began to disappear — Salcedo and his family, Pallomari — but this time it was into the custody and protection of U.S. authorities.

In the days that followed, the entire Cali cartel infrastructure was exposed. Within a few months, about 130 people were indicted. It was, Agent Kacerosky later would observe tersely, "historical."

Salcedo pleaded guilty in Miami to a single count of racketeering and, at an unusual sentencing hearing, was universally praised by agents and prosecutors who recommended unprecedented leniency. U.S. District Judge William Hoeveler agreed, noting Salcedo's "service rendered to this country" and actions that "saved the lives of a number of people."

But it was not the end of the Cali cartel.

As Colombian citizens, the Orejuela brothers could not be extradited to the United States. Though that law was repealed after the politicians behind it were exposed for taking bribes from the cartels, the brothers remained in Bogota's La Picota prison, beyond the reach of U.S. authorities.

Federal drug agents would have to prove that the cartel leaders continued to operate their smuggling empire from prison, after the extradition ban was lifted.

They did just that. Since then, the entire Cali cartel hierarchy has been extradited, thanks to Salcedo. For his service, the relocated Colombian received rewards of about $1.7 million.

But more than a decade after betraying his bosses, Salcedo's life remains in jeopardy.

"He has done an inestimable service to the U.S. and Colombia," said his lawyer, Robert F. Dunlap of Miami.

Ryan, the federal prosecutor, in a recent interview called Salcedo one of the country's "least-known heroes," one of the people most responsible "for bringing down the most powerful criminals in the world."

Ryan still marvels at Salcedo's contribution, saying he and federal agents thought at the time that the effort had no more than "a 1% chance to succeed."

He recalled: "You can't imagine just how alone this guy was — talking on phones that he knew were bugged … knowing so well how easily he could be compromised. He must have brass balls this big."

Miguel Orejuela was extradited to Florida in 2005, a year after Gilberto. Today, the brothers are serving what probably will be life terms in U.S. federal prison.

The former Jorge Salcedo remains in hiding — his location unknown even to his lawyer — somewhere in the United States.

About this story

Jorge Salcedo's contacts with The Times began with a handshake in Miami during a brief court appearance in October 1998. In the years since, he has made sporadic telephone calls to a Times reporter from undisclosed locations.

In telephone interviews ranging from a few minutes to more than an hour, he shared details of his role in the cartel and occasional frustrations with life in U.S. exile. Years passed between some of his calls.

The Times has no information about his whereabouts and no way to reach him. All contacts were by phone and were initiated by Salcedo.

This account is based on those interviews, corroborated by court records, sworn testimony and additional interviews with federal agents involved in the case.

Tommy Chong To Raise Money To Help 'Guru Of Ganja' Defend Himself At Federal Trial (AP)

AP, February 26, 2007

PIEDMONT, Calif. — Comedian Tommy Chong will help raise money to defend the self-proclaimed "Guru of Ganja," who is charged with growing hundreds of marijuana plants for a dispensary.

Chong, who starred with Cheech Marin in stoner movie classics "Up in Smoke" and "Nice Dreams," will appear at a $125-per-person event for Ed Rosenthal.

Rosenthal, 62, famed for his marijuana cultivation books and the "Ask Ed" column he wrote for High Times magazine, will host the event at his Piedmont home on March 4.

"The party will celebrate how far we've come in legalizing medical marijuana as well as provide me with the money I need to fund my current trial that is defending all of our rights," Rosenthal said.

Rosenthal, who's scheduled to appear in federal court March 19, estimates his trial and related expenses could cost more than $300,000.

Federal prosecutors accused Rosenthal of growing marijuana, laundering money and falsifying tax returns from October 2001 through February 2002.

In a post to his Web log, The Blog of Chong, on Saturday, Chong urged his readers to attend the benefit for Rosenthal and donate to his defense. "Ed is being dogged by the feds for his marijuana work with sick people," Chong wrote. "It is the feds who are sick."

Hells Angels Case Going To Trial (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, February 26, 2007

Jury selection begins today in a massive federal racketeering case being brought against current and former members of the Washington Nomads chapter of the Hells Angels.

Prosecutors allege that the Nomads' president and three others engaged in a long list of crimes, from murder, kidnapping and witness tampering to extortion, robbery and interstate trafficking of stolen Harley Davidson motorcycles, according to a 19-count indictment filed in the case.

The government intends to call 125 to 150 witnesses and take 10 weeks to present its case in U.S. District Court in Seattle, according to a pre-trial brief filed last week.

It is the latest in a string of racketeering cases that the Justice Department has brought against motorcycle gangs around the country in recent years, including a sweeping case filed against 26 members of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club in U.S. District Court in Seattle in June 2005.

George Wegers, the national president of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club, last May pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit racketeering. Wegers received a 20-month prison sentence in October, which included credit for time served.

Last week, two Hells Angels motorcycle-club members were sentenced to 12 to 30 months in Nevada state prison for their roles in a bloody brawl in 2002 with rival biker-gang members at Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino in southern Nevada that left two Hells Angels and a rival Mongol gang member dead.

The core charge in the upcoming Seattle trial, which is scheduled to begin next Monday, is that the Washington Nomads is a highly organized, criminal enterprise whose members are punishable under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) Act, which was created to prosecute organized-crime syndicates such as the Mafia.

The lead defendant in the case is Richard "Smilin' Rick" Fabel, who served as the president of the Washington Nomads and, for a time, as West Coast president of the Hells Angels.

Other defendants in the case are Joshua Binder and Rodney Rollness, who were both full-time members of the Washington Nomads until 2003, and Ricky Jenks, who is still a member.

Prosecutors allege a laundry list of crimes perpetrated by the four defendants between 1996 and 2006. "As an enterprise, the Washington Nomads Chapter engaged in acts of violence, including extortion, robbery, kidnapping, murder, threats of violence and witness tampering; interstate trafficking in stolen motor vehicles; and [vehicle identification number] switching," according to charging papers.

Murder allegation

The most serious allegation is that Rollness and Binder murdered Michael "Santa" Walsh during a party at the home of Paul Foster in Arlington on July 21, 2001.

Foster has been charged as an accessory to murder. U.S. District Court Judge Robert Lasnik has ordered that Foster be tried separately, beginning in June.

The government said it intends to call confidential informants who have claimed Rollness told them he and Binder killed Walsh because Walsh was falsely presenting himself as a member of the Hells Angels.

They also killed Walsh, the government alleges, so Binder could get his "Filthy Few" patch, which is allegedly given only to Hells Angels members who have committed a murder on behalf of the club.

Prosecutors had contemplated seeking the death penalty against Rollness and Binder for Walsh's murder but decided against it in September, after consultation with Justice Department headquarters.

The charges include three allegations of witness tampering by Rollness. The most recent allegedly occurred between Feb. 14, 2006, and May 1, 2006 — while Rollness was in federal custody awaiting trial. While in prison, according to prosecutors, Rollness used "intimidation, threats and corrupt persuasion" to influence or prevent the testimony of an unnamed witness relating to Walsh's murder.

Undercover infiltrator

Several of the other charges relate to the theft and trafficking of motorcycles, particularly Harley Davidsons, which Hells Angels are required to ride, according to prosecutors.

Prosecutors plan to bring five motorcycles into the courtroom to show as evidence to the jury.

An unusual sidelight to the case could come Tuesday, when a hearing is scheduled to determine whether testimony by expert witness Jay Dobyns, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, will be allowed. Dobyns, who went undercover to infiltrate a Hells Angels chapter in Arizona, is expected to testify about the internal workings of the Hells Angels and the club's processes, such as how it accepts new members and awards patches.

However, Dobyns in May filed a formal grievance with ATF alleging that the agency failed to protect him and ignored death threats against himself and his family, according to the Arizona Republic newspaper. Dobyns also said ATF spread false allegations that he was psychologically unfit for duty and a danger to himself and others.

Attorneys for Fabel requested, and received from the court, a copy of Dobyns' personnel file to evaluate his fitness as a witness.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrants Who Wire Money Get Help From The Fed (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Even as the federal government is starting to crack down on companies that hire illegal immigrants, it's been helping those same workers send money home, cheap.

Dubbed Directo a Mexico, the Federal Reserve-sponsored service allows customers without Social Security numbers to wire money through the Fed system to Mexico's central bank at little cost. In September, the Fed expanded the remittance program by allowing immigrants, legal or not, to open accounts at participating banks and credit unions in the U.S. or Mexico. About 27,000 transfers are made through the program each month.

The program has attracted the attention of conservative immigration activists and members of Congress, who say financial institutions shouldn't cater to illegal immigrants.

Rep. Brian P. Bilbray (R-Solana Beach), who chairs the congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, said Directo a Mexico and programs like it should be stopped and that banks that participate are "profiteering from illegal immigration."

Bilbray is also targeting Bank of America Corp., which this month announced plans to offer credit cards to immigrants without Social Security numbers, drawing complaints that the nation's largest retail bank was underwriting illegal immigration.

"It's illegal for a landlord to do it, it's illegal for an employer to do it and it should be illegal for financial institutions to do it," Bilbray said.

Bank of America has said that it complied fully with all banking and anti-terrorism laws governing customer identification, which permit the use of forms of ID other than Social Security numbers.

Bilbray said legislators are working on proposals that would prevent financial institutions such as the Fed and Bank of America from catering to illegal immigrants, and are calling on the Bush administration to address the issue.

Elizabeth McQuerry, an Atlanta-based assistant vice president for the Fed's retail payments office, said Directo a Mexico isn't breaking any laws. She said the program complies with the Patriot Act, the Bank Secrecy Act and other money laundering laws. Customers have to provide identification — a consular identification card or other picture ID — and banks regularly check the documents' authenticity, she said.

Fed staff developed the program with counterparts at Mexico's central bank after President Bush announced it with then-Mexican President Vicente Fox in 2003. About 150 banks and credit unions participate, including 20 in California, McQuerry said.

Directo a Mexico was intended for all Mexicans living in the U.S., but did not specifically exclude those here illegally. Only immigrants who are in the U.S. legally can get a Social Security number, but any Mexican national can get a consular ID, regardless of legal status.

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), an advocate of increased border security who has talked in the past of taxing illegal immigrants' remittances, said that while the Fed program may not be breaking any financial laws, "There is a law against aiding and abetting illegal aliens in this country."

Conservative groups are also pressing the government to stop or modify Directo a Mexico. The Washington-based legal group Judicial Watch, which claims 400,000 members, obtained a copy of a Fed presentation about Directo a Mexico in December and posted it on its website to show that the government was not only offering a subsidized service to illegals, but actively marketing and promoting it.

"This program undermines our nation's immigration laws and is a potential national security nightmare," Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton said in a statement at the time. "In the least, the Federal Reserve must limit this program to legal aliens and U.S. citizens only."

Ira Mehlman, the Los Angeles-based spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, said Directo a Mexico not only flouts immigration law, it hurts U.S. workers by draining money from the national economy.

"This is money earned by people who have come here illegally, often earned at the expense of other Americans and then taken out of the country and not spent here," Mehlman said.

His group, which claims 100,000 members, about 35,000 in California, believes the federal government should better regulate wire transfer companies rather than offer an alternative that "makes it easier and more attractive for people to come here and break the law."

Directo a Mexico supporters and economists dispute claims that it harms the U.S. economy, and say the program will actually help fight crime by encouraging people to use a legal, regulated money transfer service. They also say it may stem illegal immigration by making it easier and cheaper to wire money home, lessening the need for the sender's relatives to cross the border to earn a living.

Philip Martin, chair of the Comparative Immigration and Integration Program at UC Davis, said remittances sent to Mexico last year were just a fraction of the U.S. economy, $23 billion out of a gross domestic product of more than $13 trillion. And as businesses increasingly serve illegal immigrant customers, he said, it's in the country's best interest to monitor their activity through programs like the Fed's.

"If you don't allow people to use the banking system, the money will still go but it will build up a transfer infrastructure that terrorists can then use," Martin said.

Rep. Eliot L. Engel (D-N.Y.), who chairs the Western Hemisphere subcommittee of the House Committee on International Relations, plans to hold hearings about remittances, which he said need to be formally integrated into the U.S. banking system. "We should stop pretending that they're not there," he said.

Engel thinks the U.S. needs to standardize the remittance wire system, linking the Fed to foreign central banks so that people can transfer money, "without having to sneak around or do it on the sly."

"You cut down transaction costs, make it easier to do and it helps everybody," Engel said.

The Fed offers a competitive exchange rate and charges banks 67 cents for each wire transfer to Mexico. After banks add their own fees, it usually costs customers $2 to $5 per transfer, regardless of the amount sent.

Private wire services usually charge more, including surcharges for larger transfers and claiming the money in Mexico. The average cost of wiring $300 to Mexico from the U.S. was $10.40 last year, when 65.8 million of the transfers were made, according to a Bank of Mexico report.

McQuerry estimates Directo a Mexico saves its customers about $3.7 million annually.

Directo a Mexico proved popular at Mitchell Bank in Milwaukee, which remade itself as "Wisconsin's immigrant bank" during the past seven years to cater to an increasingly Mexican customer base. The bank offers the first two wire transfers free, then charges $2.50 for each additional wire, $4 for customers without accounts at the bank.

On average, customers make about 200 wire transfers totaling $200,000 each month, according to James Maloney, the bank's chairman. Maloney credits Directo a Mexico with attracting 10% to 15% more customers a month.

"We've really removed a lot of the banking barriers for the migrant community," he said.

New customers include Jose Chavez, 52, an accountant and real estate investor who immigrated to Milwaukee from Mexico illegally in 1983 and later became a citizen. Chavez opened an account at Mitchell Bank last year after he heard about Directo a Mexico, and used it to open one for his brother in his hometown in the state of Michoacan.

Every two weeks, Chavez wires $100 to his mother, saving about $8 a transfer, and he recommends the program to illegal immigrants. "They have a hard time establishing credit here, for obvious reasons," he said. "But the reality is they're here and they are not going anywhere"

Maloney has fielded criticism recently for serving illegal immigrants. But he defends Directo a Mexico, which he supplemented with mortgage loans that target immigrants.

"We find ourselves in a neighborhood that is heavily migrants. Our job is not to determine what other people's status is," Maloney said, any more than it's the responsibility of a grocery or department store. "These people live and work in our neighborhood. It's our job as a community bank to provide them services."

Mexican Wives Seek Ouster Of Husbands From U.S. (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

The women of Tecalpulco, Mexico, want the U.S. government to enforce its immigration laws because they want to force their husbands to come back home from working illegally in the United States.

They have created an English-language Web page where they identify themselves as the "wetback wives" and broadcast their pleas, both to their men and to the U.S. government.

"To the United States government -- close the border, send our men home to us, even if you must deport them (only treat them in a humane manner -- please do not hurt them)," it reads.

In poignant public messages to their husbands, the women talk about their children who feel abandoned, and worry that the men have forsaken their families for other women and for the American lifestyle.

"You said you were only going to Arizona to get money for our house, but now you have been away and did not come back when your sister got married," one woman writes to a man named Pedro. "Oh how I worry that you have another woman! Don't you love me? You told me you love me."

It's a stark reminder of an often forgotten voice in the U.S. immigration debate -- the wives, children, parents and villages left behind as millions of workers come to the U.S., many of them illegally. The plea also underscores the dual effects of migration on Mexico: Its economy needs American jobs as an outlet for workers, but determined, able-bodied workers get siphoned out of Mexico.

More than 10 million Mexican-born people, or nearly one out of every 10, was living in the United States in 2005. And as a percentage of the work force it's even higher: One in seven, or 14 percent, were here, according to the Migration Policy Institute. The institute said 77 percent of Mexican workers in the U.S. were younger than 45, and 70 percent were men.

Villages devoid of men between 20 and 50 are common in many parts of the country. The stories of single mothers struggling to raise their children are just as frequent.

The women of Tecalpulco have come up with one way to cope. They run an artists' cooperative to sell traditional-style jewelry, including through the Internet. The page where they make their personal pleas, www.artcamp.com.mx/venga/, is a part of their Web site.

One of the women writes to "Ruben" telling him their children haven't seen him in three years and ask where he is.

"I know we agreed you should try your fortune in the United States, but I didn't know that it would be so lonely and that you would be gone for such a long time, please return to us," she writes.

Mexican officials are aware of the social and economic consequences to their towns and villages. But businesses and government officials on both sides of the border also acknowledge a sort of grand bargain -- the U.S. gets cheap labor, while Mexico has an outlet for its unemployed, who in turn send cash back home.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon in December, while visiting Nogales on the U.S.-Mexico border, said his country needs more foreign investment to try to keep jobs at home.

"The generation of well-paid jobs is the only long lasting solution to the migration problem," he said, according to the Associated Press.

But for now, Mexico is also addicted to the influx of cash. In 2006, Mexican workers in the United States sent $23 billion back to their families in Mexico, an amount that rivals Mexico's foreign income from oil sales.

Steven Camarota, research director for the Center for Immigration Studies, which backs less immigration and a crackdown on illegal aliens, said the women's stories show that the huge migration flow is "very disruptive to the lives of those other countries."

He said it also proves that the men aren't fleeing poverty.

"These women would not be asking their husbands to come back if they themselves were starving," he said. "It's really more of people wanting more, a better life. It's perfectly understandable. But that's different than these people fleeing such desperation there's no way you could enforce the law."

Danville Dentist Sentenced To Prison In Tax Fraud Scheme (AP)

San Francisco (AP) -- A Danville dentist convicted of hiding $300,000 from the IRS in a secret offshore bank account has been sentenced to two years in prison, the Justice Department said.

Roy Albert Lewis was sentenced Friday in U.S. District Court for income tax evasion and conspiracy to defraud the government after being found guilty in August. Judge Susan Illston also ordered Lewis to participate in a mental health treatment program and perform 100 hours of community service.

Lewis' medical practice paid bogus expenses over a 10-year period to Denver-based Tower Executive Resources for items such as franchise, consulting, or management fees to generate huge tax deductions, according to the Justice Department.

Tower then allegedly funneled the money into the secret account, which Lewis controlled, authorities said.

In April 2005, two Tower promoters were convicted of conspiracy and assisting in the preparation of fraudulent tax returns after a trial in Denver.

Lewis' father, Leroy Albert Lewis, 72, an oral surgeon from Danville, is still awaiting trial on fraud and tax-evasion charges, according to prosecutors.

U.S. Softens Tax Increase For Some Expats (WSJ)

By Rob Wells And Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

A new Treasury Department notice affecting some Americans working abroad further chips away at a controversial tax increase enacted last May.

Accountants say it is too soon to gauge the precise impact on expatriates and employers, but business leaders say the move could provide significant relief in numerous cases.

The new Treasury notice "will ameliorate what had become a disincentive to put U.S. workers in jobs in some key locations around the world," says Kenneth Kies, managing director of Clark Consulting's Federal Policy Group in Washington.

The latest Treasury announcement, issued Friday, came after strong protests from business leaders about a Treasury Department notice in October. That notice offered some relief but didn't go nearly as far as business leaders had hoped. At issue are details of the May law, which raised taxes on many Americans working abroad, retroactive to the start of 2006.

Among those hit hard by the tax increase were upper-income Americans working in places with high housing costs and low taxes, such as Hong Kong and Singapore, and whose employers don't give them tax-protection packages. Along with the expats, many employers protested, noting the expense of providing such tax protection and arguing that the May law discouraged the hiring of Americans abroad.

Congressional staffers have estimated the tax increase will raise about $2.1 billion for the U.S. government over a decade.

Part of the complex May law limited the amount of housing costs some Americans working abroad may exclude or deduct on their U.S. income-tax returns. Critics of the Treasury's October notice said it didn't offer enough relief for Americans in some places, such as Moscow, and unjustifiably omitted important high-cost locations, such as Beijing and Shanghai.

Friday's revised notice, issued by Treasury and the Internal Revenue Service, increased the housing-expense limit in several places, including Moscow, Oslo and Hamilton, Bermuda. It included adjusted limits for 15 locations that weren't on the original list, including Beijing; Shanghai; Mumbai and New Delhi, India; Zurich; Taipei, Taiwan; and Jakarta, Indonesia. The new list also included Riyadh and Jidda in Saudi Arabia.

The tax impact of Friday's rules can vary widely from country to country.

The law signed by President Bush last May made major changes to the old law, under which Americans working abroad could exclude as much as $80,000 of their foreign-earned pay for 2006. Under the new law, that figure rose to $82,400 for 2006, but income above that now typically is subject to higher effective tax rates than before. The new law also greatly reduced the maximum amount of housing costs overseas workers could exclude or deduct.

Treasury and IRS officials say they are continuing to work on guidance for housing expenses for 2007.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House's Travel Rules Limited (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers have continued to take trips paid for by outside groups since the House voted last month to restrict who can pay for such travel.

House travel records show that 19 members since Jan. 5 have accepted airfare, meals and lodging from special interests, including groups that employ lobbyists. The records were compiled by the non-partisan PoliticalMoneyLine.

The trips demonstrate that lawmakers "are trying to see what they are going to get away with," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

In its first official act as it took control Jan. 4, the Democratic majority in the House pushed through rules on the way lawmakers do business with lobbyists. The changes, which take effect Thursday, were a response to corruption scandals such as those that sent former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and ex-California congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison.

The House also created exemptions to the rules, including allowing lawmakers to take overnight trips paid for by lobbyists and the companies that hire them and to accept travel expenses from organizations that don't hire lobbyists. Two-night trips also are allowed if members need extra time to get to and from an event. The Senate has approved similar exemptions that are not yet law.

Most of the travel reported by House members would be exempt from the rules because it was paid for by groups that don't hire lobbyists.

Five trips were sponsored by organizations that lobby Congress and would face greater scrutiny by the House ethics committee.

Rep. Cliff Stearns, R-Fla., and his wife, Joan, flew to Las Vegas at the expense of the Consumer Electronics Association, according to a disclosure report Stearns filed with the House. The technology industry group, which lobbies on issues such as trade, spent $1,970 on the Stearnses' trip. Stearns is the top Republican on a panel overseeing trade and consumer protection.

Stearns' trip on Jan. 6-9 would not be allowed under the new rules. Spokesman Paul Flusche said Stearns had been invited well before the House adopted the changes. Flusche said the trip was "an educational experience" that provides information so Stearns "can do his job better."

Michael Petricone, the association's lobbyist, defended the trip. "This is (lawmakers') best opportunity to have hands-on experience with these products that they are regulating," he said.

Petricone said a "handful" of other lawmakers attended the event. He declined to name them. Lawmakers have 30 days after a trip to file a report disclosing the sponsor, location and other details.

Brendan Daly, spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said the effective date of the travel rule was postponed to give the House ethics committee time to devise new guidelines.

Exemptions Still Allow Lawmakers Plenty Of Free Trips (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — One weekend in January, a dozen House members gathered at a luxury Miami hotel to learn more about health care issues.

The lawmakers assembled at the Mandarin Oriental, which boasts Biscayne Bay views and rooms starting at $469 a night. The trip, sponsored by the non-profit Alliance for Health Reform, is among the travel allowed under ethics rules that go into effect Thursday.

In passing the rules, intended to cut ties between lawmakers and lobbyists, top Democrats led by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi also agreed to exemptions that allow House members to continue taking trips to destinations such as Miami and San Juan, Puerto Rico.

The Miami trip — along with a gathering in San Juan last week sponsored by the Aspen Institute, a non-profit think tank — is allowed under an exemption that permits organizations that don't employ lobbyists to pick up the tab. Another exemption allows trips paid for by lobbyists and their employers as along as the trips last no more than two nights.

Since the House rules leave campaign-finance laws untouched, lobbyists and members of Congress also can spend days together on golfing and ski trips paid for by a third party, generally a political fundraising committee established by a lawmaker. Lobbyists can then write checks in support of lawmakers' fundraising committees.

A lobbying and ethics bill recently passed by the Senate has similar exemptions but is not yet law.

"The question this raises is whether very much has changed," said Ellen Miller, executive director of the Sunlight Foundation, a government watchdog group. "There are still ways for people who carry water for special interests to pay for travel."

Lawmakers long have traveled on the tab of special interests, including organizations that seek to influence legislation. PoliticalMoneyLine, a group that tracks congressional travel, has counted more than 7,500 such trips worth more than $21.5 million since 2000.

The new rules, however, still allow groups with ties to lobbyists to pay for trips by members of Congress that last for up to two nights. The travel must be approved by the House ethics committee and is restricted to activities such as a giving a speech or attending a forum.

Sponsors of such trips also will have to declare in writing that lobbyists won't accompany House members on the trip or play a big role in planning the event.

Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, took an overnight trip last month paid for by the American Farm Bureau, according to a report Peterson filed with the House. The bureau paid the $1,800 tab for him to speak at its annual meeting.

"There's nothing unethical about the trip," said Mary Kay Thatcher, the bureau's public policy director. "It's not like we took him to Hawaii and kept him there for five days."

Peterson did not respond to interview requests.

John Graham, who heads the American Society of Association Executives, takes credit for pushing the exemption for short trips. His 22,000-member group represents the CEOs of professional associations, from doctors to roofers.

Graham said his group began lobbying Pelosi's staff about this provision before the November election that gave Democrats control of the House. Graham said his group also pressed its case with House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland and Majority Whip James Clyburn of South Carolina.

Graham said he argued that a ban on travel would keep lawmakers from attending legitimate gatherings of professional groups such as those he represents, while still allowing lobbyists to participate in campaign-fundraising trips.

"As long as you were going to give a check to a member in the form of a fundraiser you could take them anywhere," he said. "That image is horrible."

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said several groups lobbied for the short trip exemption. Daly said the rules represent real change. "Not all travel is, by definition, wrong," he said. "The idea was to curb the abuses. We have done that."

Craig Holman, of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Public Citizen, said the rules are a "vast improvement" and called Pelosi's compromises "reasonable."

Under the rules, the trip to Miami passes muster because the health alliance doesn't hire lobbyists or use lobbyist money to pay for the conference. The Commonwealth Fund, a New York-based foundation, helped pay the bills.

Ed Howard, executive vice president of the Alliance for Health Reform, said the event was no vacation for House members. "We kept them working," he said.

George Burke, a spokesman for Rep. Carolyn McCarthy, D-N.Y., one of the House members on the trip, agreed: "It's not one of these trips where they go and lounge on the beach for three days."

More trips acceptable under the House exemptions occurred during the week-long Presidents Day recess, which ends today.

The Aspen Institute scheduled its four-day trip to San Juan last week for members of Congress to learn more about the No Child Left Behind education law. Former Iowa senator Dick Clark, who runs Aspen's congressional program, said 16 or 17 lawmakers were scheduled for the trip. He declined to name them.

Congress To Consider How Unions Organize (LAT)

By Joe Mathews

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Choose your weapon: cards or ballots?

It has become the central question in union organizing fights across the country: Will the employer recognize a union after a majority of its workers sign union cards? Or will the employer insist that its workers cast secret ballots in federally supervised elections?

These questions — of paper and power — move from the workplace to Congress this week, when the House is scheduled to cast the first vote in what could be a years-long legislative battle between the country's largest labor unions and most powerful business lobbies.

The stakes: deciding the manner in which Americans join unions.

The proposed Employee Free Choice Act would take from employers the right to decide whether to accept the signing of cards — generally called "card check" — or demand an election. Instead, a workplace could unionize if labor persuaded a majority of employees to sign cards — without an election of all employees.

"We're not free to organize the way we want to organize," said Glendale Hilton bartender Angela Reid, who has been active in union organizing at the hotel.

"We don't want to do an election. We want to vote the way we want to — give our cards back to our organizers and vote that way."

Reversed roles

For both sides, the battle represents something of a role reversal and offers a window on the important but odd details of labor law.

Unions and their political allies, which for 70 years championed the secret ballot for unionizing workers, are all but abandoning the election process, arguing that aggressive anti-union tactics by businesses make such elections too difficult and costly.

And business leaders, generally hostile to any government intervention in their companies, are preparing to spend millions to defend federal supervision of elections in which workers choose whether to unionize.

Without a vote, said Joe Herman, a lawyer who has long represented employers, "employees would lose their free choice on whether or not to become unionized."

"It's incredible verbal jujitsu to call this Employee Free Choice," Herman said. "It's Orwellian."

The House is expected to approve the legislation as soon as Thursday, but Senate prospects are less certain.

Even if the bill passes Congress, President Bush has pledged to veto it.

Labor leaders expect defeat this year but say theirs is a years-long strategy, designed to educate the public on the problems of secret ballots.

'That's the crunch'

Unions say that without a change in how workers join unions, the percentage of union-represented workers — fewer than 10% in the private sector — will continue its decline.

Through natural attrition and changes in the economy, labor loses about 500,000 members a year, said labor historian David Brody, a professor emeritus at UC Davis. Under secret ballots, the union movement produces fewer than 100,000 new members a year.

"They need a new process," Brody said. "That's the crunch right there."

Secret ballots were part of the National Labor Relations Act, passed in 1935. Advocates saw elections as a way to give workers a choice between "company unions," created by management, and more independent and adversarial unions.

The signing of union cards also has long been an integral part of how people join unions. Under the current law, unions organize by having workers sign cards. Some employers agree that if the cards are independently checked by a third party — a card check — they will automatically recognize the union without a secret ballot.

But under the law, employers can and often do insist on a secret ballot, which must be supervised by the federal National Labor Relations Board. If a majority votes to join the union, collective bargaining is supposed to begin.

Unions win three out of every five such elections, according to the board. But dozens of studies by labor, academic researchers and human rights groups have found that the rules for such elections favor employers.

Most companies faced with organizing campaigns hire consultants or lawyers who specialize in "union avoidance." By one estimate, the business of battling union organizing is a $4-billion industry.

Unions allege systematic attempts by companies to fire, discipline or intimidate workers who support a union. The balance of labor complaints about the election process focus on delays. Even when unions win, some companies delay contract talks or refuse to bargain collectively.

In response, many unions have tried to avoid elections. Before submitting signed union cards, they build campaigns to push employers to sign "card-check neutrality" deals to recognize the union without an election.

Such campaigns have been successful in Los Angeles. Security officers in office buildings around Los Angeles County are being organized under a neutrality agreement between Service Employees International Union, building owners and security contractors.

The most prominent ongoing labor dispute in Southern California — over a unionization drive at hotels near Los Angeles International Airport — is about a card check. The union seeking to organize, Unite Here, is demanding that hotels agree to a card check. The hotels want their workers to have a secret ballot.

Asked about the effect on hotel workers, Maria Elena Durazo, head of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, said, "I'm confident that if the Employee Free Choice were law, workers on Century Boulevard would now have better wages, family health insurance and a pension through a union contract."

Making their case

The nation's leading business lobbies and trade associations counter that problems with the system are relatively rare. More than 90% of secret ballots take place within 57 days.

Businesses have hired top political consultants for a campaign that portrays unions as hostile to democracy.

Congressional Republicans say that under a card check, some workers could see their workplace unionized without having a say.

They also suggest that their Democratic colleagues, some of whom previously supported secret ballots, have been intimidated by labor political power into supporting the Employee Free Choice measure.

Opponents of the legislation have circulated letters in which bill supporters — writing in the past in other contexts — have demanded secret ballot elections.

"I wish members of Congress could vote secret ballot when it comes to union issues," said Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), "because a whole lot of intimidation goes on."

Panels Seek Bigger Budgets For 110th (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton And John Mcardle

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

House committees are proving to be a little more ambitious, at least financially, than their Senate counterparts, according to budget requests submitted to the chambers' respective administrative panels. With most committees having turned in their requests, House panels are seeking an overall budget boost of 10.7 percent, nearly double the average Senate request of about 5 percent over funding provided during the 109th Congress.

So far, the leaders of 16 House committees had introduced funding resolutions, which cover the panels from January 2007 to January 2009 and include funding requirements for 2007 and 2008. (In most panel requests, funds are split evenly for each year.)

The ethics committee is seeking the biggest increase, a 42.6 percent boost in funds to $6.1 million from $4.3 million two years ago.

But that's still the lowest request any committee has submitted so far.

The panel that has requested the most money? That honor goes to Oversight and Government Reform, which is seeking an 11.6 percent increase, to $22.9 million from $20.5 million. Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) has made it clear in recent weeks he intends to increase the level of oversight done by the committee.

Per tradition, the Appropriations Committee writes and approves its own budget. Energy and Commerce, Intelligence, Rules, and House Administration had yet to introduce their budget resolutions as of last week.

A new panel that is expected to study climate change is still being formed and also has not introduced a funding resolution.

Spokesmen for the Energy, House Administration and Rules committees said their funding resolutions should be forthcoming.

House Administration is in charge of approving committee funds and normally holds hearings on requests. The committee has not yet scheduled a hearing on the matter, spokeswoman Janice Crump confirmed Friday.

In the past, the funding resolutions are viewed as "wish lists" for the committees, and the final budgets often are pared down. In 2005, the House panels asked for a 17 percent increase in funding but ended up with 10.1 percent.

The only panel not seeking an increase this session is the House Budget Committee, which is requesting about $12 million. But others asked for fairly significant funding boosts.

Armed Services is seeking $15.5 million, a 20.6 percent increase from the previous session's $12.8 million. The Homeland Security Committee, meanwhile, requested $16.5 million, a 17.9 percent boost from $14 million two years ago.

But a Homeland Security aide said those numbers are a bit misleading, as the committee is asking for about a 3 percent increase in 2007 from 2006, to $8.1 million from $7.9 million.

That is because in 2005, when the 109th session committee budgets were approved, Homeland Security had just become a permanent panel and required a bit more funding.

On the Senate side, the Rules and Administration Committee will meet Wednesday to hold a markup for the 110th Congress omnibus committee funding resolution, which provides funds for 18 of the chamber's 20 committees. (The Appropriations and Ethics committee budgets are not included in the bill.)

Most Senate committee budget requests this year kept to guidelines established in January that allowed additional money only for administrative expenses.

Over the course of the 110th Congress, the additional money works out to about a 5 percent increase over the funding provided during the 109th. That increase is primarily to fund cost-of-living adjustments for staffers, provided that such COLAs are approved each fiscal year.

But three Senate committee requests came in above guideline levels. The Foreign Relations Committee is requesting an increase that works out to about 11.8 percent over what it was provided during the 109th Congress; Intelligence, 9.2 percent; Finance, 11.3 percent.

Leaders for each of those committees went before the Rules panel prior to the Presidents Day recess to make their cases.

Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and ranking member Dick Lugar (R-Ind.) noted in a joint letter to Rules that they were seeking additional money this year because the size and workload of their committee has expanded and because during the 109th Congress the Rules panel had granted the committee additional money from a special reserve held for such uses. This Congress, Foreign Relations is hoping to have that additional funding be permanently added to its budget so as not to have to dip into the special reserve again.

The Intelligence Committee sought to justify its funding request by pointing out that the COLA provided for high-level staff salaries is not adequate to compete in the marketplace when it comes to attracting, retaining and compensating qualified individuals. The Intelligence panel also is seeking additional funding to replace all of the laptop and workstation devices on the committee's unclassified network.

Finance is seeking its additional money to fund its subcommittees, which is something the committee did not do until it was mandated by Conference rules during the 109th Congress.

House Ethics Seeks 43% Boost (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

The House ethics committee has requested a $6.1 million operating budget for the 110th Congress, nearly a 43 percent increase from the previous Congress. If approved by the House Administration Committee, which has jurisdiction over all House committee budgets, the investigative panel will have doubled its funding since the 108th Congress, when it had a $3 million budget.

The request marks a dramatic increase in committee spending in recent years. Throughout most of the 1990s, the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct funding consistently hovered in the mid-$2 million range. In the 109th Congress, then-Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and then-ranking member Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.) asked for and received an operational budget of $4.2 million, a 40 percent increase.

At the time, Hastings outlined his intentions to use the funds to hire additional investigative staff, increase ethics education efforts, revamp the panel's Web site to make it more user-friendly and to reissue committee guidelines available to Members, staff and the public.

Those additional funds, however, largely went unused after Hastings and Mollohan deadlocked on a number of issues that left the panel inactive for several months during the 109th Congress, and Hastings was unsuccessful in achieving a number of those objectives.

Chairwoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) has indicated she would like to hire additional investigative staff. The panel also is taking on increased responsibility to vet and approve privately funded travel requests by Members and staff in the wake of new travel guidelines unveiled Feb. 20.

According to LegiStorm.com, a tracking service for Congressional staff salaries, the ethics panel had 12 staffers on the payroll in late 2006, including eight staff counsels. In early February, Jones hired one additional counsel, Dawn Kelly Mobley.

The panel on Feb. 16 requested a $3 million budget to be allocated in 2007, and $3.1 million for 2008. While the funding request, if approved, will double the budget in a little over three years, the ethics committee still has the smallest operational budget of all House committees.

Few Congressional Web Sites Make The Grade (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

The Senate is more Web savvy than the House, and Republicans are superior to Democrats when it comes to maintaining their Congressional sites — but, overall, the legislative branch is performing poorly, according to a report scheduled to be released today by the Congressional Management Foundation.

Working with experts from Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government, the University of California at Riverside and Ohio State University, the CMF studied 615 Congressional Web sites from April to August 2006. Only 85 sites — 14 percent — received an "A" compared with nearly 40 percent that received a "D" or "F" ranking.

The results show little improvement from 2003, the last time the foundation handed out similar awards, said Tim Hysom, the group's assistant director for communication and technology services.

"We're a little disappointed in what we found," Hysom said. "We would have hoped that in the meantime we would have seen Congressional Web sites escalate in the way that private industry, and even other government Web sites, have."

The CMF, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group that analyzes ways Congressional offices can be more efficient, has handed out the awards three times — 2002, 2003 and the current study, which looks at Member, committee and leadership Web sites in the 109th Congress. (Thus, many of the recipients have since left office, and freshman Members of the 110th were not included in the study.)

Past Gold Mouse winners fared particularly well this time around, as more than half of this year's best have won an award before.

The study ranks Web sites in five key areas: audience, content, usability, interactivity and innovation, which the CMF labels as the building blocks in Web site creation. Above all, offices that knew who their constituents are fared the best, Hysom said.

"They've clearly identified their audiences and who is visiting their Web sites," he said.

Researchers had thought geographic statistics would play into the results (some districts are more tech-savvy than others, for example) but that didn't turn out to be the case, Hysom said.

"It didn't matter whether your district was rural or urban, or the education level," Hysom added.

The awards are broken done into three categories: gold, silver and bronze. Gold winners received an "A+" mark, while silver received an "A" and bronze an "A-." Only 18 gold awards were handed out, compared with 27 silver and 40 bronze marks.

There are some interesting statistical findings in the report.

Researchers found a correlation between Web site grades and performance in the 2006 elections. Members who received less than 50 percent of the vote in the election had the highest percent of Web sites with an "F" rating. Oddly, those who received more than 55 percent of the vote had the highest percentage of "D" ratings.

Senate sites earned 8 percent more "A's" and "B's" than House sites. But the Senate also had more "F's" than the House — 18 percent compared with 12 percent. And while Member Web sites in the Senate fared better, House committees had higher marks.

As for the breakdown by party, Republicans fared far better than their Democratic colleagues. GOPers had 136 "A" or "B" rankings, compared with just 95 for Democrats. Republicans also had 6 percent more "C's" and 10 percent fewer "D's" and "F's" than the Democrats. The gap between the parties particularly is pronounced in the Senate, as Republicans earned 10 percent more "A's" and 15 percent more "B's." Republican committee sites also scored better.

But in the House, the proportions were fairly even, and while Republicans earned more awards overall, Democrats earned more gold awards — 11 compared with seven for the GOP.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) is one of three Members to win a Gold Mouse Award all three times it has been given out, along with Rep. Mike Honda (D-Calif.) and Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.).

Honda — who represents a district in California's tech-savvy Silicon Valley — offers a variety of extensive services for his constituents on his site, according to the report. In addition to regularly updating the site, he provides a number of extras, from podcasts to e-mail updates to a Google search.

"My entire staff contributes to provide constituents timely information on my legislative efforts, constituent services, as well as a list of district nonprofit and government resources," Honda said. "Because my district is so diverse, we provide information in several languages, including a Spanish newsletter. As the constituents of California's 15th Congressional district continue to lead America with their high-tech innovations, I will continue working to reflect that innovative spirit in my work in Congress."

Leahy excels on the Web because he clearly knows his audience, according to the report. He posts a range of targeted information and tries to reach constituents in various ways, from fancy methods such as online chats, podcasts, video and audio clips to maintaining a simple layout, the report reads.

"Al Gore may have been aiming for an Oscar this weekend, but I'll settle for a Gold Mouse," said Leahy, the second Senator to start a Web site and the first to blog.

It is interesting to note that Leahy is the only Senator who received a gold award (out of three) who is still serving in the chamber.

Republican Sens. Bill Frist (Tenn.) retired at the end of the 109th Congress, and Rick Santorum (Pa.) was not re-elected.

"Because of the timing of the release, a number of our winners are no longer serving in their respective chambers," Hysom said.

On the House side, 10 of the 11 gold winners remain in office. Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.), honored with a gold award for the first time, died two weeks ago following a battle with lung cancer.

Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.) said the awards are important because "constituents deserve both a personal and virtual connection with their elected representatives."

"I consider my Web site an extension of my office, where constituents have access not only to the information they need, but a direct line to my staff and to me," Becerra said.

Fellow recipient Rep. Brian Baird (D-Wash.) also said he was honored.

"With more and more people connected to the Internet, I recognized early on that my site needed to provide my constituents with information that would be easy to find, relevant and pertinent," he said.

In coming months, CMF researchers plan to begin a study of Web sites in the 110th Congress. The organization is hopeful that this year's study — along with an influx of possibly more tech-savvy freshmen — will push Congressional offices to up-the-ante on the Web, Hysom said.

Local Success, Federal Failure (USNEWS)

By Elizabeth Weiss Green

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

Since moving from Massachusetts to California, David Gerhard and his wife have made an effort to stay in touch with friends back East. They talk about their homes, their jobs, and another subject: fifth grade. Does your kid have to memorize times tables? Does he have to memorize all the states? What about long division? "We keep a monitor on it," Gerhard says. "Not hard data but to get a feel." Their constant concern: Will their children leave California schools as well educated as their kids' friends in Massachusetts?

The 2002 No Child Left Behind Act was supposed to help families like Gerhard's answer that question with a definitive "Yes." The federal law requires all states to draft standards-minimum expectations for each grade level-and to annually assess how well those standards are being met. But critics of the law argue that all the tests that have followed have not clarified matters at all. Every state administers a different test tied to different standards, and few of the state standards seem to match national ideas about what kids should know.

One size. So why not teach all kids the same things? Or try to make standards uniform? That's what Gerhard and, more important, a growing number of policymakers want to know. With hearings on No Child Left Behind starting in March, two top Senate Democrats have introduced legislation that would require the federal government to define the standards against which all states would be measured. Groups from the conservative Thomas B. Fordham Institute to the National Education Association, a teachers union, support the idea.

"Isn't it crazy that your child is learning different material and being held to a different standard than, say, your sister's children in another state?" asks Mike Petrilli, Fordham's vice president.

An existing test that should set this all straight-the National Assessment of Educational Progress or the so-called nation's report card-only muddles matters more. NAEP, created in 1964 to provide a snapshot of national academic performance, tests just a sample of students on a sample of questions; as a result, it cannot grade individual students or individual schools.

It can, however, cast doubt on other grades, often contradicting states' rosy reports. In 2003, states like Tennessee, Texas, and Mississippi reported that over 80 percent of their fourth graders were "proficient" or better in reading, yet fewer than 30 percent of their students scored proficient on the NAEP reading test. Thirty-two other states posted gaps of more than 30 percentage points. The latest data-presented last week-are just as dismal. One study, based on 2005 high school transcripts, showed impressive gains in state-reported grade-point averages and course loads. Another, based on 12th-grade NAEP scores in the same year, showed depressing stagnancy in actual test performance; less than one quarter of high school seniors scored proficient in math, and only 35 percent scored proficient in reading-down from 40 percent in 1992.

Critics say No Child Left Behind is the source of the problem. To avoid labeling hundreds of schools "failing," they say states have simply lowered the definition of proficient, or the "cut score," to ensure more schools make the grade. Indeed, a 2004 Missouri law mandated lower cut scores, and Arizona has lowered some of its scores, too.

Of course, grades are less important than the content they measure. But critics say the content is also too weak. A 2006 Fordham report grading the quality of the state standards awarded only three states A's; 26 got D's or F's. A major problem highlighted by Fordham: The "experts" drafted to write the standards were not highly educated in their disciplines.

Qualified standards writers can be hard to find-especially for a state on a tight deadline and trim budget. North Dakota had just 10 permanent staffers on standards and testing; on assessments, Montana's education agency had one. "She's the whole department," says Linda McCulloch, the state superintendent.

By contrast, the National Assessment Governing Board, which oversees NAEP, regularly revises standards with the help of dozens of experts. "As a [state] commissioner, you're really pretty much restricted to off-the-shelf tests," says Charles Smith, the former Tennessee education commissioner and now NAGB's executive director. There are not many states ... [that] could attract the kind of experts that we're able to attract." If the federal government were in charge, reformers say, states could design better tests and create more rigorous standards, with no additional funding.

This is not the first time national standards have been proposed. President Bill Clinton tried twice-first to draft standards and later to introduce a voluntary national test-but the ideas failed as opponents warned the test would force schools to teach a liberal national agenda condoning homosexuality and encouraging feminism and as states and municipalities resisted the loss of local control.

The double failure made a deep impression on Michael Cohen, a Clinton adviser. "What is conventionally thought of as national standards-that is, the federal government leads, it picks somebody to write them, and it puts it out there for states to use-I'm increasingly unconvinced that that's the way to get there," he says.

Bottom up. Cohen now believes the states must take the initiative. He is president of Achieve, a nonprofit that helps states improve their standards through a process far more intensive than simply accepting a list from the government. Instead, the states hold summits and solicit outside assistance; the proposed standards are then reviewed by an independent panel. Although each state conducts its own review, they tend to reach similar goals. "The real world is the same wherever you are," Cohen says. "So the states, by virtue of trying to create real-world anchors, are discovering their standards ought to be quite similar to each other."

Letting states write their own plans could produce even better results. Cheri Pierson Yecke, Florida's chancellor of K-12 schools, points to a new reading program that some California schools tested in the 1990s. The resulting lower test scores alarmed policymakers, and the program was scrapped. Because the program wasn't a national one, only some students had to suffer its poor results. "That's the beauty of local control," Yecke explains. "[It] gives us 50 different laboratories, so we'll know what we need to discard and what we need to embrace."

National standards would not necessarily disrupt those laboratories. Neither plan before Congress-one from Sen. Christopher Dodd and the other from Sen. Edward Kennedy-would force the states to adopt the standards the federal government would be required to write. But, if history is any guide, backlashes could result from whatever those standards turn out to be.

Magna Charters (WSJ)

By Nelson Smith

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

As he prepared to announce the Aspen Commission's recent recommendations for revamping the No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB), co-chair Tommy Thompson made a telling remark: "We have been much more successful at identifying struggling schools than we have been in actually turning them around." Regrettably, as with other mainstream groups that have weighed in on the NCLB, the commission's report focuses almost exclusively on fixing ailing schools rather than starting healthy new ones. Both tracks are needed.

The NCLB has laid bare the troubling gaps in student achievement among racial and socioeconomic groups, and it has spurred some improvement, particularly in the early grades. Yet its prescriptions for reform have provoked meager change in schools and systems that produce chronically weak results.

The law lets parents move kids to a higher performing public school -- but in many cities there simply aren't any better choices available. Using federal dollars for "supplemental services" can help -- but tutoring often takes place after students have spent the school day in learning-deprived classrooms.

The act's coup de grâce, after years of failure, is to require "restructuring" a dysfunctional school from scratch, through state takeover, contracting-out, or re-opening as a public charter school. But its impact has been stifled by legislative language allowing "any other" step as well. Districts and states have opted to switch principals, give pep talks and hire "turnaround specialists" instead of coming to terms with intractable failure.

Indeed, according to a recent analysis by SRI International for the U.S. Department of Education, only one of 12 states with Title I schools identified for restructuring as of 2004 had reopened a school as a public charter; one turned over operations to the state; two states replaced school staff and eight took no action.

Ironically, the best illustration of the NCLB's mission may be outside this whole "turnaround" apparatus, in the open sector of public education called charter schooling, where parents, teachers and entrepreneurs are creating new schools that are publicly accountable but independent of bureaucratic rules. Reporter Paul Tough recently wrote about three charter-school networks (Achievement First, the Knowledge Is Power Program (KIPP), and Uncommon Schools) for the New York Times magazine. Students attending these institutions made large learning gains despite years of educational neglect elsewhere.

Rather than cobbling together remediation strategies, these schools create an unyielding culture of high expectations, offer significantly longer learning time than traditional public schools, and organize everything (including personnel decisions) around evidence of student achievement. While these are superstars, dozens of independent studies show that public charter schools around the country are closing achievement gaps at a faster pace than their district counterparts.

Despite low participation rates for "official" NCLB-driven choice (less than 1% of those eligible to transfer, according to federal figures), more than a million families, disproportionately poor and minority, have sought out public charter schools on their own. Charters now educate 26% of all public school kids in Washington, D.C.; 28% in Dayton; and 18% in Detroit (and climbing since that city's recent teacher strike). According to our research, charters now account for more than 13% of public school enrollment in 19 jurisdictions.

By all means, the next No Child Left Behind Act should continue pushing to improve existing schools. But the reauthorized NCLB should also be an engine for creating new, high-quality schools in communities where they're most needed. Here's how:

Quality first. The federal Charter Schools Program, authorized in Title V of the NCLB, provides critically important seed funding for startups. It has been an important source of support, especially for small, community-based charters. Created with bipartisan support when only seven states had charter laws (there are 40 today), the program is due for an overhaul, placing more emphasis on funding the strongest startups and replicating top-quality charters.

Grants should be targeted toward places with high numbers of schools "in need of improvement." And states should be expected to promote and monitor quality like the best venture capitalists -- or lose the right to administer the grant program altogether.

The charter program has been flat-lined for four appropriations cycles; it's time to align funding levels with need. Related programs that support charter facilities should be reauthorized and put on a sound financial footing as well, since charter schools do not qualify for state capital programs and only 11 states offer any kind of compensation for facilities needs.

Bust caps. More money will be pointless unless artificial limits on charter growth are lifted in the 26 states that now have them. In some cases these "caps" directly pre-empt the intent of the NCLB. It's actually illegal to create a new charter school in New York State right now -- meaning that a mother desperate to pull her child out of a failing school in the South Bronx may simply have to wait until Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver has a change of heart about the state's limit of 100 public charter schools.

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings recently proposed reauthorization language permitting local officials to reopen a failing school as a charter even if it would exceed a state charter cap. The secretary's idea is on-target, but Congress should go her one better, permitting cap-free chartering wherever students lack suitable public schools. And the local school board should not be the only game in town. In states where universities and state boards can approve charter schools, they too should be able to override restrictive caps.

Add teeth. Persistently failing schools need fundamental change, not cosmetic touch-ups. Re-opening as a charter, with a proven academic model, new team and clear accountability for performance, can provide a fresh start. But to work, such "re-opened" charters must have independent governance with full autonomy over budgets, personnel and working conditions. That independence must be spelled out in the federal law, or else we risk creating a raft of so-called "charters" still tethered to the same central offices that let students down in the first place.

In its first five years, the NCLB has affirmed a national commitment to educational opportunity for all. In the next five years, it should do more to galvanize real change by ratcheting up its support of public charter schools. A vibrant new-schools sector is the best way to challenge the status quo and offer real promise of achievement for every American public-school student.

Welfare State Growing Despite Overhauls (AP)

By Stephen Ohlemacher, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 26, 2007

The welfare state is bigger than ever despite a decade of policies designed to wean poor people from public aid.

DOJ_NMG_0136344

The number of families receiving cash benefits from welfare has plummeted since the government imposed time limits on the payments a decade ago. But other programs for the poor, including Medicaid, food stamps and disability benefits, are bursting with new enrollees.

The result, according to an Associated Press analysis: Nearly one in six people rely on some form of public assistance, a larger share than at any time since the government started measuring two decades ago.

Critics of the welfare overhaul say the numbers offer fresh evidence that few former recipients have become self-sufficient, even though millions have moved from welfare to work. They say the vast majority have been forced into low-paying jobs without benefits and few opportunities to advance.

"If the goal of welfare reform was to get people off the welfare rolls, bravo," said Vivyan Adair, a former welfare recipient who is now an assistant professor of women's studies at Hamilton College in upstate New York. "If the goal was to reduce poverty and give people economic and job stability, it was not a success."

Proponents of the changes in welfare say programs that once discouraged work now offer support to people in low-paying jobs. They point to expanded eligibility rules for food stamps and Medicaid, the health insurance program for the poor, that enable people to keep getting benefits even after they start working.

"I don't have any problems with those programs growing, and indeed, they were intended to grow," said Ron Haskins, a former adviser to President Bush on welfare policy.

"We've taken the step of getting way more people into the labor force and they have taken a huge step toward self-sufficiency. What is the other choice?" he asked.

In the early 1990s, critics contended the welfare system encouraged unemployment and promoted single-parent families. Welfare recipients, mostly single mothers, could lose benefits if they earned too much money or if they lived with the father of their children.

Major changes in welfare were enacted in 1996, requiring most recipients to work but allowing them to continue some benefits after they started jobs. The law imposed a five-year limit on cash payments for most people in the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program, or TANF. Some states have shorter time limits.

Nia Foster fits the pattern of dependence on government programs. She stopped getting cash welfare payments in the late 1990s and has moved from one clerical job to another. None provided medical benefits.

The 32-year-old mother of two from Cincinnati said she supports her family with help from food stamps and Medicaid.

Foster said she did not get any job training when she left welfare. She earned her high-school equivalency last year at a community college.

"If you want to get educated or want to succeed, the welfare office don't care," Foster said. "I don't think they really care what you do once the benefits are gone."

Foster now works in a tax office, a seasonal job that will end after April 15. She hopes to enroll at the University of Cincinnati this spring and would like to study accounting. She is waiting to find out if she qualifies for enough financial aid to cover tuition.

"I like data processing, something where it's a bunch of invoices and you have to key them in," Foster said. "I want to be an accountant so bad."

Shannon Stanfield took a different, less-traveled path from welfare, thanks to a generous program that offered her a chance to get a college education.

Stanfield, 36, was cleaning houses to support her two young children four years ago when she learned about a program for welfare recipients at nearby Hamilton College, a private liberal arts school in Clinton, N.Y.

"At the time I was living in a pretty run-down apartment," said Stanfield, who was getting welfare payments, Medicaid and food stamps. "It wasn't healthy."

The program, called the Access Project, accepts about 25 welfare-eligible parents a year. Hamilton waives tuition for first-year students and the program supplements financial aid in later years. Students get a host of social and career services, including help finding internships and jobs and financial assistance in times of crisis.

About 140 former welfare recipients have completed the program and none still relies on government programs for the poor, said Adair, the Hamilton professor who started the Access Project in 2001.

Stanfield, who still gets Medicaid and food stamps, plans to graduate in May with a bachelor's degree in theater. She wants to be a teacher.

"I slowly built up my confidence through education," Stanfield said. "I can't honestly tell you how much it has changed my life."

Programs such as the Access Project are not cheap, which is one reason they are rare. Tuition and fees run about $35,000 a year at Hamilton, and the program's annual budget is between $250,000 and $500,000, Adair said.

DOJ_NMG_0136345

In 2005, about 5.1 million people received monthly welfare payments from TANF and similar state programs, a 60 percent drop from a decade before.

But other government programs grew, offsetting the declines.

About 44 million people — nearly one in six in the country — relied on government services for the poor in 2003, according to the most recent statistics compiled by the Census Bureau. That compares with about 39 million in 1996.

Also, the number of people getting government aid continues to increase, according to more recent enrollment figures from individual programs.

Medicaid rolls alone topped 45 million people in 2005, pushed up in part by rising health care costs and fewer employers offering benefits. Nearly 26 million people a month received food stamps that year.

Cash welfare recipients, by comparison, peaked at 14.2 million people in 1994.

There is much debate over whether those leaving welfare for work should be offered more opportunities for training and education, so they do not have to settle for low-paying jobs that keep them dependent on government programs.

"We said get a job, any job," said Rep. Jim McDermott, chairman of the House subcommittee that oversees welfare issues. "And now we expect them to be making it on these minimum-wage jobs."

McDermott, D-Wash., said stricter work requirements enacted last year, when Congress renewed the welfare overhaul law, will make it even more difficult for welfare recipients to get sufficient training to land good-paying jobs.

But people who support the welfare changes say former recipients often fare better economically if they start working, even in low-paying jobs, before entering education programs.

"What many people on TANF need first is the confidence that they can succeed in the workplace and to develop the habits of work," said Wade Horn, the Bush administration's point man on welfare overhaul.

"Also, many TANF recipients didn't have a lot of success in the classroom," Horn said. "If you want to improve the confidence of a TANF recipient, putting them in the classroom, where they failed in the past, that is not likely to increase their confidence."

Horn noted that employment among poor single mothers is up and child poverty rates are down since the welfare changes in 1996, though the numbers have worsened since the start of the decade.

Horn, however, said he would like to see local welfare agencies provide more education and training to people who have already moved from welfare to work.

"I think more attention has to be paid to helping those families move up the income scale, increasing their independence of other government welfare programs," Horn said.

"The true goal of welfare to work programs should be self-sufficiency."

GOP Is Abandoning Bush? Not Quite (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, February 26, 2007

The Washington punditocracy has proclaimed far and wide that Republicans, disenchanted with the war in Iraq, are abandoning President Bush in droves, leaving him the lamest of lame ducks. However, the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll suggests Bush might not be as wounded as he appears — at least not among his party faithful.

The Feb. 9-11 poll puts Bush's job approval at 37%, but among people who identify themselves as Republican or leaning Republican, his approval rating is 76%.

Thus, despite bad news from Baghdad and carefully crafted hand-wringing by high-profile GOP war critics in Congress such as Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, three of four Republicans in the country are hanging in there with the president.

The poll also shows that rank-and-file Republicans have higher regard for the president than they do Republicans in Congress. They gave GOP lawmakers a 63% job-approval rating, 13 points below Bush's. And 72% of Republicans do not think Bush made a mistake sending U.S. troops to Iraq.

So if congressional Republicans figure the key to re-election in 2008 is taking a hard line against Bush on Iraq, they could be dead wrong. They might lure some independents, but they risk alienating their GOP base. To win, you need solid support from your base plus independents, not independents alone.

Conventional wisdom also says the presidential ambitions of Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., could be derailed by his strong support for the war. This poll, however, shows that his stance could be a plus among the base.

What does this high approval among Republicans mean for Bush? It means that as long as his party support remains that strong, he won't fall below 30% approval, a depth that would virtually extinguish his political power. The lowest Bush has fallen is 31%, still enough to make him a significant, although wounded, force in legislative battles with the Democratic-controlled Congress.

The latest congressional skirmish over Iraq underscores the point. In the House's non-binding vote to oppose the president's deployment of more troops to Baghdad, 17 Republicans voted with 229 Democrats to pass the measure. Four GOP representatives didn't vote. Lost was the fact that 180 Republicans stuck with Bush. By that count, Bush gets a 92% loyalty standing among House Republicans who voted. Hardly a GOP exodus.

In the Senate, Democrats fell four votes short of the 60 needed to force a vote on an identical Iraq resolution. Why? Not enough Republicans would go along. Indeed, seven GOP senators broke with the president, and nine didn't vote, yet 33 held firm. Among GOP senators who voted, that's an 83% Republican loyalty rating for Bush.

Though the president may have lost the country on the issues of the day, rumors of his demise among Republicans voters and lawmakers are greatly exaggerated.

Chaplain Shortage Severe For Army (WT)

By Natasha Altamirano

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

The hardest part of Army Chaplain Lt. Col. Ran Dolinger's job is the long hours, which is partly why the Army Chaplain Corps now has about 520 vacancies, its most severe shortage in history.

"I go everywhere my troops go," said Col. Dolinger, who during his 21 years of service has been sent to Bosnia and Korea and whose most recent deployment to Iraq was from November to December last year.

The 48-year-old who also serves as pastor at the Fort Belvoir chapel and as spokesman for the U.S. Army's Office of the Chief of Chaplains in Arlington, calls his line of work "a blessed misery."

"When I see the atrocities of man toward man, it shows me the need for God," he said.

The Army Reserve and the Army National Guard have about 440 openings, while the Army has 80 vacancies. Col. Dolinger said it is more difficult to recruit chaplains into the reserves than into active duty.

"A lot of churches don't want their senior [chief executive officer] to be gone," he said. "They say one weekend a month, well, ministers are usually pretty busy then -- that's prime time. You can guarantee if a person comes into the reserves, in time they're going to be deployed."

The Army Chaplain Corps, which includes the Army, the Army Reserve and the Army National Guard, has about 2,600 chaplains and the most vacancies among the branches of the U.S. military, Col. Dolinger said.

The Navy Chaplain Corps, which has about 1,000 active-duty and reserve chaplains and serves the Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard and Merchant Marines, has 29 vacancies, a Navy spokesman said.

Information about the Air Force Chaplain Service was not available.

The Army Chaplain Corps always has assigned fewer positions than what the Department of Defense has authorized, but the current shortage is the most severe, said Chaplain Lt. Col. Ken Lawson of the U.S. Army Chaplain School at Fort Jackson, S.C.

Since the Revolutionary War, the number of chaplains has increased during times of conflict and decreased during times of peace until the numbers stabilized after the Vietnam War, Col. Lawson said.

The Army went from having hundreds of chaplains during the Revolutionary War to one between the war's end and the War of 1812, he said.

The Chief of Chaplains has the authority to transfer a chaplain from a unit stationed at home to one that is being deployed, said Chaplain Lt. Col. Ken Beale, who's in charge of chaplain recruitment for the Army and Army Reserve.

"We're grateful that our Chief of Chaplains is not going to allow our men and women of uniform to be in harm's way without the presence of a chaplain, but that means that our active-duty chaplains and existing reserve chaplains are being rotated 'into theater' more than might be desired," Col. Beale said, using a common term for deployment.

Chaplain candidates must meet the same physical requirements as other troops and must be endorsed by a recognized denomination or faith-based group.

They must be 21 to 42 years old and have a master's or seminary degree. Many seminarians, whether preparing for civilian ministry or the chaplaincy, are second-career students, which limits the pool of potential chaplains.

Despite the three-year shortage, the Army and the Army Reserve has celebrated two consecutive years of record-breaking chaplain recruitment, closing the gap between authorized and assigned positions, Col. Beale said.

The Army and the Army Reserve recruited an all-time high of 231 chaplains in fiscal 2005, and 291 recruits in fiscal 2006, he said.

"To have done that in the midst of the [Iraq] war -- a protracted war with no end in sight -- is rather remarkable," Col. Beale said. "I praise God that the Lord is calling these men and women to this form of ministry."

He credits the recent recruiting successes to post-September 11 patriotism.

To attract chaplains, the Army Reserve is offering $10,000 signing bonuses for first-time officers. The Army National Guard has similar incentives, such as student loan repayment and college scholarships.

The Army doesn't offer sign-up incentives since there isn't much of a shortage of active-duty chaplains.

Chaplain candidate Chris Dolinger, Col. Dolinger's nephew, felt called to the military as he watched news reports when the U.S. first went to war with Iraq in 2003. The 24-year-old was an undergraduate at Bethel College, an evangelical Christian school in Indiana.

"That's when I first felt like I could really go and make a difference," said Chris Dolinger, who is pursuing a master's degree from Liberty University in Lynchburg, Va. "I see a need in the Army especially for help and guidance and counseling. I'm hoping to offer that as an Army chaplain."

FCC May Try To Scrub Kids' TV (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal regulators appear to be turning more attention to a perennial concern: making sure television is safer for kids.

Last week, Spanish-language broadcaster Univision Communications Inc. agreed in principle to pay an unusually steep $24 million fine for violating the Children's Television Act, which requires broadcasters to show three hours of educational programming a week, Federal Communications Commission officials said. In exchange, the FCC will approve Univision's sale to a consortium of private-equity groups for $12.3 billion. Univision declined to comment on the proposed consent decree.

It's the largest fine assessed by the FCC against a company, far exceeding the $9 million fine slapped on Qwest Communications in 2004 for violating FCC rules and the $3.6 million indecency fine proposed against CBS and its affiliates last year for an episode of the crime drama "Without a Trace."

Broadcasters have long considered Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin an ally. Since becoming an FCC commissioner in 2001 he's been an advocate for some of their biggest priorities, including a requirement that cable companies carry more local channels once the U.S. shifts to digital-only broadcasts in 2009. The National Association of Broadcasters hope he'll torpedo a proposed merger of terrestrial radio's rivals XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.

But broadcasters are also increasingly finding themselves on the wrong side of Mr. Martin's FCC. Last year, the networks and affiliates took the unusual step of challenging several proposed indecency fines in federal court. More recently, the FCC has drafted a report suggesting Congress can expand the agency's reach to regulate violence on TV. Now, the FCC's unusually large fine against Univision appears to be part of a larger effort by the agency to make sure broadcasters are offering kid-friendly programming.

The $24-million fine was negotiated by Mr. Martin's staff, not the five-member FCC board. Several senior FCC officials, including at least one FCC commissioner, said they learned of the fine by reading the New York Times on Saturday.

Despite some discomfort about the unusually high amount of the fine, the full FCC board is likely to vote for it. It would be politically difficult for FCC members to vote against enforcing children's programming standards and the company has apparently agreed to pay the fine to clear the way for its sale.

Mr. Martin said the severity of the violation and the long time period in which children watching Univision, the largest Spanish-language broadcaster in the U.S., had no appropriate shows led him to propose the historic fine.

Providence Equity Partners Inc., one of the firms buying Univision, employs Michael Powell, a Republican and Mr. Martin's predecessor as FCC chairman, as a senior adviser. The two had a rocky relationship, prompting speculation it played a role in the stringent fine. "It wasn't a factor at all," Mr. Martin said. He said he didn't know Mr. Powell was involved in the deal.

"Across the board we're trying to protect consumers," said Mr. Martin, who pointed out the Univision fine follows previous efforts to ensure 911 service is available from all phones and newly proposed rules to protect the privacy of cellphone users. "I don't think I'm trying to send any particular message. The commission takes all of its rules seriously," he said.

But the fine also may go a long way toward placating Latino groups who've complained the FCC has ignored violations on Spanish-language stations, and some conservative Christians who've grumbled that Mr. Martin hasn't done enough to clean up the airwaves. "It boggles the mind that Univision would even attempt to present a soap opera as educational programming for children," said Janice Shaw Crouse, a former speechwriter for President George H.W. Bush, referring to company claims that figured in the fine. She currently is a senior fellow for the Concerned Women for America, a think tank devoted to bringing "Biblical principles into all levels of public policy," according to its Web site.

The new politics of Capitol Hill may also play a role. With Democrats controlling Congress, Mr. Martin is expected to begin making regular trips to Capitol Hill to explain his agency's actions. A greater emphasis by the FCC on trying to regulate violent television shows could help Mr. Martin with some leading Democrats, such as West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, an outspoken critic about the issue. The FCC's crackdown on Univision has already been applauded by Massachusetts Rep. Edward Markey, a Democrat who's often been critical of Mr. Martin. Mr. Markey helped write the federal requirements on children's television broadcasts years ago.

Univision was accused by watchdog groups of violating children's broadcast standards on 24 stations between 2004 and 2006 by claiming that "Complices al Rescate," a soap opera about 11-year-old identical twin girls, was educational. Several groups complained it wasn't.

Children's television advocates expressed shock at the size of the $24 million fine, since several complaints about inappropriate children's shows -- including the Univision soap opera -- had sat without action for upward of two years. The United Church of Christ, representing 1.3 million members and very active on educational broadcasting issues, became so frustrated it sent a letter to the FCC last September to complain. "We hope very much this is a sign that children's television will now be taken seriously by the agency," said Cheryl Leanza, a Church spokeswoman.

According to people familiar with the FCC consent decree, the company will offer a voluntary one-time payment of $24 million, but won't admit wrong-doing. Additionally, Univision will establish an advisory committee and appoint a compliance officer to ensure the network is meeting the FCC's children's programming requirements.

Policy Makers At Fed Rethink Inflation's Roots (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

For decades, a simple rule has governed how the Federal Reserve views the nation's economy: When unemployment falls too low, inflation goes up, and vice versa.

But Fed officials have rethought that notion. They believe it takes a far bigger change in unemployment to affect inflation today than it did 25 years ago. Now, when inflation fluctuates, they are far more likely to blame temporary factors, such as changes in oil prices or rents, than a change in the jobless rate.

One explanation for why inflation is influenced less by changes in unemployment is that the American public has come to expect inflation to remain stable. When inflation moves up or down, it is less likely to get stuck at the new level because companies and workers don't factor the change into their expectations -- or their behavior. Another explanation is that the Fed is better at adjusting interest rates in anticipation of swings in unemployment before those swings can affect inflation.

This new view of the economy, formed in recent years, helps explain why the Fed stopped raising interest rates last summer while core inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, was rising. And it helps explain why the Fed is reluctant to cut rates now even though it sees inflation edging lower over the next two years.

The new view "has profound implications," says former Fed economist Brian Sack, now at Macroeconomic Advisers, a St. Louis-based forecasting firm. That doesn't mean unemployment can be ignored. But it does mean that in the short run, a period of high or low joblessness would be less likely to alter the Fed's view of inflation and trigger an immediate change in interest rates. A shift in public expectations of inflation, however, would carry more weight in the Fed's calculations.

In the late 1950s, economists discovered a tendency for inflation to rise when unemployment was low and to fall when unemployment was high. At lower unemployment rates, they concluded, companies paid more to attract scarce workers and recouped the higher wage costs by raising prices. This relationship was shown on a chart called the Phillips Curve, after Alban William Phillips, one of the first economists to identify it.

In the 1960s, American presidents and Fed officials sought to exploit the Phillips Curve by letting inflation edge higher in exchange for lower unemployment. But in the late 1960s economists Milton Friedman, who died last year, and Edmund Phelps, both of whom would later become Nobel laureates, independently deduced that the reduction in unemployment would be temporary.

Once workers began to expect higher inflation, they would want higher wages. In the long run, the economists argued, unemployment would gravitate to some "natural" level no matter what inflation did.

Although economists concluded there wasn't a long-run tradeoff between inflation and unemployment, they still believed there could be a short-run tradeoff. From 1979 to 2003, Fed Chairman Paul Volcker and his successor, Alan Greenspan, exploited this idea, periodically using interest rates to push unemployment higher to achieve lasting reductions in inflation.

But even as they were doing so, the short-run impact of unemployment on inflation began to diminish. Though the trend has been under way for 25 years, only recently has intensive research by Fed economists and others incorporated it into mainstream thinking. The new thinking on inflation will be the subject of a March 9 conference in Washington that brings together Wall Street Fed watchers, academics and Fed officials.

"Among the feet-on-the-ground Fed inflation forecasters, who do this for a living, there's been a lot of concern for the last 10 years about whether there's...less of a relationship between output and future inflation," says Harvard University economist James Stock. "The accumulation of evidence occurs at a snail's pace. The evidence now is a lot stronger."

Mr. Stock and fellow economist Mark Watson at Princeton University presented evidence to a Fed conference in late 2005 that inflation's long-term trend has varied little since 1984, and that most fluctuations were the result of temporary disturbances, such as a change in energy prices.

Indeed, when core inflation rose last year, the Fed blamed higher rents and oil prices, rather than an overheating economy. It appears to have been right: As energy prices have come down and rent increases moderated, so has core inflation.

Core inflation, now running at a 2.2% rate by the Fed's preferred measure, remains higher than the 2% ceiling most Fed officials are comfortable with. But Janet Yellen, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, noted earlier this year that over the past decade, when inflation has drifted away from the 1.75% to 2% range, it has later reverted to it. For this reason it "may move down from its elevated level faster than many forecasters expect."

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke echoed that sentiment earlier this month, saying the public's expectations will determine whether temporary factors like changes in rents and oil prices "leave a lasting imprint" on inflation: "It is encouraging that inflation expectations appear to have remained contained," he said.

Mr. Phelps says the new thinking on the Phillips Curve doesn't change the implications of his Nobel-winning work. If the Fed never responded to higher inflation, consumers and businesses eventually would begin to expect higher inflation, and "then the game is up."

Fed officials agree. While a given drop in unemployment is less likely to spark inflation, the potential is still there. The Fed's staff estimates it takes up to twice as much additional unemployment to achieve a percentage drop in inflation as it did before 1984. "Imbalances between demand and potential supply [may] be slow to show through convincingly to inflation, but when they do, they may be costly to correct," Fed Vice Chairman Donald Kohn said in late 2005.

That's one reason the Fed, though it expects core inflation to ease this year, isn't relaxing. With unemployment currently 4.6%, at or below the Fed's view of its natural rate, inflation may edge up after the temporary impacts of energy and rent subside. That could require the Fed to raise interest rates enough to push unemployment up sharply and bring inflation down.

Houston Chronicle, February 26, 2007

CAMARILLO, Calif. — Gasoline prices soared nearly 13 cents a gallon on average nationwide in the past two weeks as the price of crude oil rose.

The national average for self-serve regular was $2.35 per gallon, up 12.8 cents since Feb. 9, industry analyst Trilby Lundberg said Sunday.

The average for midgrade was $2.46 per gallon, and premium was $2.56, according to Lundberg's latest survey of 7,000 gas stations across the country.

Oil prices reached a new high for the year Friday. Light, sweet crude for April delivery added 19 cents to settle on the New York Mercantile Exchange at $61.14, its highest closing price since Dec. 22.

The cheapest gas in the country was found in Salt Lake City, where a gallon of self-serve regular was $2.12. The highest average price in the nation for self-serve regular was in San Francisco at $2.84.

Sporkin's New Post: Working For Himself (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

For the first time in a legal career that spans nearly half a century, Stanley Sporkin is striking out on his own.

In the 1960s and '70s, Sporkin was one of the first enforcement watchdogs at the Securities and Exchange Commission. Next he became the top lawyer at the CIA. President Ronald Reagan several years later named him to a high-profile federal judgeship in the District.

Until his retirement in 2000, Sporkin cultivated a reputation for being an outspoken, results-oriented judge. From the bench he famously threw out an early antitrust settlement that the Justice Department struck with Microsoft and rejected on procedural grounds the Senate's bid to impeach U.S. District Judge Alcee L. Hastings (currently a member of the House of Representatives).

Now, at 75, Sporkin is trying something new.

He's hung out his own shingle as a lawyer and consultant, signing on as a part-time ombudsman for troubled petroleum giant BP and filling out his time by working as an arbitrator and mediator at Gavel Consulting Group. He says his favorite part of the job involves advising companies on how to keep in line with securities laws.

"What I enjoy is being able to consult with people," he said. "We've become such cookie cutters that we've lost common sense."

Sporkin continues to work out of the I Street NW office of Weil, Gotshal & Manges, the law firm where he was a partner before resigning last year because of client conflicts with his BP assignment.

Unlike some fledgling solo practitioners, he's got more than enough work. "The last thing I need to do is advertise," he said.

Governors Seek More Money For Children's Insurance (WP/AP)

By Robert Tanner

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Governors from both parties appealed yesterday for the Bush administration and Congress to provide more money for a health-care program that insures millions of children.

At stake is coverage for 6 million people, overwhelmingly children, as well as the hopes of many governors in tackling the challenge of uninsured working families.

"We can come to a consensus that children should be the first priority," Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) said.

State leaders met privately to discuss the State Children's Health Insurance Program at the annual winter meeting of the National Governors Association.

"This is one area where I think people stand entirely together," said New Jersey Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D).

Georgia and New Jersey are among 14 states expected to run out of money for the program before the next budget year begins in October, In Georgia, a shortfall could happen as soon as March.

The governors want two things: enough money -- estimated at $745 million -- to keep the program float through October, and changes to President Bush's budget. Analysts say the president's spending plan would shortchange the program even if the number of people served does not grow.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said he met privately with the governors but offered little hope that the administration will accept their demands.

Last night, Bush welcomed the governors to a formal dinner at the White House. "I believe governors add a lot to the work of our nation," he said. "I believe if we work together we can do a lot of good things."

The insurance program, approved in 1997, covers uninsured children whose families earn too much to qualify for Medicaid. More than a dozen states have expanded the program, which also insures about 639,000 adults.

Many governors said administration attempts to curb the program would undermine state efforts to offer universal health-care plans.

Leavitt said yesterday that there is enough money among states to cover short-term shortfalls in the program, if states with surpluses share with those with deficits -- an idea that has little support among governors. And Bush wants the program to remain focused on poor children, not all children and not adults, Leavitt said.

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) said that during their private lunch, many governors were "visibly frustrated" by the administration's approach.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who heads the association, said the issue will come up today when governors meet with members of Bush's Cabinet.

Amid the talk about dollars and percentages, the real cost is being ignored, some governors said.

"I think more about what it means to be a parent, a parent who can't go to sleep at night without worrying that 'if my kid gets ill tomorrow or gets in an accident, he won't have adequate coverage,' " Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) said. "I can't imagine more anxiety."

After Sorry 14-year Hiatus, Health-care Debate Revives (USAT)

Hopes were high 14 years ago when Bill and Hillary Clinton proposed an ambitious plan to provide health insurance for all Americans. Democrats and Republicans alike cheered when the president threatened to veto anything less than universal coverage.

That promising moment didn't last long. After initially winning support from medical, business and labor groups, the Clintons' top-down plan collapsed under the weight of its own complexity. Attacks on "Hillary Care" helped Republicans win control ofCongress in 1994.

Ever since, health-care reform has been considered too costly, in dollars and political capital, for most politicians to touch. But the beleaguered system's problems — one in seven people without insurance, rising premiums and lower reimbursements for those who have insurance, endless payment hassles — haven't gone away. Attempts at fixing them have been incremental and timid at best.

That could be about to change. Several groups that usually are at odds on health care now agree on the need for broad reform. These strange bedfellows are still a long way from agreeing on a plan, but the fact that they now see a common need signals a shift in the political dynamic.

So, too, does the power of the economic forces driving them. It seems everyone, from presidential candidates to hospitals, insurers, think tanks and governors, has a comprehensive health plan.

Among the new alliances:

·America's Health Insurance Plans, a lobbying group for insurers joined last month with Families USA, a liberal advocacy group, on a plan to extend health coverage to all children and the uninsured. Insurance companies, fearful of losing profits, were harsh critics of the Clinton plan.

·The CEO of Wal-Mart and the president of the 1.8 million-member Service Employees International Union have forged an alliance to push for universal coverage. Union president Andy Stern, a supporter of the Clinton plan, now says insurance has grown so costly that unions can no longer demand Cadillac plans.

·Stern and Wal-Mart are also part of a broader alliance called Better Health Care together. It includes leaders of AT&T, Intel, Kelly Services and the Communications Workers of America. They're urging reform and exploring whether tying insurance to employment, which started in the 1940s, still makes sense.

·In Washington, a bipartisan group of legislators has pledged to work with President Bush on achieving universal coverage. "The status quo is unacceptable," Bush said last week, citing 47 million Americans who have no insurance, and escalating health costs that will account for 20% of all spending in the United States by 2015.

The president might have added that the status quo is also unsustainable. It is melting away under pressure from rising global competition and spiraling costs.

General Motors estimates that health care adds $1,500 to the price of a car — a cost foreign rivals don't have to pay because their employees' health care is funded though government. At home, meanwhile, health-care inflation is not just crimping profits; it's eating money that otherwise could go for raises or other employee benefits. Health-care premiums have risen by 87% in just six years.

That's a potent incentive for employers to shed the burden. How will all this ferment play out? It brings to mind the Buffalo Springfield song from four decades ago: "There's something happening here. What it is ain't exactly clear."

What's clearer is the choice that's coming: Change the USA's unique employer-based health-care system or junk it?

A shift from the private sector to government is already well underway. By 2015, according to Medicare projections, more than half the money spent on health care will come from government plans: Medicare, Medicaid, the military or other programs.

But most reform ideas would keep and augment employer-based health care.

Massachusetts, for instance, has embarked on a bold experiment to provide universal coverage by requiring all residents to buy policies, and to provide subsidies to the poor. Employers who don't offer plans are taxed to cover their employees. California is weighing a similar plan, and a dozen other states are trying on innovative projects to expand coverage.

The newly allied private-sector reformers, meanwhile, are being purposely vague. They note that the Clinton plan was so detailed that it gave special interests a fat target to shoot at. They want to build support for change before trotting out specifics that might divide the parties.

That's smart. But a choice eventually will have to be made, and the truth is that for all the suspicion and demonization that's sure to greet any serious plan, both the right and the left have ideas that would be better than the present mess.

The important point is that for the first time since the early 1990s, the stars appear to be aligning for a major effort to reshape health care in America. It's about time.

In Crowded Presidential Race, It All Comes Down To Money (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

WASHINGTON — A daunting mix of celebrity candidates, rich candidates and early nomination contests is prompting long-shot presidential hopefuls to give up months and even years before the 2008 election.

The latest is former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. "At the end of the day, it's not about hard work or good ideas, it's about money," Vilsack said Friday. Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh and former Virginia governor Mark Warner, Democrats well into fundraising and other preparations, earlier had decided against running.

"The way the system is erected now, where money begets organization and TV is everything, long shots have no shot barring a cataclysm befalling the front-runners," says Jon Ralston, a Nevada politics expert.

And this year, measured by polls, name recognition and money, each party has three front-runners. "It's tough to be fourth or fifth," says political scientist Dante Scala of Saint Anselm College in Manchester, N.H. "If Hillary falters, Obama's there. If Obama falters, Edwards is there. That's a lot to overcome."

Scala was running through the Democrats' top tier: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, a former first lady; Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, a charismatic newcomer; and former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee.

The GOP has a similar trio: former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, known for his post-9/11 performance; Arizona Sen. John McCain, who won a national following in his 2000 presidential run; and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, well situated due to personal wealth and corporate connections.

This is an unusual year. In 1988, the crowded Democratic field was known as the Seven Dwarfs. In 1992, Mario Cuomo left the field to several relatively obscure senators and governors — one named Bill Clinton. The GOP race in 2000 was dominated by one front-runner, George W. Bush, and one alternative, McCain.

The top-heavy fields this year have made it harder for lesser-known candidates to capture money and attention just when they need both more than ever. Democrats have squeezed four caucuses and primaries into January 2008 (Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina), one more than usual. And several large, expensive states — California, Florida and New Jersey among them — may move to Feb. 5.

Former New York governor George Pataki and former Senate majority leader Bill Frist are among Republicans who opted out. George Allen, who had contemplated a run, was not re-elected as Virginia senator. The three Democratic dropouts had no personal setbacks and helped many Democrats win last year. Vilsack impressed some Nevadans at a forum just two days before he withdrew.

Gordon Fischer, a former Iowa Democratic Party chairman and Vilsack backer, says Vilsack could have stayed in the race longer if he were wealthy. "It doesn't speak particularly well about our country's political system," he says. Former president Jimmy Carter says, "You can't dream of getting the nomination" now unless you raise $100 million in advance.

"That's a gross distortion … of propriety in an election process," Carter said Sunday on ABC's This Week.

Before Any Votes, A 'Money Primary' (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

It was "money, and only money," that led former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack to drop out of the 2008 presidential race last Friday. What the Democrat meant, of course, was a lack of money. Not hard work or desire.

Politicians often speak of fundraising with disdain, but in fact, the money that donors are willing to shell out to candidates represents an important signal of a candidate's viability. Even if much of the public is not fully engaged in the intense nomination races under way in both parties, wealthy donors are. And they're voting with their checkbooks.

It's all part of what's come to be known as the "invisible primary" – the early jockeying for money, top campaign staff, and high-profile endorsements that winnow the presidential field long before any caucuses or primaries are held. A fourth piece, media buzz, magnifies the effect of the other three.

"Organization, fundraising, and endorsements are all various forms of currency, or various bets on the probability that a candidate will finish first or in the [top three]" in the early nominating contests, says Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas. "No one wants to endorse a candidate they know will have to drop out early or won't be able to raise money or convince a top-drawer management team to take on their campaign."

Mr. Vilsack knew going in that he faced an uphill climb. Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois were likely to run, and a third likely candidate, former vice presidential nominee John Edwards, had already built up a strong organization in Iowa, which will hold the first nominating contest next January. All three ended up declaring, and currently occupy the top three spots in most polls of Democratic primary voters.

For Vilsack, one big trouble sign came in polls of his home state, where he typically polled fourth among Democratic presidential wannabes. Though he was a popular two-term governor, with a centrist approach, he never was able to carve out a national image among his own people, and, lacking the charisma of an Obama or an Edwards, could not attract much attention (or money or media or endorsements) outside Iowa. In the Iowa caucuses, he had to finish well if not first to keep going. But as the hometown candidate, the moment he did well, the import of the Iowa caucuses would have been discounted. So in effect, he was in a no-win situation.

One beneficiary of Vilsack's decision could be Gov. Bill Richardson (D) of New Mexico, the only other candidate with executive experience in the race. Governor Richardson also brings Washington experience – as a former congressman and Energy secretary – as well as foreign policy credentials, as a former UN ambassador and still part-time globetrotter and hostage negotiator, to the table.

But Richardson is another candidate who could face viability problems soon if he does not show some chops in the fundraising department. As the sitting governor of a state far from the key money centers, Los Angeles and New York, it will be hard for him to raise the kind of serious money he needs. Still, he's already well ahead of where Vilsack was when he pulled out. Last week, Richardson raised $2 million in a single fundraiser. Vilsack had raised just $1.1 million in the last seven weeks of 2006, and had spent most of it by the end of the year.

In this presidential cycle, money is more important than ever – especially since some top candidates have signaled they will forgo the public financing system and raise as much as they can on their own. Campaign-finance experts say that, to remain viable, a candidate needs to raise upwards of $20 million by June. Some top-tier candidates, like Clinton, can expect to do far better than that.

The Richardson and Obama candidacies have opened up mini invisible primaries within the larger one, one in the Hispanic community and the other among African-Americans. The challenge for both men is to compete against the Clinton machine, which has strong connections to both communities owing to the presidency of Clinton's husband, Bill Clinton, and his continuing popularity among both groups. (Richardson is Hispanic and Obama is black.)

The campaign of Hillary Clinton, which has worked all along to create an air of inevitability around her candidacy, has reached out to key players in both worlds and locked in talent and donors. For both Richardson and Obama, the ethnic/racial dimension has presented a challenge: Neither says he is running as the "Hispanic candidate" or the "African-American candidate," but those are natural ties that can produce important endorsements and donations.

And even as the overall Democratic field has shrunk, it may not be done growing either. Speculation persists that former Vice President Al Gore may yet jump into the race – one of the few people who could still do that and mount a viable candidacy, given his national fame and fundraising ability.

In a Pew Research Center poll released last Friday, most Democratic voters (77 percent) reported that they have not given the presidential campaign much thought and were not prepared to state which candidate they would support. Among those who were willing to name a candidate, Clinton came in first with 11 percent, Obama got 7 percent, Edwards got 1 percent, Gore got 1 percent, and 4 percent went to others.

Given that the invisible primary is taking place largely unnoticed by most Americans may strike some as undemocratic. In effect, the choices that voters will face early next year in the nominating contests are being shaped right now, before most people are paying attention. But the system has run this way for a long time. It was the influential GOP donors and governors who hand-picked then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush to run for president back in 1999. Ronald Reagan was tapped to run for president in similar fashion.

Still, the early importance of big money in the 2008 presidential cycle is unprecedented. "This may well be a very important year in that process, in the sense of more and more money being required to run," says Mr. Jillson.

GOP Early Front-runner More Often Gets Job (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON – Hillary Rodham Clinton is the clear favorite in early polls for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. So, what does that mean? Not a lot, if history is any guide.

Republican hopeful Rudy Giuliani, however, is sitting pretty.

For at least three decades, Republicans have been far better than Democrats in early polls at getting behind the candidates who end up winning the party's presidential nomination.

Note that Edmund Muskie in 1972, George Wallace in 1976, Ted Kennedy in 1980, Gary Hart in 1988, Mario Cuomo in 1992 and Joe Lieberman in 2004 were early front-runners among Democrats. None won the nomination.

Looking back

Gallup polling over the past three decades shows Republican front-runners usually win their party's nomination, but Democrats do not. Some elections:

1972-Democrats

February 1971: Edmund Muskie, 26 percent; Edward Kennedy, 25; Hubert Humphrey, 21; John Lindsay and George McGovern, each at 5.

McGovern won the nomination and lost the general election to President Nixon.

1976-Democrats

February 1975: George Wallace, 22 percent; Humphrey, 16; Henry Jackson, 13; McGovern, 10; Muskie, 9. Jimmy Carter was at 1 percent with 10 candidates in front of him. Carter won the general election, defeating President Ford.

1976-Republicans

March 1975: Gerald Ford 34, Ronald Reagan 22, Barry Goldwater 17.

1980-Democrats

February 1979: Kennedy, 60 percent; Carter, 28.

Carter lost the general election to Reagan.

1980-Republicans

February 1979: Reagan, 31 percent; Ford, 26; John Connally, 12.

1984-Democrats

April 1983: Walter Mondale, 29 percent; John Glenn, 23; Gary Hart, 4.

Mondale won the nomination and lost the general election to Reagan.

1988-Democrats

January 1987: Hart, 30 percent; Lee Iacocca, 14; Jesse Jackson, 13. Michael Dukakis was at 1 percent with seven people in front of him.

Dukakis won the nomination and lost the general election to Vice President George H.W. Bush.

1988-Republicans

January 1987: Bush, 33 percent; Bob Dole 16, Howard Baker and Pat Robertson, each at 6.

1992-Democrats

February 1991: Mario Cuomo, 18 percent; Jackson, 12; McGovern, 9; Richard Gephardt, 8. Bill Clinton was at 2 percent with 10 people in front of him.

Clinton won the nomination and beat Bush in the general election.

1996-Republicans

February 1995: Dole, 38 percent; Dan Quayle, 17; Newt Gingrich and Phil Gramm, each at 7.

Dole won the nomination and lost to Clinton in the general election.

2000-Democrats

January 1999: Al Gore, 47 percent; Gephardt, 13; Bill Bradley, 12; Jackson, 11.

2000-Republicans

January 1999: George W. Bush, 42; Elizabeth Dole, 22; John McCain; 8; Quayle, 6.

Bush beat Gore in the general election.

2004-Democrats

January 2003: Joe Lieberman, 17 percent; John Kerry, 16; John Edwards and Gephardt, each at 13.

Kerry won the nomination and lost to Bush in the general election.

2008-Democrats

DOJ_NMG_0136355

Mid-February 2007: Hillary Rodham Clinton, 41 percent; Barack Obama, 21; Gore, 14; Edwards, 13. Other candidates' support was less than 5 percent.

2008-Republicans

Mid-February 2007: Rudy Giuliani, 40 percent; McCain, 24; Gingrich, 9; Mitt Romney, 5. Other candidates' support was less than 5 percent.

Republicans have picked the early front-runner in seven of the past 10 elections, according to Gallup polling. In the other three elections, Republican incumbents cruised to re-election.

Democrats nominated a former vice president, Walter Mondale, in 1984, and a sitting vice president, Al Gore, in 2000. For those elections, the early polls were more predictable at picking the front-runner.

Why has the GOP been better at predicting winners?

"There is this sense among Republicans - a belief that it's a certain person's time to run for president," said Thomas Mann, a political analyst at the Brookings Institution. The GOP track record is probably due more to chance and the Republicans' success at winning the White House since 1968, he said.

In 2008, neither party has a former vice president or president competing for the nomination for the first time in almost 80 years.

Giuliani, a former New York City mayor, is a favorite in early polls. Many people feel his personal history and moderate positions on social issues may cost him support among some conservatives.

Arizona Sen. John McCain is running even or second to Giuliani, with former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney running a distant third.

Among Democrats, New York Sen. Clinton looks strong at this point, with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards giving her the stiffest competition.

Despite their occasional difficulties in picking eventual winners, early polls can provide important clues about the campaign.

Among the more interesting findings from recent national polls:

Democrats are more likely than Republicans to be paying close attention to the presidential race, by 31 percent to 20 percent, according to a poll taken in February by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

Romney may find his Mormon faith an obstacle with many voters. One-quarter of people questioned say they would not vote for a Mormon candidate, compared with 8 percent who say they would not vote for a woman and 3 percent for a black candidate, according to a Newsweek poll in December.

Clinton is viewed unfavorably by at least 40 percent of people, many of them Republicans who will be difficult for her to win over, various polls have found.

Four in 10 Democratic voters say they have not heard enough about Obama to have an opinion yet. Only 3 percent say that about Clinton, according to a CBS News poll in mid-January.

Most Republicans and those who lean Republican are unaware of Giuliani's support for civil unions for same-sex couples and abortion rights, according to a Gallup poll in mid-January.

Public support for Clinton and McCain is probably based on a fairly firm base of knowledge about them, said public opinion analyst Charles Franklin. Knowledge of Giuliani is probably based mostly on his response as New York's mayor to the Sept. 11 attacks.

The old complaint about early polls as measures of name recognition is probably less true today because of the intensity of coverage by 24-hour cable news, GOP pollster David Winston said.

Most poll analysts agree the polls six months from now will be far more meaningful.

"For the most part, the political polls don't mean much now," said Scott Keeter, of the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press. "But political junkies have an endless appetite for them. People are looking for some kind of evidence of how things are going to turn out."

Substance Over Image (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Six years ago a man unsuited both by intellect and by temperament for high office somehow ended up running the country.

How did that happen? First, he got the Republican nomination by locking up the big money early.

Then, he got within chad-and-butterfly range of the White House because the public, enthusiastically encouraged by many in the news media, treated the presidential election like a high school popularity contest. The successful candidate received kid-gloves treatment — and a free pass on the fuzzy math of his policy proposals — because he seemed like a fun guy to hang out with, while the unsuccessful candidate was subjected to sniggering mockery over his clothing and his mannerisms.

Today, with thousands of Americans and tens of thousands of Iraqis dead thanks to presidential folly, with Al Qaeda resurgent and Afghanistan on the brink, you'd think we would have learned a lesson. But the early signs aren't encouraging.

"Presidential elections are high school writ large, of course," declared Newsweek's Howard Fineman last month. Oh, my goodness. But in fairness to Mr. Fineman, he was talking about the almost content-free rivalry between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama — a rivalry that, at this point, is mainly a struggle over who's the bigger celebrity and gets to lock up the big donors.

Enough already. Let's make this election about the issues. Let's demand that presidential candidates explain what they propose doing about the real problems facing the nation, and judge them by how they respond.

I know the counterargument: you can't tell in advance what challenges a president may face, so you should vote for the person, not the policy details. But how do you judge the person? Public images can be deeply misleading: remember when Dick Cheney had gravitas? The best way to judge politicians is by how they respond to hard policy questions.

So here are some questions for the Democratic hopefuls. (I'll talk about the Republicans another time.)

First, what do they propose doing about the health care crisis? All the leading Democratic candidates say they're for universal care, but only John Edwards has come out with a specific proposal. The others have offered only vague generalities — wonderfully uplifting generalities, in Mr. Obama's case — with no real substance.

Second, what do they propose doing about the budget deficit? There's a serious debate within the Democratic Party between deficit hawks, who point out how well the economy did in the Clinton years, and those who, having watched Republicans squander Bill Clinton's hard-won surplus on tax cuts for the wealthy and a feckless war, would give other things — such as universal health care — higher priority than deficit reduction.

Mr. Edwards has come down on the anti-hawk side. But which side are Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama on? I have no idea.

Third, what will candidates do about taxes? Many of the Bush tax cuts are scheduled to expire at the end of 2010. Should they be extended, in whole or in part? And what do candidates propose doing about the alternative minimum tax, which will hit tens of millions of middle-class Americans unless something is done?

Fourth, how do the candidates propose getting America's position in the world out of the hole the Bush administration has dug? All the Democrats seem to be more or less in favor of withdrawing from Iraq. But what do they think we should do about Al Qaeda's sanctuary in Pakistan? And what will they do if the lame-duck administration starts bombing Iran?

The point of these questions isn't to pose an ideological litmus test. The point is, instead, to gauge candidates' judgment, seriousness and courage. How they answer is as important as what they answer.

I should also say that although today's column focuses on the Democrats, Republican candidates shouldn't be let off the hook. In particular, someone needs to make Rudy Giuliani, who seems to have become the Republican front-runner, stop running exclusively on what he did on 9/11.

Over the last six years we've witnessed the damage done by a president nominated because he had the big bucks behind him, and elected (sort of) because he came across well on camera. We need to pick the next president on the basis of substance, not image.

Surveying '08 Field, Governors Urge Moderation (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is the front-runner and will probably win the Democratic presidential nomination. Rudolph W. Giuliani could do well in Mississippi. And the length of the presidential campaign is insane.

Those were the views expressed Sunday by some of the foremost experts on American politics: governors gathered here for the winter meeting of the National Governors Association.

A few governors have endorsed presidential candidates, but many said they were reserving judgment.

Democratic governors pleaded with their presidential candidates to ignore the fringes of the party and focus instead on the "middle 20 percent" of the electorate with a pragmatic, problem-solving agenda.

"Democrats certainly could not win in Tennessee with just a hard-nosed Nancy Pelosi-style Democratic agenda," said Gov. Phil Bredesen of Tennessee. Mr. Bredesen, a Democrat re-elected in a landslide last year, was referring to the House speaker.

Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, toasted the political prowess of Mrs. Clinton.

"Republicans would make a bad mistake to underestimate Hillary Clinton," Mr. Barbour said. "She will be a formidable opponent if she is the Democratic nominee. And I think she probably will be. The Democrats have a true front-runner this time, and she is quite likely to win the nomination."

Mrs. Clinton would probably not carry Mississippi in a general election, Mr. Barbour said, but "John Kerry got 40 percent of the vote there in 2004, and Senator Clinton would be a stronger candidate than he was."

By contrast, Mr. Barbour said, on the Republican side, "we don't have a front-runner." Indeed, he said, the campaign for the Republican presidential nomination is "the most open race since I got involved in politics in 1968." As a result, he said, "an unusually large number of governors are keeping their powder dry."

Could a New Yorker like Mr. Giuliani excite voters in Mississippi?

"It depends on who his opponent is," Governor Barbour said. "Life is a series of choices. If he is running against Hillary Clinton, I believe he will carry Mississippi."

Gov. M. Jodi Rell of Connecticut, a Republican, said that she, like many voters, had not yet focused on the presidential race. Even as candidates woo the conservative base of the Republican Party, Mrs. Rell said she hoped the nominee would be "a moderate — not particularly far right or far left."

Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, a Democrat, said "it's way too soon to tell" who will win his party's presidential nomination.

Mr. Rendell has a big appetite for politics. He was general chairman of the Democratic National Committee in the 2000 election. But he is disgusted with the early start to the 2008 race.

"I think it's insane," Mr. Rendell said in an interview. "The media has created a two-year presidential election cycle that's very destructive to American politics. And the political system is complicit. We front-load our primaries so much that four or five states decide who the nominees are going to be. It's over by February. And then we have a God-awful yearlong presidential campaign, general election campaign, which is too long and lends itself to all these negative attacks."

"If we were to design a system for electing a president, I don't think we could do worse," Mr. Rendell said. "It's terrible."

Mr. Rendell is hoping the Republicans choose Senator Sam Brownback, the conservative of Kansas, as their presidential nominee. "Give us Senator Brownback, and we'll be all right," Mr. Rendell said. "It doesn't matter who we nominate."

Gov. John Baldacci of Maine, a Democrat, said Mrs. Clinton, Senator Barack Obama and John Edwards were all potentially strong candidates. But Mr. Baldacci said: "I have not spoken to any of them. None of them have called me. None of them have reached out to me."

At the winter meeting of the National Governors Association eight years ago, Republican governors rallied around George W. Bush and virtually crowned him as their party's presidential nominee. But no such groundswell has occurred this year.

One governor who has embraced a candidate is Tim Pawlenty of Minnesota, a co-chairman of Senator John McCain's presidential exploratory committee. "Senator McCain is a once-in-a-generation leader, one of the strongest, most courageous and fearless public servants I have ever met," Mr. Pawlenty said.

Gov. Bill Ritter Jr. of Colorado, a Democrat, said the party's presidential candidates should study his election and the success of other moderate Democrats like Gov. Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas.

"We have learned a way of speaking to the middle with a pragmatic, problem-solving agenda," Mr. Ritter said. "We have something to teach the rest of the country."

Ms. Sebelius said, "We have figured out a way to convince voters in our states to cross party lines."

Govs. Perry, Rendell: No VP Interest (WP/AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Governor or vice president?

That's an easy choice, say two state leaders who have been talked about for a possible spot on the 2008 ticket.

"I got the best job in the world. Ask President Bush," GOP Gov. Rick Perry of Texas said Sunday, dismissing speculation he might be interested in serving as a running mate to the eventual nominee.

Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell, a Democrat, also denied any interest in the No. 2 spot. "I like to be my own boss," Rendell said.

The two were in the capital for a National Governors Association meeting.

Texas is among several states considering moving its primary election up to have more of an influential role in the nominating process. Perry said that idea is gaining momentum back home.

"It's an interesting concept, and I certainly want to see the legislation, but it's something that I think the Legislature is full well behind," Perry said.

In 2004, Texas primary voters found themselves casting only symbolic votes in early March. Legislation would move the primary to February 2008. Several other big states, including California and Florida, also are considering a similar shift.

Rendell said the current presidential nominating system makes little sense because it does not give large, populous states enough influence.

"Pennsylvania, which is one of the two or three most important states in the general election, we have no input at all into who the nominee is. Our primary is in late April. It's a mess," he said.

The governors appeared on "Fox News Sunday."

Is Hillary Afraid Of Being Embarrassed By Bill? (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Last December, a NEWSWEEK reporter tentatively broached a delicate subject with a longstanding adviser to Hillary Clinton: was there a concern in the Hillary camp that her husband might somehow embarrass her in the campaign ahead? The reaction was swift and fierce. "If that's what you want to talk about, I'm hanging up right now," said the adviser, who did not wish to be identified even entertaining such a question.

But it is the elephant in the room. Senator Clinton's presidential campaign can ill afford another scandal swirling around her husband, whose second term in the White House was badly disrupted by the Monica Lewinsky affair. Perhaps the Clintonites are understandably worried that the Republican right will try to create a scandal where there is none or dredge up old history. They doubtless anticipate an assault from Clinton's old foes, but they may have been caught unawares by the attack from one of Bill's old friends. In an interview with New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, Hollywood mogul David Geffen tore into the Clintons' integrity and Hillary's electability. "Everybody in politics lies," said Geffen, "but [the Clintons] do it with such ease, it's troubling." Geffen raised the most eyebrows when he referred to the former president as "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition to hurt him and distract the country." Geffen was not just speaking in the past tense. "I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Geffen told Dowd.

The reaction to Geffen's remarks from the Clinton campaign was immediate and outraged. The night before Dowd's column appeared, Geffen had co-hosted a fund-raiser for Sen. Barack Obama, a Clinton rival for the Democratic nomination. At 9:46 a.m., the Clinton campaign issued a statement calling on Obama to cut his ties to Geffen and give back the $1.3 million raised by Geffen's star-studded party. (Jennifer Aniston, Morgan Freeman and Ben Stiller were all there. George Clooney, off shooting a movie, contributed the maximum when Obama first announced and tells NEWSWEEK that Obama is "as good as Bobby [Kennedy] late in his career and Jack from early on.") The press release described Geffen as Obama's "finance chair" and accused him of "viciously and personally attacking Senator Clinton and her husband."

Geffen is not Obama's finance chair; the two are not even close friends. The shot at Obama may have been meant as a kind of welcome-to-the-NFL forearm shiver, intended to rattle the upstart candidate the Chicago press mockingly calls "Obambi." (Obama's aides hit back hard, saying that the Clintons had no problem with Geffen when they were raising $18 million from him. But Obama himself played it cool: "It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark," he said while campaigning in Iowa. In any case, he was not giving back the money.)

The Clinton camp has always believed in rapid response—in returning fire before a news cycle can pass. Last week, the Clintonites were serving notice—not for the first time—that anyone who brings up Bill and Hillary's past marital problems will be branded a character assassin. "It's the 'Godfather' theory of politics," says a Democratic strategist who asked not to be identified discussing the Clinton campaign's tactics. "If people stray, you send them a message. That's how you keep them in line."

Democratic activist Arianna Huffington, who attended the Obama event but says she is uncommitted, tells NEWSWEEK, "I think [Geffen's remarks] definitely benefited Obama because it brings into the open conversations many people have been having about the Clintons." Clinton's allies suggested that Geffen was motivated by bile. Once a close F.O.B. (Friend of Bill), he had stayed in the Lincoln Bedroom (twice). But when he asked for a presidential pardon for imprisoned American Indian activist Leonard Peltier, Clinton turned him down.

Dowd tells NEWSWEEK that Geffen did not seem out to get the Clintons. She says she asked for the interview because she had recalled hearing Geffen doubt Senator Clinton's presidential prospects during an audience Q&A at the 92nd Street Y in New York City in February 2005. "She can't win, and she's an incredibly polarizing figure," he had said of Hillary at the time. Dowd says Geffen was initially reluctant to be interviewed for her column. During their hourlong interview at his Beverly Hills mansion, his tone was "reflective," she says. (When Dowd asked him about the Peltier pardon, he said he never really expected one, though he was angry when fugitive financier Marc Rich was pardoned by Clinton.)

Dowd says she was the one who brought up questions about Bill Clinton's past as a campaign issue. Geffen acknowledged that some big donors and celebrity Clinton supporters were fretting, as Dowd put it, "that Bill will 'pull the focus' and shelve his wife's campaign." In the column, Dowd paraphrased Geffen as saying that "if Republicans are digging up dirt, they'll wait until Hillary's the nominee to use it."

Geffen may be right about the GOP dirt diggers. Republican conservative activist Grover Norquist, who loathes the Clintons, coyly tells NEWSWEEK, "Hillary is my first choice to be the Democrat nominee." A New York Times story last week suggested that the so-called vast right-wing conspiracy has gone soft. The article quoted Chris Ruddy, a mouthpiece for the conservative conspiracy theorist Richard Mellon Scaife, as saying that the Clinton administration "wasn't so bad." But the right-wingers may just be lying low. David Bossie, the former congressional investigator familiar to journalists for helping them track down Clinton sex scandals, is working with Clinton strategist turned apostate Dick Morris on an anti-Hillary documentary. R. Emmett Tyrrell Jr., the editor of The American Spectator, which first printed salacious details from Arkansas state troopers about Clinton's sex life, is publishing a book titled "The Clinton Crack-up: The Boy President's Life After the White House."

The mainstream press has largely steered clear of stories about the Clintons' marriage. A widely noted article last May in The New York Times reported that the Clintons are often apart. "Nights out find him zipping around Los Angeles with his bachelor buddy, Ronald W. Burkle, or hitting parties and fund-raisers in Manhattan; she is yoked to work in Washington or New York ... " No longer Geffen's pal (or recipient of his largesse), Bill Clinton has been spending more time with Burkle, a supermarket tycoon who is giving a big fund-raiser for Hillary Clinton in March. The buzz in Hollywood is that Geffen is jealous of Burkle. But Geffen denies it, and denies any animus against the Clintons. "I think Bill Clinton is a great guy," he tells NEWSWEEK. "I support them both. I just don't think she can be elected president."

The Democrats' Gamble (USNEWS)

By Jim Lo Scalzo

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

The state of Nevada displayed its newfound political muscle last week, with the appearance of eight Democratic presidential hopefuls (Sen. Barack Obama was the sole exception) at a forum in Carson City. With Nevada's caucus scheduled-for now, anyway-just after the Iowa caucus and just ahead of the New Hampshire primary, this quirky state seems poised to be a crucial Democratic battlefield for the '08 elections.

Seeking a much-needed foothold in the West, the Democratic National Committee, with a little lobbying from Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, reshuffled the calendar in Nevada's favor. Citing the state's ethnic diversity (nearly a quarter of Nevada's residents are Hispanic), concentration of organized labor (about 14 percent of the workforce), and economic growth (consistently one of the nation's strongest performers), Democratic leaders believe the state offers an alternative to Iowa and New Hampshire's mostly white, rural populations.

Yet the move has infuriated New Hampshire's secretary of state, William Gardner, who considers his state's voting position sacrosanct and who is now threatening to reschedule his state's primary before the first of the year, if necessary. Not to be left behind, almost a dozen other states are angling to move up as well.

Aside from Nevada's potential political value, it's an unusual locale to say the least, featuring legal gambling and prostitution, a booming big city and desolate hinterlands. Nevada is a state of surrogate realities. In Las Vegas, for example, where the gaming industry can take credit for employing much of the growing Hispanic population, these new Nevadans work largely unseen, obscured by facades of New York and Paris and Venice. Beyond Las Vegas's all-night glow, in the dusty nether reaches that are the rest of the state, the populace is little more apparent.

If it's possible for a landscape to say something about its people, then Nevada says hardscrabble. And hardly visible. Some towns exist barely above desertion, a mere collection of parked cars and corrugated metal. Others really are ghost towns-abandoned relics of long-ago gold mines. Dominating the Nevada landscape are not humans but highways, the loneliest in the lower 48, draped like filaments across great swaths of sand and rock. Just when that nothingness seems absolute, there appears a trace of habitation: a makeshift grave, a bullet-riddled car, or, near the ghost town of Rhyolite, a life-size plaster sculpture of the Last Supper.

In this peculiar place, the Democratic candidates are already converging, as are the press, the political consultants, the policy wonks. And they'll be around awhile. More presidential debates are scheduled: Reno in August, Las Vegas in November. Should the DNC's gamble prove sagacious, the people of Nevada will help deliver the party a sustainable nominee and perhaps even turn their state from red to blue. Should it prove ill-conceived, the DNC won't be the first bettor to watch his hopes evaporate in Nevada's dry desert wind.

Hidden Power On The Hill (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

By about 1:30 p.m. one recent day, Rep. Jim Clyburn was hunched in the back seat of an SUV parked outside the Capitol and talking on a BlackBerry about the impact of the president's budget on rural districts. He had already done a radio interview about Iraq and the 2008 presidential race, led a meeting with 100 or so Democratic members or their staff, spoken against the president's Iraq plan, given a press conference on Hurricane Katrina, and delivered a speech to the National Association of Manufacturers. He took a quick break in his office for salted cashews and diet soda. It's been busy "every day since being in the majority," he said. And then it was off to a PBS interview.

A headline grabber? Not exactly. Busy? Absolutely. Clyburn is at the center of the Democrats' most pressing concerns on Capitol Hill. As the majority whip, the No. 3 Democratic position in the House of Representatives, he's in charge of keeping the party together on votes and reaching out to the Democrats' famously broad set of interest groups. And for presidential candidates, his endorsement could swing the South Carolina primary. For the next year or two, Jim Clyburn is going to be a very popular-and powerful-man.

Lessons. A 15-year veteran of the House and the highest-ranking African-American in Congress (the first black congressman from his state since 1897), Clyburn, 66, talks in the deep baritone of a minister's son. He traces his political success to lessons learned in a fundamentalist home in Sumter, S.C. His father went to divinity school but made only $10 a week from the Church of God and instead supported his family as a contractor; his mother graduated from college when he was 13 and then just hung the diploma in her beauty shop.

He was always interested in politics. In a speech prior to his election as whip, Clyburn recalled how at age 12 he mentioned his plans-to go to college and work in Washington, D.C.-in his mother's store. One client told him not to bother, since he was black. His mother thought otherwise. "You just hold fast," she said. And he did. As a student at South Carolina State College in 1960, he organized the state's first sit-in at an Orangeburg drugstore with six friends; later, he would join a civil rights group led by future Rep. John Lewis, now Clyburn's right-hand man. Clyburn was a community organizer, a teacher, an employment counselor, and a failed candidate for state representative before beginning a 20-year career in state government, most prominently as human affairs commissioner. Much of the work boiled down to managing competing interests and racial groups. "That's my long suit," he says. "I've been managing people since I was 24 years old."

Clyburn believes his current job is best handled without constantly putting his face before the cameras, though he'll sit for interviews when asked. Yes, he admits, he's been on MSNBC's Hardball With Chris Matthews, but he prefers "playing hardball with baseballs." And when he latches onto an issue, he'll make his voice heard. Right now, his passions are turning the rural areas around South Carolina's Interstate 95 corridor into a center for biofuels and improving the state's health and education programs. He's also focused on smoothing assistance for Katrina victims, and he strongly supports sending earmark dollars-federal money for specific projects-back to the district.

Since winning election in 1992 in a district designed to have a black majority-it was the only district in the state President Bush did not carry in 2000 or 2004-Clyburn has shot up the Democratic ranks. He was unanimously elected chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and took charge of the party's faith working group in the House. He was also elected chairman of the Democratic caucus. Just before Election Day in November, Clyburn began campaigning for the whip post. "I don't know if I saw myself as successful or not," he demurs, "but I darn sure was pursuing it." North Carolina Rep. G.K. Butterfield, a frequent dinner companion, decamped to South Carolina for days to telephone members and try to win their support for Clyburn, starting a month before the Democrats had even won the House. Clyburn was somewhat reluctant at first, Butterfield says. "He thought it'd be in poor taste before the election." In the end, though, it all worked out.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer are the public faces of the House Democrats, but it's Clyburn who handles the nuts and bolts of holding the party together on votes. So far that hasn't been too difficult, considering that the Democrats' 100-hours legislative push was an assortment of popular, poll-tested issues.

Challenges. But now, as Congress takes up legislation on climate change, immigration, healthcare, and the budget, things could get tougher. "We can't afford to lose 15 members"-Democrats have that many more than the obligatory 218 votes for a majority-"on any one vote," he says. But some believe if anyone can hold Democrats together, it's Clyburn. Butterfield, for one, praises Clyburn's style of chatting one on one with colleagues rather than holding large events. Clyburn, who has a moderate-to-liberal voting record, also regularly tries to reach out to business interests and more conservative Democrats. (He's writing a book tentatively titled I Too Am a Southerner in part about working as a black with white politicians.) He's planning on running his whip operation differently from those in the past: He wants to have members on the same page before a bill actually comes up for a vote instead of trying to then get them onboard when a vote is imminent. Clyburn has seven major coalitions to manage, from the liberal black caucus to the moderate Blue Dogs. "I think a lot of my job will be to get our members to understand that we can't bite off more than we can chew," he says.

Clyburn will also be at the heart of the Democratic presidential fight. His endorsement carries a lot of weight in South Carolina. "Clyburn does not have a machine," says Jack Bass, professor at the College of Charleston, but he does have the "Jim Clyburn Network"-a group of civic and religious organizations with regional influence. Yet his endorsement hasn't been a silver bullet. In 2004, he initially backed former Rep. Dick Gephardt, who dropped out before the South Carolina primary, and then backed Sen. John Kerry, who was soundly beaten there by Sen. John Edwards.

Still, Clyburn's receiving a constant flow of presidential suitors. He says he is staying out of the endorsement sweepstakes-"at least at this point, anyway"-but admits that "I'm crazy about Bill Richardson," the New Mexico governor. "I have a closer personal relationship with [him] than any other of the candidates." Still, he won't commit. "I'm not going to tell you. I'm not going to tell my wife." Jim Clyburn is still, after all, managing people.

The Dems Get Religion (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

John Kerry struggled to overcome his secular image in 2004, but the current crop of Democratic presidential front-runners is determined not to repeat his mistakes.

One of New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's first campaign hires was a top evangelical staffer on Capitol Hill. U.S. News has learned that an aide in Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's office tasked with religious outreach is joining his presidential campaign this week. And former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards is framing poverty relief as a moral issue that's helping to drive his campaign. "Two thousand eight could be the first time since Jimmy Carter that the presidential candidate who's really good on faith issues is the Democrat," says Eric Sapp, a Democratic consultant. So the Democratic primaries could see serious competition among candidates for the faith vote.

Clinton, a scourge of the religious right, was raised in a conservative Methodist home. "Over the years, Senator Clinton has expressed her faith often in speeches and books, and I've always been impressed with its authenticity," says Burns Strider, the Capitol Hill staffer who became Clinton's new faith outreach director. But Clinton is sure to encounter skeptics. When she donned a crucifix while campaigning for re-election last year, some pundits called it a ploy to moderate her image. "I got deluged with calls from New York reporters who had this view of her as a nonreligious person," says John Green at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. "But ... she's a very serious social-justice Methodist."

Faith. Strider says the campaign will focus on liberal "social justice" Democrats but on socially conservative Democrats, too. Clinton raised eyebrows in 2005 by calling for fewer abortions before an audience of family planning providers. "For a long time, Democrats forfeited part of the electorate by choosing not to have a conversation about faith," says Strider.

Obama attracted attention last year when he addressed evangelicals on fighting AIDS at Purpose Driven Life author Rick Warren's Saddleback Church in Southern California. This week, Obama's Senate religious outreach coordinator, Josh DuBois-active in the conservative Assemblies of God church-will join the campaign. Obama often discusses his relationship with his Chicago pastor and his work with black churches as a community organizer. "I ... worked closely with my fellow members of the religious community long before this campaign began," Obama says. Obama aides say religious leaders will play a role in policy, as they did when Obama cosponsored legislation last year to protect charitable donations from bankruptcy proceedings.

Edwards has not hired religious outreach staff but has built bridges to the progressive faith community through projects like promoting state amendments to raise the minimum wage. His campaign launched One Corps, a volunteer program that combines political organizing with service projects like building houses for the poor; aides describe it as translating faith to action. "He practices his religion personally in a more profound way than any political leader I've associated with," says Edwards's campaign manager, David Bonior.

But Edwards upset religious Democrats in February by declining to fire two Internet bloggers who were attacked by a Roman Catholic group for making offensive comments toward Catholics before joining the campaign. The bloggers left the campaign anyway. "We should have had a better vetting process," says Bonior. It's the kind of mistake that Democrats are trying to avoid this time around.

The PowerPoint as Running Mate

Mitt Romney, the former Bay State guv now running third in the GOP presidential sweepstakes, doesn't use a BlackBerry or even carry a cellphone. But that's not to say he's not a techie geek. In fact, he's proving to be just the kind of wonk that would make Microsoft's Bill Gates giddy at an issues lunch. Here's the deal: Romney is the first-ever presidential candidate to haul out a PowerPoint presentation at campaign events. He did it recently while addressing the Detroit Economic Club, and the audience went nuts for it. "It was amazing," an auto exec tells us. "I mean he didn't just make claims. He had the graphs to back him up!"

The idea was the candidate's and was a textbook presentation outlined in classic fashion: It opened with the "Intro," wrapped up under the title "Close," and finished with an "End" on Page 21. In between were graphs that Romney tried to soften with descriptions of lines like "squiggle." PowerPoints, says spokesman Kevin Madden, "speak to the competency that [Romney] exudes and the authoritative nature of his understanding of the issues." Plus, he says, the boss just digs them-and is a great presenter. "He's the PowerPoint president. Very few people could pull this off and not look wonkish." And the Mitt-tech doesn't end there: He's started Mitt TV and raises cash on ComMitt, a computer fundraising program.

Could Al Gore Bankroll His Bid?

If you're wondering why, despite his denials, Al Gore remains the most talked about nonpresidential candidate, it's this: His friends think he's done so well in the private world that he could bankroll the start of his own 2008 bid. "If Al Gore wants to run, he will come with all the means necessary," says longtime ally Donna Brazile. "Al Gore is someone who can pull it off at half time,"she said. But he's got competing interests for his wallet: Friends say he also wants to expand his global climate change campaign.

This Candidate Is Used to Running

It doesn't look as if we'll be seeing Sen. Barack Obama, among the leanest Democrats running for the presidency, hanging out at McDonald's. That's because he's big on exercise and healthy eating. "He exercises every day," says an insider. Obama's a runner and a regular on the treadmill. The youthful lawmaker even ran for an hour before announcing his candidacy back in Illinois. Among his snacks: trail mix.

Once Again in the Line of Fire

Can a prosecutor go on to become president? Well, that's what fans of TV prosecutor Arthur Branch, aka former Sen. Fred Thompson,hope. We hear that his buddies are strongly urging him to jump into the already packed GOP race. "The draft- Fred movement grows," says one ally, citing several blogs pushing Thompson, who has been feeding his fans with occasional commentary-laced fill-in work for radio's Paul Harvey.

A New Rambo, but the Same Ending

Suicide attacks dominate the headlines, but here's one that didn't happen. A U.S. Army officer in Afghanistan reports that last month a suicide bomber drove an explosive-laden Toyota Corolla up to an Army base in Kabul, where an Afghan nicknamed "Rambo" was guarding the gate. Rambo wears an Army-style uniform but isn't allowed to pack heat, so he uses a big red pipe, which he sometimes slams on car hoods to slow them down. Anyway, as the suicide bomber approached, he got hung up in the gate. Rambo reached into the window and yanked the bomber out before he could detonate the explosives. Rambo's reward: Troops passed a hat and handed him a wad of cash.

United by Lipstick to Fight Violence

Avon is joining Mary Kay February 27 to demand Congress fund the Violence Against Women Act. And note to lawmakers not into this program: Running when you see one of Mary Kay's pink brigade won't work. Avon's got some 5 million worldwide agents who dress just like you.

A Scandal for the Silver Screen

From our Buzz Etc. files: There's talk that outted CIA operative Valerie Plame's story may hit the silver screen. It all started when she was spotted lunching with actress Morgan Fairchild and hubby Joe Wilson. CIA types say her book has been iced in the clearance process, so the quickest way to seize on the scandal is to make a movie. Separately, there's speculation that Bush Commerce chief Carlos Gutierrez is being wooed by Latin America's TV giant Univison.

A Nasty Habit, All Snuffed Out

He was among Congress's heaviest smokers, but now former Majority Leader Dick Armey has given up his Carlton menthol 100s. "I was just thinking about my wife one day," he tells us, "and I realized that of all the things I could do on this Earth that would make her happy is to quit smoking." Just like that, he did. "If a guy knows that, then it seems to me a guy has got to quit." Certainly, his wife, Susan, had told him many times before to snuff out the nasty habit. "I heard it a lot, of course," he says, but it didn't sink in until about two months ago. "We don't want to shock and startle your women readers, but even though I heard it over the years, I guess I'm living proof that on some occasions, some husbands sometimes actually hear what their wives say." Still, he did question his move. "I spent the next four weeks of my life trying to figure out if her happiness really meant that much to me." It went so well that he's not sympathetic to others like Sen. Barack Obama, who chews Nicorette to get over the habit. "If he's chewing this stuff, he's not stopped smoking," says Armey, who revealed a broader skepticism of crutches used by those with bad habits. "I'm laughing now, but if we ever indict a Mormon in Congress, what is the guy going to do, because he can't check into an alcohol rehab facility. ... I don't know what a politician that's indicted does if he can't check into rehab and say, 'The whiskey did it.'"

Alter: The Apology Primary Is On (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Hillary Clinton is right to resist efforts to make her cry uncle and apologize for her 2002 vote in favor of the Iraq-war resolution; that would look weak. Her mistake was in not anticipating this problem with the liberal base of her party last summer and cauterizing the wound in advance, before it festered. Instead, she offered lame rationalizations. She should have taken a leaf from John McCain and her husband, each skilled in the subtle politics of contrition. This skill will be essential to the success of the next president.

In recent years, the word apology has reverted in politics to its original meaning in Greek, which is "defense." (Plato's "Apologia" is an account of Socrates' unsuccessful defense of himself in his trial.) Exhibit A is McCain, whose career-enhancing apologies are legion. A partial list includes apologizing for making a "confession" tape during his captivity by the North Vietnamese; for committing adultery during his first marriage; for his role in the Keating Five savings-and-loan scandal; for a nasty joke about Chelsea Clinton; for comparing Newt Gingrich's popularity to Jeffrey Dahmer's, and, during the 2000 campaign, for calling Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance." Whew!

But McCain's reputation for using contrition to charm his way out of trouble might be catching up with him. When ABC News asked Vice President Cheney last week about McCain's comments that Donald Rumsfeld was "perhaps the worst secretary of Defense ever," Cheney replied archly: "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld." He didn't.

But if he were truly a straight talker McCain would express regret for his consistently insincere praise of President Bush. For six years, Rumsfeld and Bush were joined at the hip. One can't be bad and the other good. It may be that McCain is on the verge of losing the Apology Primary to John Edwards, whose showy contrition for his vote in favor of the war resolution is what has put Hillary on the hot seat.

Bill Clinton approved of his wife's approach, perhaps because he, too, largely refrained from personal apologies until forced to by the Lewinsky scandal ("I have sinned"). But he built good will worldwide in part by repeatedly admitting historical error on the part of the United States, from U.S. support for the "dirty war" in Guatemala to the Tuskegee syphilis studies on blacks to the overthrow of the Hawaiian Queen Liliuokalani. Most significantly, he went to Africa in 1998 and said the United States had been wrong to engage in the slave trade and that his administration had erred by failing to intervene more forcefully to prevent Rwandan genocide.

This marked a big change from George H.W. Bush, who said in 1988, "I will never apologize for the United States. I don't care what the facts are," after a U.S. ship mistakenly shot down an Iranian airliner, killing 290 civilians. Bush's son has stuck to his father's view. He famously couldn't recall any mistakes he'd made as president and left apologies for the torture at Abu Ghraib to Rumsfeld and other underlings until King Abdullah of Jordan insisted he make amends personally. As the list of appallingly bad decisions by his administration lengthens, Bush often opts for the passive voice President Reagan favored during the Iran-contra scandal: "Mistakes were made."

Does Hillary Clinton have the same instinct to maintain a façade of presidential infallibility? She's known to apologize quickly in private after ruffling feathers. But with her polls showing that she receives high marks for strength and toughness, she is loathe to do anything in public that might be seen as wimpy or fulfilling unflattering stereotypes of women. Hillary finally admitted in December that if she'd known then what she knows now, she would have voted differently on the war resolution. To a normal person, that would mean she was wrong in 2002 to have entrusted Bush with a blank check. Instead, she chose to play the kind of semantic games that always spell trouble for the Clintons.

By doubling down—insisting that it's wrong to admit she was wrong—Hillary may have set a bad precedent in the humility department. Should she win, she'll need every tool at her disposal to convince the world that a new day has dawned, with the "humble foreign policy" promised by none other than George W. Bush in 2000. That's the only way we can recover our global leadership and mobilize allies to confront emerging threats. It's too late to apologize for this one, but the next time things go wrong, she could do worse than meld the McCain and Clinton styles of saying sorry into a persuasive defense of her own.

Hillary-Obama Feud Imperils Party For '08 (WT)

By Donald Lambro, THE WASHINGTON TIMES

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

Democratic strategists say the bitter fight between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama could undermine their party's bid to win back the White House if it continues.

"I think the Democrats in general, particularly party activists and leaders, do not want to see a knife fight between these two which results in blood all over the Democrats. We want a strong nominee coming out of this primary process, not one that is beaten and bloodied," said Bud Jackson, a Democratic media adviser.

That view summed up what many Democrats were thinking last week when the front-runners were trading political blows through their spokesmen after movie mogul David Geffen, a former Clinton ally who is now backing Mr. Obama, called Mrs. Clinton a disingenuous, "incredibly polarizing figure" who isn't electable and appeared to allude to her husband's past infidelity.

It was the first skirmish of the presidential election cycle, which triggered a storm of media attention on the nightly news and on the front pages of the nation's newspapers and which campaign pollsters say has already had a negative effect on both of the candidates.

"This story has legs. The opening kickoff has been made. Clinton's the kicker and Obama's the receiver, who kicked back. What's clear is that it's going to be nasty from here on, which doesn't help the Democrats," said independent pollster John Zogby.

"At this stage, anything that threatens party unity or alienates Democrats or annoys swing voters can hurt. So in the case of Hillary, anything that reminds swing voters of the darker side of the Clintons hurts. And anything that suggests that Obama is not 'Clean Gene,' meaning 'I'm not going to run on the "audacity of hope," but I'm going to kick you if you kick me,' can hurt," Mr. Zogby said.

By late last week, the Clinton-Obama fight was still reverberating in the press, which up until now has had thin gruel to write about in the Democrats' campaign. The New York Times said in a front-page article Friday that the New York senator's effort to identify Mr. Obama with Mr. Geffen's attack "was widely viewed among Democrats as carrying some cost to Mrs. Clinton."

Her campaign's broadside against her chief rival for the nomination was "a sharp reminder of Clinton family history that has led some Democrats to believe Mrs. Clinton cannot win a general election," the Times said.

Whoever won the first round in their nominating fight, many Democrats were clearly uncomfortable with the intensity of their exchange.

"The Democrats have momentum going their way, an unpopular president waging a misguided war, and now they're pointing fingers at each other," said Chris Redfern, the Ohio Democratic chairman. "At the end of the day, no one's paying any attention to this, but they need to clean it up, make nice with each other and get to work."

Other Democrats, though, saw this as nothing more than the usual political rough-and-tumble of a presidential campaign and thought the story was being overplayed.

"I think we are going to have a spirited debate [over who the party should nominate], and that is going to be uplifting and at times rough. This is the nature of politics," said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network.

Despite his concern about how voters perceived the latest fight between the two party leaders, even Mr. Jackson, the media adviser, called it "a minor speed bump" on the road to next January's primaries and caucuses. "I think Obama overreacted a little bit, but this is inside baseball. It only becomes an issue if we see a pattern develop," he said.

One rival for the Democratic nomination suggested yesterday that reporters were making too much of the Obama-Clinton dust-up.

"Oh, I think it's a bunch of silliness," former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

"I was in New Hampshire yesterday. I met probably over a thousand New Hampshire primary voters in the course of having a bunch of house parties. And you'd be shocked to hear the only people who asked me about this were reporters," Mr. Edwards said. "I didn't have a single New Hampshire voter ask me about this."

John Edwards Says Democratic Donor Spat Is Silly (MBSN)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - "Silliness."

That's what Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards had to say about the publicity surrounding the donor spat between two of his chief rivals, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

The Obama and Clinton campaigns issued dueling press releases about a top Hollywood donor who once supported Bill Clinton but is now backing Obama.

DOJ_NMG_0136365

Hillary Clinton's campaign demanded Obama return producer David Geffen's money after Geffen criticized both Clintons. Obama declined, and his spokesman criticized Clinton for accepting support from a South Carolina lawmaker who said Obama could not win because he is black.

"Oh, I think it's a bunch of silliness," Edwards said Sunday on CBS "Face the Nation."

He said the topic was not on the minds of voters during a stop Saturday in New Hampshire.

"I met probably over a thousand New Hampshire primary voters in the course of having a bunch of house parties. And you'd be shocked to hear the only people who asked me about this were reporters.

"I didn't have a single New Hampshire voter ask me about this. What they're asking about is what are we going to do about Iraq? What are we going to do about Iran? What are we going to do about health care? The things you'd expect them to be concerned about," Edwards said.

Reactions To Obama, Clinton Excite S.C. Democrats (POL)

By Lee Bandy

Politico.com, February 26, 2007

Democratic presidential hopefuls Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama drew huge crowds on recent campaign swings through South Carolina.

Together, they made a statement: The Democratic Party is back.

"I've never seen anything like it," remarked Democratic consultant Bob Wislinski on leaving the Columbia Metropolitan Convention Center where Obama, a U.S. senator from Illinois, just had addressed a raucous rally of 2,800.

"I'm hopeful," Wislinski said of his party's future.

Clinton, a U.S. senator from New York, spoke to more than 3,500 at a town meeting at Allen University.

South Carolina is a key battleground state in the primary process, coming just a week after New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary.

The S.C. Democratic primary is set for Jan. 29, 2008. The Republican contest tentatively is scheduled for Feb. 2, 2008.

With both parties holding early primaries, South Carolina will get a lot of attention from Republican and Democratic candidates. There's been a steady stream since the first of the year.

A sizable number of South Carolinians have been showing up at the rallies of Democratic candidates, catching party establishment types off guard.

But it is foolhardy for candidates and their followers to suggest victory is in the air.

The size of the turnout is no indication of what's going to happen on Election Day, says Clemson University political scientist Bruce Ransom.

Many in attendance at the candidate rallies are curiosity seekers, like John Clark, a State House employee.

He came to see Obama, a "celebrity, a rock star," he said. But he was a long ways off from picking a horse to ride.

After all, what's the rush?

Columbia attorney and former state Rep. I.S. Leevy Johnson cautions black voters to proceed slowly in picking a 2008 candidate for president.

Gather background information on the candidates. Listen to their stands on key issues. Check out their personal lives.

Right now, the momentum is with Obama and Clinton.

"I'm excited," said state Rep. Gilda Cobb-Hunter. "Obama is stirring excitement among voters in a manner I have not seen before. That's good for the Democratic Party.

"I want to win in '08 and will support the candidate who demonstrates electability and whose message I can resonate with."

Unlike some past years, Cobb-Hunter, D-Orangeburg, has no intention of staying on the political sidelines this primary cycle.

"I believe this election is for the Democrats to lose," Cobb-Hunter said. "I can't afford to sit this one out."

Candidate No. 4, Please

Meanwhile, some Republicans are concerned that U.S. Sen. John McCain of Arizona appears to have lost interest in the race.

"The excitement in 2008 is on the side of the Democrats. No doubt about it," says Francis Marion University political scientist Neal Thigpen , a GOP activist.

On the Republican side of the primary ledger, McCain is locked in a tight race and appears to be losing ground. Those who've seen him recently say he looks a bit shopworn.

"My impression is that the Republicans are demoralized," Thigpen said. "They are not wild about any of their top three candidates."

Someone Give Geffen A Day Job (NYT)

By David Carr

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Last Friday, two days before the conclusion of the most closely contested Oscar race in recent memory, a dozen people from various parts of the entertainment industry sat down to lunch at the home of Arianna Huffington in Brentwood.

Would the Oscar go to "The Departed" or "Babel," Martin Scorsese or Clint Eastwood?

The topic barely came up.

Instead, the conversation was all about the media mogul David Geffen's drive-by maiming of the Clintons earlier in the week in remarks he made to Maureen Dowd of The New York Times. For over an hour, the people at the table debated his decision to take on Hillary Clinton, who is pursuing the Democratic nomination for president.

Mr. Geffen, 64, would no doubt have been pleased. A billionaire with manifest interests, he has a lot of time on his hands now that DreamWorks, the mini-major studio he formed with Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, has been bought and folded into Paramount. With a net worth that has been estimated at $4.5 billion and no more worlds to conquer, Mr. Geffen finds himself — well, inserts himself — in the middle of conversations over the future of Paramount, The Los Angeles Times and now the republic itself.

On Tuesday night, Senator Barack Obama, Mrs. Clinton's closest rival for the nomination, topped off a day of old-time politicking here by speaking at a $2,300-a-plate fund-raiser at the Beverly Hilton, dappled with celebrities like Eddie Murphy, Jennifer Aniston and Morgan Freeman. That was followed by a more intimate affair at Mr. Geffen's Beverly Hills home. Within hours of the event, BlackBerrys started lighting up all over town with Ms. Dowd's column, in which she chatted with Mr. Geffen about the Clintons.

"Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling," he told Ms. Dowd. (Of course, many of Mr. Geffen's former business partners say that he has had his own idiosyncratic relationship with the truth.) Calling the former president a "reckless guy" deftly put the issue of Bill Clinton's behavior in the present tense. And at a moment when some of the smart money was poised to line up behind Mrs. Clinton's candidacy, Mr. Geffen was signaling that backing her may not be so smart after all.

You have to hand it to him: here it was, Oscar weekend, and at least nobody was talking about the failure of "Dreamgirls," Mr. Geffen's pet project, to get a best picture nomination.

"David Geffen gave voice to the collective unconscious of many people here," said Ms. Huffington, whose opposition to the Iraq war and Mrs. Clinton's candidacy has been on display on the Huffington Post Web site for some time. "The story would have been dead in a day if he was just speaking for himself, but these things are on everybody's mind."

Still, while Mr. Geffen hardly needs the money, you can understand why a lot of people here wish he still had a day job. (Mr. Geffen declined to elaborate on his remarks to Ms. Dowd.)

"I don't think that all of this is productive," said Warren Beatty, reached on his cellphone. "I think the media is looking for a big political story, and I think it is much more important to talk about the issues."

The mixture of revulsion and fascination with this episode mirrors Mr. Geffen's career. He combines a gift for market timing — this is the guy who brought you the Eagles in the '70s, Guns N' Roses in the '80s and Nirvana in the '90s — with a guerrilla's touch for instigation.

Even though DreamWorks was acquired by Paramount for $1.6 billion a year ago, many people have seen his hand in the subsequent moves at the studio. The decision to bring in Stacey Snider, a Geffen familiar, to run the DreamWorks division could be perceived as a threat to Brad Grey, the head of Paramount. And according to The Los Angeles Times, after Tom Freston was ousted as the head of Viacom, Mr. Geffen called Viacom's chairman, Sumner M. Redstone, and suggested that he hire Mr. Katzenberg, the head of DreamWorks Animation, and buy that as well.

"He is a star in a way that none of the other people in Hollywood with money are stars," said James Toback, a film director who once tried to cast Mr. Geffen in a movie.

And then there is Mr. Geffen's offer to buy The Los Angeles Times for $2 billion. While everyone can give Mr. Geffen credit for his deep understanding of how the news media can be manipulated, few would think of that skill set as congruent with owning a newspaper. (And indeed, his effort hasn't panned out.) But given what he accomplished with a few sharply conceived quotes to a well-read columnist, it is not hard, and not pretty, to imagine what he could do if he were in charge of one of the country's most important daily newspapers.

And perhaps that's the lesson the Democrats (and everyone else) should take from the past week. Business types love to get involved in politics, of course, but their tactics tend more toward the kind of knee-capping they remember so fondly from their boardroom days.

No one is expecting Mr. Geffen to spend his days golfing, but there is a danger that if the coming election becomes his full-time hobby, his precision ruthlessness will distort the public process. After all, this is not a movie sale, a busted deal or a Don Henley album; this is about the duly elected leader of the United States.

Mr. Geffen and Ron Burkle, another Los Angeles billionaire who is a staunch ally of the Clintons, have already fought for custody of The Los Angeles Times. No one wants to see the presidency treated as a cat toy between rich men who don't like to lose.

"I think that America was better served when the candidates were chosen in smoke-filled rooms," Mr. Geffen told Ms. Dowd.

There will be no smoke — we're talking about California, after all — but if kings are to be made or undone, you can bet that Mr. Geffen is standing at the ready.

Mud, Dust, Whatever (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

If Bill and Hillary Clinton were the stars of a reality TV show, it would be a weekly series called "The Connivers." The Clintons, the most powerful of power couples, are always scheming at something, and they're good at it.

Their latest project is to contrive ways to knock Barack Obama off his white horse and muddy him up a little. A lot, actually.

Most of the analyses after last week's dust-up over David Geffen's comments to Maureen Dowd have focused on whether the Clintons succeeded in tarnishing the junior senator from Illinois. What I found interesting was that no one questioned whether the Clintons would be willing to get down in the muck and start flinging it around. That was a given.

When Senator Obama talks about bringing a new kind of politics to the national scene, he's talking about something that would differ radically from the relentlessly vicious, sleazy, mendacious politics that have plagued the country throughout the Bush-Clinton years. Whether he can pull that off is an open question. But there's no doubt the Clintons want to stop him from succeeding.

Senator Obama has come riding out of the wilderness (all right, Chicago) to stand between the Clintons and their dream of returning to the White House and resuming what they will always see as the glory years of the 1990s.

He hurts Senator Clinton in myriad ways. In all the uproar over Mr. Geffen's comments, hardly anyone has said they were wildly off the mark. There would be no Obama phenomenon if an awful lot of people weren't fed up with just the sort of mean-spirited, take-no-prisoners politics that the Clintons and the Bush crowd represent. Senator Obama — at least for the time being — is an extremely attractive alternative.

Right behind that as a factor is the distinct possibility that Mr. Obama will ride off with the black vote, without which the Clintons are doomed. Those who joked that Bill Clinton was the first black president are now confronted with someone who might be the real deal.

Senator Obama is also much freer to take fresh stands on the issues. His camp has been delighted, for example, to watch Senator Clinton twist herself into a pretzel on Iraq. From day care to health care to trade and beyond, Mr. Obama is free to offer something new. He's not tied to the Clinton experience, the Clintonian way of viewing the world.

And, finally, this campaign is not the be-all and end-all for Senator Obama. More easily than the Clintons, he can afford to make mistakes. He does not have to win this election. He can fight another day. In the absence of any catastrophic misstep, he could be selected as a vice-presidential candidate this time around. (It's not too hard to imagine a John Edwards-Barack Obama pairing.) He can run again for president four years from now, or eight years from now.

His future, as Yogi might have said, is all in front of him.

The Clintons were fresh once. I remember the exhilarating bus tour they took with Al and Tipper Gore right after Bill Clinton won the Democratic presidential nomination in the summer of 1992. There was a spontaneous quality to that tour and a sense that these four young leaders represented a new dawn of American politics.

Almost 15 years later, Hillary Clinton has to fight the perception that she is chasing yesterday's dawn. She has the benefit of universal name recognition, uniformly high poll numbers and trainloads of campaign cash. But she still gives the impression that she's riding the political high wire with the mixed blessing of Bill Clinton planted firmly on her shoulders.

It's ironic that the first woman with a real shot at the presidency comes off not as a compelling underdog but as the powerful front-runner at the controls of a ruthless political machine.

We'll have to wait and see whether Senator Obama is really offering a new, more hopeful brand of national politics. But here's a bit of unsolicited advice for a candidate making his first foray into the crucible of presidential politics:

Don't listen to those who tell you not to fight back against the Clintons. You will not become president if you allow yourself to become their punching bag. Keep in mind the Swift-boating of John Kerry. Raising politics to a higher level does not mean leaving oneself defenseless.

Hillary Clinton Courts Black Voters (NSDY)

By Reid J. Epstein, Reid.epstein@newsday.com

Long Island Newsday, February 26, 2007

At African-American cultural celebration in NY, senator talks about local issues and helps honor community activists

It wasn't officially a campaign event, and she didn't mention the presidency, but Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton spent yesterday working to position herself as the candidate for African-Americans.

Coming after a week in which her campaign traded barbs with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, Clinton's Democratic primary opponent, she presided over an African-American heritage celebration hosted by District Council 37, New York City's largest public employee union.

At the union's lower Manhattan headquarters, Clinton spoke mostly about local issues not likely to earn her attention in early presidential battleground states like Iowa and New Hampshire.

The former first lady, who wore a black suit with a pink shirt, praised the York College basketball team for winning the CUNY conference basketball championship, touted the preservation of the downtown African burial ground and promised to work to keep residents of Brooklyn's massive Starrett City housing development, which is in the process of being sold, from being priced out of their homes.

"Starrett," she said, "we've got to save the housing there."

Even though Clinton focused on local issues -- she also pushed universal health care coverage -- the event's honorees didn't hesitate to expound on her presidential prospects.

"Our president often considers, it appears, Africa a country and not a continent," said Elsie Crum McCabe, the president of the Museum for African Art in Long Island City. "Our next president won't do that."

The remark was clearly made with Clinton in mind though it could apply also to Obama, whose father was born in Kenya. The presidential contender is well-respected by many blacks for his work as a community organizer in Chicago.

Ernest Davis, the mayor of Mount Vernon in Westchester County, said New York state's black community will work hard to help candidate Clinton.

"If she is to succeed, we can't just stand on the sidelines," Davis said while accepting an award during the event. "We're going to do everything in our power to make sure that she is successful."

Other honorees spoke of Clinton as a trail blazer for women. Sheena Wright, the president and chief executive of the Harlem-based Abyssinian Development Corp., a nonprofit investment organization, said the free world would be fortunate to have Clinton as its leader.

"As she makes her way to the White House again," Wright said to raucous applause while accepting an award at the event, "not only does the United States of America need her leadership ... but the world needs her to sit in that seat."

Other honorees yesterday were Divine Bradley, 24, a hip-hop artist who started an after-school program near his home in Canarsie, Brooklyn; Marcia Keizs, the president of York College in Jamaica; and Lillian Roberts, DC37's executive director.

Yesterday marked the seventh year of the event, which Clinton began upon her election to the Senate.

Clinton finished her day at a discussion of Sen. Charles Schumer's book, "Positively American: Winning Back the Middle-Class Majority One Family at a Time," at the 92nd Street Y on the Upper East Side. She is scheduled to spend today traveling upstate to discuss economic issues.

Rice: Obama's Run Shows Black Progress (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice finds Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama appealing and says it won't be much longer before race isn't a barrier to becoming president.

Obama is a top-tier contender among Democrats and his wide support early in the 2008 race "just shows that we've come a very long way," Rice said Sunday. She and the Illinois senator are black.

"I do think we've come a long way in overcoming stereotypes, role stereotypes about African-Americans. I will say race is still a factor. When a person walks into a room, I still think people still see race," Rice said.

"But it's less and less of a barrier to believing that that person can be your doctor or your lawyer or a professor in your university or the CEO of a company. And it will not be long, I think, before it's no longer a barrier to being president of the United States," Rice said.

Rice, a Republican, has said repeatedly she will not run for president despite high popularity ratings and measurable support in opinion polls.

She noted that if she were to continue as secretary of state through the end of President Bush's term in January 2009, "we will not have had a white male secretary of state for 12 years - a white woman, black man and a black woman. That says something about how far our country has come, even though we can't deceive ourselves. Race is still a factor in this country."

Her most recent predecessors at the State Department were Colin Powell and Madeleine Albright. Powell was secretary of state from 2001 to 2005; Albright from 1997 to 2001.

Rice discussed race in the United States when asked about Obama's candidacy. Obama, a first-term senator, is considered among the early front-runners for the Democratic nomination with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards.

Rice noted that Obama is a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where the secretary often testifies.

"I think he's very appealing and a great person. He's on my committee. And we've always had good exchanges. I think he's an extraordinary person," she said.

Rice declined to say whether she thought he had enough experience, especially in foreign policy, to be president.

"Oh, I'm not going to make that choice. The American people are going to make that choice," she said.

Rice was interviewed on "Fox News Sunday."

How Much Will The '08 Race Turn On Race? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

During the past three weeks, three different African-American political insiders have commented to me that I have mistakenly failed to discuss "race" when talking about Sen. Barack Obama's prospects for 2008.

They all thought that the Illinois Democrat's race is an impossible burden for him and makes him unelectable in the general election even if he were to win the Democratic nomination.

It's true, I think, that many of us who write about politics — and as a group we are overwhelmingly white — have concluded that former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's (R) religion is a greater impediment to his presidential hopes than is Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) gender or Obama's race.

That's been my assumption for months, in part because national public opinion surveys have shown that more Americans say they wouldn't vote for a Mormon than for a woman or an African-American, and in part because the nature of the presidential nominating process elevates the importance of certain states and of certain demographic groups in those key states.

After all, if evangelical Christians prove to be unwilling to support a Mormon, it's hard to see how Romney can do well in Iowa or South Carolina, two key early tests for the GOP nomination. And if he flops there, he probably can't be nominated, let alone elected president.

But some in the black community remain deeply skeptical about Obama's electability. Their view is simple: Whether those being surveyed about their willingness to vote for an African-American are deceiving themselves or intentionally misleading pollsters, a lot of white voters won't vote for a black nominee.

There is, of course, something to this view. Political observers long ago concluded that African-American candidates often underperform among undecided voters, and polling in past races has exaggerated the strength of some black candidates.

But after re-examining my assumptions, talking to some thoughtful political veterans and considering the data, I remain convinced that Obama's race is not an insurmountable problem for him.

First, let's stipulate that there are still some people in this country who won't vote for an African-American for any office. Second, let's agree that there are plenty of states that a Democrat, white or black, is not going to carry in the 2008 presidential race. And third, let's also note that race tends to be more of an issue in states with large black populations, and that happens to be in Southern states that no Democrat will win.

The question then is whether Obama can carry enough white voters in enough Democratic or politically competitive states to win 270 electoral votes. I think it's possible. He wouldn't need to carry South Carolina or Oklahoma or even Louisiana. He might need some combination of Iowa, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado and/or Ohio — all states that Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) lost in 2004 — but he wouldn't need to carry a Deep South state or a bastion of Republicanism.

Ten African-Americans in the House, all Democrats, currently represent majority white districts, including two each in Florida, Georgia and Missouri. In addition, Julia Carson of Indiana, Keith Ellison of Minnesota, Mel Watt of North Carolina and Gwen Moore of Wisconsin all represent majority white districts. Ellison's district is only 10 percent black, while Carson's is 26 percent and Moore's is 28 percent.

Colorado has had two African-American lieutenant governors over the past 40 years, and in the late 1990s it had two black statewide officials at the same time (both Republicans).

African-American Thurbert Baker (D) has been elected and re-elected as Georgia's attorney general, and Michael Thurmond has been elected twice as the state's commissioner of labor. Baker ran far ahead of then-Sen. Max Cleland (D) and then-Gov. Roy Barnes (D) when each was going down to defeat in 2002. Republicans nominated African-Americans for governor last year in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts elected an African-American to the state's top job.

For the moment, I have more concerns about Obama's ability to win black support for the Democratic nomination than I do about his ability to get elected if nominated, especially since Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) have appeal in that community.

"Older African-Americans are more pessimistic about what the prospects are for black candidates," said David Bositis, a senior political analyst with the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, and one of the most thoughtful and well-informed students of black political behavior and public opinion. That means they are likely to doubt Obama's electability in 2008.

But what happens if Obama starts winning primaries? "If Obama comes out of Iowa and New Hampshire looking like a winner, there will be a substantial move of support to him in the African-American community," Bositis predicted.

We all know that the Illinois Senator has considerable personal appeal, and white voters are likely to react far more favorably to him than to African-American political figures such as the Revs. Jesse Jackson or Al Sharpton. I believe he is electable under the right circumstances, which makes him no different than any other politician. That means he will win or lose because of his record, his campaign and his performance as a candidate.

As Candidate, Obama Carves Antiwar Stance (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25 — Senator Barack Obama is running for president as one of the few candidates who opposed the Iraq war from the beginning, a simple position unburdened by expressions of regret or decisions over whether to apologize for initially supporting the invasion.

Iraq remains a defining topic in the opening stages of the 2008 presidential race, but it may prove easier for Mr. Obama, Democrat of Illinois, to revisit the past than to distinguish his views in the future. The current Iraq proposals of Mr. Obama; Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York; and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina share more similarities than differences, including a gradual withdrawal of troops.

Though Mr. Obama is framing his candidacy to appeal to Democrats who have long opposed the war, until recently he was not among his party's most outspoken voices against it. He campaigned strongly against the war in his bid for the Senate in 2004, but when he arrived in Washington he waited 11 months to deliver a major speech on Iraq.

And only after Mr. Obama opened a presidential exploratory committee did he introduce legislation to withdraw American combat brigades from Iraq by March 31, 2008.

In an interview last week, Mr. Obama said he intended to continue using the authorization of the war to distinguish himself from fellow Democratic presidential candidates. In addition to Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards, Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware voted to authorize the invasion.

"The authorization vote is relevant only because it gives an insight into how people think about these problems and suggests the sort of judgment they apply in evaluating a policy decision," Mr. Obama said. "There are people who sincerely believe that this was the best course of action, but in some cases politics entered into the calculation. In retrospect, a lot of people feel like they didn't ask hard enough questions."

Mr. Obama was not always so critical of the Congressional vote, taken on Oct. 11, 2002. In several interviews before the Democratic National Convention in 2004, where his national political ascent began, he said he did not place blame on Democrats who had voted to authorize the war, conceding he had not been privy to the same intelligence information.

Now, he appears intent on drawing the contrast between his early opposition to the war and the Senate votes to authorize it by Mr. Edwards, who has since repudiated his vote and apologized for it, and Mrs. Clinton, who has not apologized but has said she would not have supported the resolution had she known then what she knows now.

These days Mr. Obama dismisses the suggestion that it was easier for him to speak against the war because he was not serving in the Senate and therefore not obligated to vote on the matter. He recalled worrying, at the time, that he might lose his Senate primary election because of his decision to oppose the Iraq invasion.

"It certainly didn't look like a cost-free decision when Saddam Hussein's statue was being pulled down in Baghdad," Mr. Obama said in an interview. "I was in a hotel room in the middle of my Senate campaign, watching that happen, and President Bush's job approval rating was at 60 percent. Those who voted for the authorization felt pretty good."

In a Senate debate on Iraq last June, Mr. Obama voted to oppose an amendment seeking to set a specific timetable for withdrawing American troops. His current position on a withdrawal mirrors the conclusions of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended a specific time frame for troops to leave.

Now the politics of the war seem to be working in his favor among Democratic primary voters.

As Mr. Obama has introduced himself in the opening weeks of his candidacy, few subjects have garnered more applause than his criticism of the war. He does not refer to the conflict as Mr. Bush's war, which antiwar candidates in the Democratic Party did in the 2004 election, but rather is seeking to expand the circle of responsibility to those who supported the invasion.

"We continue to be in a war that should never have been authorized," Mr. Obama told an audience in Iowa last week, making a not-so-subtle reference to Mrs. Clinton and other Democratic rivals. Two days later, at a Texas rally, he said, "I am proud of the fact that way back in 2002, I said that this war was a mistake."

As if on cue, the crowds of Democrats cheered with gusto.

Nolden Gentry, a lawyer in Des Moines who has been in audiences to see Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama in the past month, said Mr. Obama's position on Iraq was one of many factors setting his candidacy apart in the eyes of Democrats. "He's more pure on the war," Mr. Gentry said, walking from a town meeting where he and 2,200 others had seen Mr. Obama.

Sterletha Grover, an account representative for a computer company who saw Mr. Obama speak to about 20,000 people on Friday in Austin, Tex., said she liked his view on Iraq. "We shouldn't have gone there in the beginning," she said.

Mr. Obama highlights his points of distinction on the war in meetings with party officials and influential donors as well. During his trip to Des Moines last week, he met behind closed doors with members of the Iowa House of Representatives and the State Senate. In both sessions, participants said, he raised the issue of Iraq himself.

Still, his proposals for Iraq do not go as far as those of others in the Democratic field, particularly that of Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, who voted against the Iraq authorization and has recommended cutting military spending to end the war. Mr. Edwards, too, has called on Congress to pass substantive legislation that would, among other measures, block financing for a buildup of troops. Mr. Obama has not suggested such proposals.

Among the differences in the plans offered by Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton is that she does not propose setting a deadline for American troops to be withdrawn. The titles of their plans, though, are similar. Hers is called the Iraq Troop Reduction and Protection Act of 2007, and his is the Iraq War De-escalation Act of 2007.

In the interview last week, Mr. Obama said that he had not wavered on Iraq since the onset of the war and that he disagreed with critics who said he had become more vocal since becoming a candidate. He said he did not deliver speeches on the topic when he first arrived in the Senate because he was taking a low-key approach in his first year in office.

"As a freshman, our objective was not to try to get in the front all the time," Mr. Obama said. "But the truth is that in that first year, we had just seen an Iraqi election, and my feeling was that while I was not optimistic, it was appropriate to try to give the nascent government a chance."

At the time, Mr. Obama was also not planning to run for president. He opened his presidential exploratory committee on Jan. 16. The next day, Mrs. Clinton presented her Iraq plan on Capitol Hill.

As he stepped into an elevator that day, reporters asked whether he would be presenting a specific Iraq proposal. "That will be coming soon," he replied. Aides went to work, formulating legislation consistent with his views from more than four years earlier. And 13 days later, on Jan. 30, his plan was introduced.

Obama Makes First Campaign Stop In Kentucky (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), February 26, 2007

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Democratic presidential hopeful U.S. Sen. Barack Obama spoke Sunday night to a crowd of at least 3,000 supporters who waited nearly two hours for him to arrive for his first campaign stop in Kentucky.

Obama apologized for the delay, saying snow in Chicago kept him from arriving sooner.

"We had a blizzard up in Chicago," Obama said. "It was snowing and sleeting and blizzarding."

"There was no way I was not going to make 3,000 people coming out," he said to audience members who paid $25 a ticket for the event. A higher dollar fund-raising event was scheduled later at the nearby Henry Clay Hotel.

Obama talked about concerns that he is too inexperienced to be president.

"Some people might ask, 'How can this guy been president? He's only been in Washington for two years.' Let me tell you, I've been in Washington long enough to see that things need to be changed," he said.

Obama touched upon the issues that he has focused on in stump speeches during his two-week old campaign education, health care, energy policy, economic policy and the war in Iraq.

Loud applause rose from the crowd each time he said, "At the end of my first term as president."

On Iraq, he called the war "ill-conceived" and said it is "distracting attention away from the war on terrorism."

He called for a phased redeployment beginning May 1 of this year and a complete pullout of combat troops by March 31, 2008.

"We cannot bring about change in Iraq militarily," he said. "What we can't do is put our young men and women in the middle of a sectarian war. It won't work."

Obama is considered among the early front-runners for the Democratic nomination with U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards.

U.S. Rep. John Yarmuth, D-Ky., appeared on stage with Obama, but said his appearance wasn't an endorsement.

"I would be here for any of the Democratic candidates," he said. "But if he's the nominee, I will be extremely enthusiastic."

A Hard Habit To Kick -- Right, Obama? (LAT)

By Allan M. Brandt

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

PRESIDENTIAL hopeful Barack Obama is trying to quit smoking. There are, of course, many good reasons to. He will significantly reduce his own risk of serious disease and that of those around him by not smoking. But clearly, one of the reasons Obama wants to quit now — beyond pressure from his wife — is that it would be widely perceived as unseemly and inappropriate to have a smoker in the White House.

Smoking has become a marginalized and often stigmatized behavior, a sign of personal weakness — which just won't do in a presidential candidate these days. A once-social behavior has become largely solitary; the fragrant has turned foul. Indeed, we've had a revolution in the meanings associated with cigarettes that has coincided with a remarkable decline in smoking.

At the time of the first U.S. surgeon general's report issued in 1964, nearly half of all adult Americans were smokers. Today, the number stands at about one in five. Nonetheless, smoking continues to exact an enormous health toll. Nearly 450,000 deaths each year in the U.S. are attributed to cigarette use.

As Obama must know, quitting is no easy matter. Most individuals attempting it have tried and failed. Even those who get the best counseling and pharmacologic treatments are likely (at a rate of about 80%) to be smoking still, or again, at the end of a year.

And it may well be getting even more difficult to quit. A recent study shows that the average dose of nicotine in a pack of cigarettes has increased by more than 10% just since 1995, a result of explicitly engineered modifications.

Yet tobacco giant Philip Morris claims that it is eager to help smokers quit. It says so on its website and in much-touted "Quit Assist" ads and booklets that offer cessation strategies to smokers. This is the brilliant contemporary formulation of an old tobacco industry yarn: any smoker can quit if they are motivated and persevere.

So, even as tobacco companies admit that smoking is harmful — a fact they denied for 40 years — they continue to assert that consenting adults assume the risks (though they don't like to get specific about what those risks are, like lung cancer and stroke). As we now know from the millions of pages of internal tobacco documents available on the Web, the industry blows smoke out of both sides of its mouth. Philip Morris has been especially eager to complete its makeover into a "responsible corporate citizen." The company gave $25 million to the University of Virginia this month to support research on, yes, smoking cessation. Meanwhile, the five major U.S. tobacco companies, including Philip Morris, spent more than $15 billion last year promoting cigarettes here.

For every American like Obama who may successfully quit, there are "replacement smokers" in foreign lands. When Americans and others in Western developed nations began quitting in greater numbers in the 1970s and 1980s, the industry ramped up its efforts abroad, often with the assistance of the U.S. trade representative. Philip Morris International now sells more than four times as many cigarettes as its American sister company.

This dramatic rise in global consumption will prove disastrous in the future, especially in poorer countries. While 100 million people worldwide died of tobacco-induced diseases in the 20th century, the World Health Organization now predicts that nearly 1 billion such deaths will occur in this century.

Yet the ability to regulate tobacco is severely limited both here and abroad. Despite a Supreme Court ruling Tuesday tossing out a $79.5-million punitive damages judgment against Philip Morris, litigation remains a critical approach to holding the companies accountable. (In this case, the award may still be reinstated or reduced.)

One new strategy is the Framework Convention for Tobacco Control, an international treaty developed by the World Health Organization to restrict tobacco use. Participating countries agree to formulate pricing, taxation, labeling and controls on advertising to promote public health.

Philip Morris worked concertedly behind the scenes during the drafting of the pact to undermine the treaty's key provisions. The chief U.S. treaty negotiator, a career public health officer, even quit in protest when the Bush administration assisted in trying to water down the final version.

The treaty has been ratified by 144 nations, with the notable exception of the U.S. The Bush administration has yet to forward it to Obama and his colleagues in the Senate.

If Obama quits, no doubt Philip Morris will be the first to congratulate him. After all, won't that prove that anyone can stop anytime he wants to? If only that were true. Then the global epidemic of tobacco deaths would be coming to a precipitous end instead of spiraling upward. As the tobacco executives know all too well, a new smoker is born every minute — and they are ready with a pack of Marlboros.

Keeping The Faith (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

Veteran Christian activist Marlene Elwell is not inclined to make political compromises. She helped engineer Pat Robertson's victory over George H. W. Bush in 1988's Iowa caucuses and led Michigan to constitutionally ban gay marriage in 2004. But after meeting with Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, interviewing California Rep. Duncan Hunter, and studying former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee-all 2008 presidential hopefuls who, like Elwell, are dyed-in-the-wool religious conservatives-she concluded that none could raise the tens of millions of dollars necessary for a competitive campaign. So she looked to the top-tier Republican candidates who were less ideologically pure on abortion and gay marriage.

Of course, that decision had its own challenges. Elwell knew she could rule out supporting ex-New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, a social liberal. She sat down with former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a onetime supporter of gay rights and abortion rights who now calls himself a staunch social conservative, but couldn't get past his "sketchy and inconsistent" record. So Elwell cast her lot with Arizona Sen. John McCain, who infuriated religious conservatives by supporting embryonic stem cell research and opposing a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. She reasoned that McCain's many antiabortion votes in the Senate made him enough of a social conservative and that he has a strong shot at actually winning. Elwell signed on, not just as a supporter but as McCain's faith outreach director. Now her task is to convince fellow Christian right activists that the senator is not the social moderate they think he is. "At first, audiences say, 'Oh, my-McCain isn't pro-life,'" Elwell says. "But after I discuss his record, they're pleasantly surprised. There are converts."

Whether McCain and the other leaders of the GOP presidential pack-Giuliani and Romney-can make enough converts among the Republican Party's base of religious conservatives may determine whether any of them can win the presidential nomination. Because of their political records and personal lives, all three have raised abundant doubts within the Christian right. And what happens next could be crucial. "One possibility is that Christian right activists coalesce around Brownback or Huckabee-if united, they would be formidable," says John Green, a scholar at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. "And if they unite against any one candidate's nomination, they could prevent him from winning the nomination." Trying to stave off either possibility, McCain and Romney-and, to a lesser extent, Giuliani-have launched Christian conservative outreach plans. But some powerful Christian right activists are skeptical. And others are determined to stop the front-runners in their tracks.

The Christian right's consternation over Giuliani, McCain, and Romney is a remarkable turnabout from 2004, when the movement was united behind the re-election of George W. Bush. White evangelicals, who made up roughly a quarter of the electorate in 2004 and 2006, accounted for nearly 4 in every 10 Bush votes. "I don't think any of the three are remotely acceptable, and I don't think I'm an outlier," says Michael Farris, a top Christian activist who organized meetings between Bush and evangelical leaders for his first presidential run. "Giuliani holds the opposite view of the Republican platform on social issues, Romney has held both sides of those issues, and McCain picked fights with us the last time he ran for president." An early February meeting of the Council for National Policy, a club of powerful social conservatives whose members include Focus on the Family founder James Dobson and Left Behind author Tim LaHaye, was thick with fretting over '08. "I've never seen more disillusionment at this point in the election in 30 years," says a source close to the Council for National Policy, which prohibits members from discussing meetings with the media. "There's a revolt out there, a feeling these top three are being pushed on us by Republican leadership in D.C."

Splits. Some heavyweights within the Council for National Policy and other conservative coalitions are weighing an effort to galvanize behind a socially conservative second-tier candidate, such as Huckabee or Brownback, in an attempt to catapult him into the top tier. "There is a very strong feeling that we have to assert ourselves or we're going to end up with somebody we can't support," says Paul Weyrich, a longtime conservative activist and cofounder of Moral Majority. Weyrich says Christian right leadership is currently split "around fifty-fifty" over whether to pursue such a plan or to adopt an every-man-for-himself approach, in which activists would gravitate toward the candidate of their choice.

A concerted attempt to steer evangelical and conservative Roman Catholic voters toward a second-tier candidate could hit Romney hardest. In reversing his support for abortion rights and gay rights, Romney's strategy is to convince right-wing Republicans leaning toward Huckabee or Brownback that he's the more viable candidate. (The plan presumes that McCain and Giuliani will fight for the votes of the Republican establishment.) "There's a big group of pragmatic social conservatives who don't want to waste their votes," says a Romney aide. "We're going to be the second choice of a lot of people who want to follow their hearts but want a strong candidate."

Of the three front-runners, Romney has been courting evangelical leaders most zealously. After a meeting at his Massachusetts home last fall with roughly 15 high-powered religious conservatives, Romney sent each attendee a wooden captain's chair mounted with a brass plaque that reads, "You are welcome at our table anytime." Because many evangelicals consider Romney's Mormonism to be a cult, he has the most to gain by winning over visible evangelical leaders. "If the person in the pulpit says [Mormonism] is a line you cannot cross, then you can't reach the person in the pew," says evangelical publicity executive Mark DeMoss, who organized the Massachusetts meeting. The courtship continued in February at the National Religious Broadcasters convention in Orlando, where DeMoss introduced Romney to closed-door sessions of Christian right activists by saying: "I've found the answer to the question of whether you can support a Mormon: It depends on who the Mormon is."

Romney has picked up support among key evangelicals, including DeMoss and Jay Sekulow, who runs the Christian legal group American Center for Law and Justice, founded by Pat Robertson. Romney's campaign has also been assiduously courting Dobson, the nation's most politically powerful evangelical leader, who announced earlier that he couldn't support McCain or Giuliani. U.S. News has learned that Romney sat down with Dobson last week at Focus's Colorado Springs, Colo., headquarters for their first getting-to-know-you session. Christian right activists say that unless Romney can win his support, Dobson-who has not met with other presidential candidates at Focus HQ-is inclined to back a second-tier candidate.

Critics. Romney has suffered among social conservatives in recent months, as activists around the country have E-mailed to one another more than a dozen memos and news clips criticizing his gubernatorial record. Among other things, the memos allege that Romney appointed liberals to fill state court vacancies and that he failed to use his executive power to stop the distribution of marriage licenses to gay couples. The Romney campaign notes that his court appointees needed approval of Democratic officials and argues that an amendment to the state Constitution to ban gay marriage, which Romney backed, was preferable to a one-time executive injunction. But many conservatives remain skeptical. " If there's anything else [social conservatives] should know, he should let them know now," says Family Research Council President Tony Perkins, who stood with Romney last fall in Massachusetts to oppose the state Supreme Court's legalization of gay marriage.

Even before recent disclosures about what an ardent gay-rights and abortion-rights supporter Romney had been, some activists were dubious of his conversion to social conservativism. "Bush had a pretty consistent record of being pro-life and pro-family-it wasn't perfect, but it was consistent," says Farris. "Romney is not even in the ballpark."

That's where the McCain campaign sees its opening. In the past month or two, McCain has hired a handful of staffers to make the case to religious conservatives that McCain's antiabortion record in the Senate makes him a trustworthy alternative to Romney. McCain recently told a South Carolina audience that Roe v. Wade should be overturned, and he has been lobbying the National Right to Life Political Action Committee for an endorsement. That effort has so far failed to bear fruit, but McCain's pitch is resonating. "One's record is a good indicator of future performance," said Perkins after emerging from a meeting with McCain at the National Religious Broadcasters conference. "The senator does have a pretty solid record on the life issues."

McCain has begun tying his support for states' rights on the issue of abortion to his view that states should decide how to deal with gay marriage. But his opposition to the so-called Marriage Protection Amendment isn't McCain's only sticking point with religious conservatives. Grass-roots groups like Focus on the Family loathe the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law because they say it restricts their ability to communicate with constituents before elections. And, despite McCain's recent buddying up with Jerry Falwell, many activists are still sore over his "agents of intolerance" excoriation of Christian conservatives in 2000. "People say, 'McCain hated us then,'" says Weyrich. "'How do we know that he doesn't still hate us?'"

Faith. Unlike Romney, an active member and former official in the Mormon Church, the Episcopal McCain rarely speaks about his religious life. That's another possible stumbling block among religious conservatives, whose favorite politicians, like George W. Bush and Ronald Reagan, discussed their faith openly. Though McCain's aides say he will avoid talking about his religion, he does, in sessions with religious conservatives, tell of his role as an unofficial chaplain among his fellow POWs during the Vietnam War.

Of course, with his well-known defense credentials, McCain stands to benefit if, in the first competitive post-9/11 Republican presidential primary, issues like abortion and gay marriage take a back seat to terrorism and national security. That certainly appears to be Giuliani's calculus. The former New York mayor has been on a hiring spree, but he hasn't brought aboard staff to court religious conservatives. (His campaign notes that Giuliani will speak at Robertson's Regent University in Virginia Beach this spring.) Giuliani has stressed that he would appoint "strict constructionists" to the judiciary, an important cause for social conservatives, and his staff says he holds some positions-like opposing gay marriage and the procedure critics call "partial-birth" abortion-that will appeal to religious conservatives. But his campaign believes the '08 Republican primary will see candidates' leadership qualities overshadow their stances on hot-button issues. "Rudy is moderate on social issues, and despite that, he's leading in the polls," says Bill Simon, a top Giuliani adviser. "This is a time when people feel uncertain about the international situation and want to know the person in the Oval Office is up to the task, even if they don't agree with him on everything."

If Giuliani winds up harnessing enough moderate Republican support to win the nomination, the GOP will have another problem on its hands: how to get evangelicals to the polls in the general election. "Evangelicals just won't vote" if Giuliani is the nominee, says the Southern Baptist Convention's Richard Land. "He'll lose Ohio, perhaps Tennessee-maybe even Texas." To Christian conservatives, it's a losing formula. But they still have to find a winning formula that includes them.

Winning With Evangelicals (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

To appreciate how much is at stake in the Republican contenders' struggles to win over evangelical voters-and in the vows of the Democratic candidates to change their party's secular image-just consider the 2004 election. In his new book The Jesus Machine: How James Dobson, Focus on the Family, and Evangelical America Are Winning the Culture War, U.S. News Senior Editor Dan Gilgoff details how George W. Bush's evangelical outreach machine, and John Kerry's failure to connect with evangelicals and other religious voters, may have determined the outcome.

Despite the unprecedented get-out-the-vote efforts being organized by evangelical groups like Focus on the Family, the Bush-Cheney 2004 campaign wasn't taking any chances. After the 2000 election debacle, which saw Bush lose the popular vote, White House political don Karl Rove estimated publicly that 4 million white evangelical voters had stayed home on Election Day 2000. He vowed to reinvigorate them for 2004. No other demographic that size would consistently pull the Republican lever.

But rather than blame the Bush-Cheney 2000 campaign for the depressed evangelical turnout that year, the Bush-Cheney 2004 re-election team pointed the finger at evangelical groups like Focus on the Family. In the eyes of the Bushies, such groups claimed huge followings but had failed to get them to the polls four years earlier. Said one Bush-Cheney '04 official: "Because the ball was dropped so precipitously in 2000, [evangelical mobilization] had to be brought inside."

Officials inside Focus on the Family's public policy shop argued that they had been much less gung-ho about mobilizing evangelical voters in 2000 than in 2004 because candidate Bush was something of an unknown quantity; he promoted "compassionate conservatism" and a "big tent" GOP rather than play up antiabortion and antigay rights themes. "We didn't really know George Bush till he was inaugurated," said Focus on the Family public policy director Tom Minnery. "At that inauguration, he had Franklin Graham ... there were church hymns being sung. It was a Christian service was what it was."

Creating motivation. Focus on the Family officials also noted that at the time of the 2000 election, Massachusetts hadn't yet legalized gay marriage, and the proposed amendment to the Constitution banning gay marriage hadn't yet emerged as a key issue. Evangelicals, in other words, had fewer reasons to be motivated for Bush in 2000.

But Bush's re-election team had a different theory. When Ralph Reed left Christian Coalition after the 1996 election, the organization-which had boasted an $8.5 million budget and a thousand nationwide chapters-more or less collapsed. Membership dwindled and the group fell into debt. But, the Bushies theorized, neither GOP strategists nor Christian right groups had appreciated the vacuum in voter mobilization efforts left by Christian Coalition's implosion until the exit polls came back from 2000. "People trusted that there was still a Christian Coalition getting out the vote," said one Bush-Cheney '04 official. "But Christian Coalition had fallen apart, and no one else had picked up the slack yet."

So in 2004, the Bush team vowed to take evangelical mobilization into its own hands. In 2000, the Bush campaign had outsourced evangelical outreach to the consulting firm that Ralph Reed launched after leaving Christian Coalition. In 2004, Bush's campaign instead hired Reed to work from the inside. Officially, he was the Bush-Cheney chairman for the southeast region of the United States. But his more important assignment was to construct a vast volunteer infrastructure, extending into tens of thousands of voter precincts, to get evangelicals to the polls. "It was very new in terms of ... full-scale investment in this particular demographic," said Gary Marx, who worked under Reed as the Bush-Cheney 2004 national conservative coalition director. "It was the first time in Republican political history that the presidential campaign was run in such a way that this was a formalized element in everything we did, from radio buys to direct mail. ... It was a demographic group that was courted ... just as soccer moms were in 2000 and NASCAR dads in 2002."

Bush-Cheney headquarters sent the names of unregistered churchgoers back to volunteers across the country, who would call their evangelical neighbors and urge them to register. Some volunteers even offered to deliver registration forms and absentee ballots. Asked how many new voters the Bush campaign registered this way, Marx estimated the figure to be "in the range of millions."

Between the efforts of the Bush-Cheney campaign, the RNC, and outside groups like Focus on the Family, Rove nearly met his goal of turning out 4 million more evangelicals in 2004. Exit polls showed that 3.5 million white evangelicals who stayed home in 2000 cast ballots in 2004. Bush also captured a larger share of the evangelical vote in 2004-78 percent-than in 2000, when 68 percent backed him. Between new evangelical voters and those who had voted for Gore in 2000, Bush picked up nearly 6 million new evangelical votes, about twice his margin of victory.

Of course, to the true believers who built Bush's 2004 evangelical voter machine, there was more than demographics at work in his re-election. "Prayer was a hugely important part of the strategy," said Olsen, the Florida chairwoman for social conservative outreach. "I prayed that people not be persuaded by their pocketbooks [at the voting booth] but that ... they voted as if God was to come down and vote."

By April 2004, The John Kerry campaign had hired a born-again Christian and ex-Howard Dean aide named Mara Vanderslice to be its religious outreach director. At that point in the election cycle, Reed had been at work for six months assembling his evangelical outreach machine for President Bush. He had appointed chairpersons for social conservative outreach in battleground states. He had signed up tens of thousands of evangelical volunteers. Reed had begun collecting church directories to sign up new evangelical voters.

Vanderslice's operation inside the Kerry campaign was more modest. It comprised herself, then 29, and an unpaid intern. She had no volunteer lists. Except for Kerry's appearances before African-American congregations, the campaign had resolved to stay out of churches. "They didn't have any vision at all," Vanderslice said of the campaign's religious outreach strategy. "I just kind of had to make it up."

There were six months till Election Day.

Even before Kerry emerged as the Democratic front-runner, he had drawn fire from a handful of Catholic bishops. St. Louis Archbishop Raymond Burke said he would refuse to give Holy Communion to Kerry, a former altar boy and lifelong Catholic, because he was pro-choice. A Colorado Springs bishop went so far as to instruct Catholic voters who backed candidates supportive of abortion rights to forgo Communion.

Kerry was surprised and hurt by the attacks, according to aides. "I've met with many bishops ... on this very subject before and after the campaign," he said after the election. "And key prelates in the church have indicated to me that nowhere in canon law is there any refusal of the Eucharist to a parishioner." Still, Kerry responded swiftly at the time in the news media, expressing his respect for the bishops while affirming his own Catholic commitment and his opposition to "legislating articles of faith."

But beyond Kerry's own reactions in the press, his campaign declined to dispatch credible Catholic figures in his defense or to reach out to Catholics with Kerry's response. The way the story was playing out in the media, it was easy to infer that a rift had opened between Kerry and the Roman Catholic Church he claimed to belong to. "There were many conversations about it, but there was a lot of fear and indecision about how to respond," Vanderslice said. "[N]ot having some backup within the broader Catholic community made [the campaign] even more timid." The Kerry campaign decided to ignore the bishops.

Kerry's privacy. But one of Vanderslice's goals remained getting Kerry to open up about his faith. She noticed that Kerry's appearance at Ronald Reagan's funeral in June 2004, where he crossed himself over Reagan's coffin, went a long way in making religious people comfortable with him. "People were longing to understand ... what was guiding him," Vanderslice said. But Kerry was reluctant to discuss his faith, in contrast to President Bush, whose tale of conversion from drunk to born-again was well known.

It wasn't until 10 days before Election Day that Kerry delivered his so-called faith and values speech. At a stop in Florida, Kerry quoted from all four Gospels and the Ten Commandments. He spoke of how his Catholicism played into his upbringing and his service in the Vietnam War. He explained the Catholic notion of the "common good." The Washington Post called it "perhaps the most overtly religious speech of the campaign by either candidate."

Vanderslice welcomed the speech, but thought it came much too late. She had tried for months to insert religious themes into message development, but was stymied by senior campaign officials. She also felt that Kerry's "faith and values" speech was delivered in the wrong venue: to a largely Jewish audience in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. Vanderslice had long pressed for Kerry to appear in an overtly Christian setting, like an evangelical or Catholic college, but she met with resistance from the campaign.

The Kerry campaign's fears about its religious outreach effort backfiring seemed to be vindicated in June 2004, when the conservative Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights issued a press release attacking Kerry for hiring Vanderslice. It assailed Vanderslice for her involvement with her college's Socialist Alliance and noted her role as an organizer for World Trade Organization and World Bank protests.

After the Catholic League attack, Vanderslice was barred by the Kerry campaign from speaking to the press. She had been hired barely a month earlier. When the Catholic League later criticized the religious outreach director for the Democratic National Committee, that person was silenced as well. The result was that the Democrats' ties to the religious press were completely severed. "Reporters from the religious press ... didn't get their phone calls returned for two or three months," Vanderslice said.

That helps explain why Christianity Today's October 2004 John Kerry profile read like a hatchet job. The magazine noted that the Democratic nominee invoked God's name just once in the three days that its reporter rode aboard the campaign's press plane, and then in a secular context. Denied an interview with Kerry, Christianity Today resorted to citing his 1998 interview with American Windsurfer magazine as a source for "some of his most detailed public comments about his theological ideals." The story skewered Kerry's support for abortion rights and gay rights.

Barred from speaking to the press, Vanderslice focused on organizing grass-roots religious volunteers. The Bush campaign signed up more than 300,000 conservative religious volunteers; Vanderslice worked with a national volunteer list of 700. Rather than actively court volunteers, she simply tried to keep up with the calls and E-mails from religious Kerry supporters. They were requesting everything from bumper stickers and buttons to talking points on why Catholics could support Kerry despite the criticisms he'd received from Catholic bishops.

In addition to losing the evangelical vote by the most lopsided margin on record for a presidential candidate, election returns showed that Kerry became the first Democratic presidential candidate in memory to lose the Catholic vote, despite his own Catholicism.

In the crucial battleground of Ohio, Kerry won only about 1 in 3 weekly churchgoers. Two years later, in the 2006 midterms, successful Ohio Democratic Senate candidate Sherrod Brown would increase his share of weekly churchgoers to 48 percent. Had Kerry done that well among those Ohioans, he'd be in the White House today.

Edwards' Campaign Rides On Iowa (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, February 26, 2007

If any candidate inherits something from Tom Vilsack's departure from the Democratic presidential campaign, it's John Edwards.

What he gets: Pressure.

The former Iowa governor's campaign hinged on winning his home state's caucuses, the start of a fiercely competitive nominating gauntlet. Vilsack's decision Friday to quit the race shifts much of the burden of expectations in the caucuses to Edwards, the front-runner in early Iowa polls.

"Edwards has as much or more riding on the Iowa's outcome as any of the others," University of Iowa political science professor Peverill Squire said.

The former North Carolina senator's popularity among Iowa party activists has endured since his strong second-place finish in the 2004 caucuses, and survived losing the vice presidency and the entry of new, nationally popular rivals into the 2008 race.

He's not entirely the same Edwards that Iowans remember from his 2004 campaign. He has moved noticeably to the left since then, disavowing his support for the 2002 Senate resolution authorizing military force in Iraq.

He also now embraces a broad policy to provide health care to all Americans after supporting a more incremental approach in 2004.

Edwards' success at recapturing the Iowa momentum that vaulted him to contention in 2004 depends on Iowans' willingness to accept these changes and embrace Edwards, once the fresh face in the field, as a familiar face.

Edwards rejected the idea that Vilsack's withdrawal puts particular pressure on him to win in Iowa.

"It raises expectations for everyone," he said in a Des Moines Register interview Saturday.

"Other candidates might have used it as an excuse for not doing well," he added, referring to Vilsack's presence in the race. "That excuse is now gone."

But almost every poll of likely Democratic caucusgoers in Iowa taken in the past year has shown Edwards on top.

Whether his early lead in Iowa has been a factor of residual loyalty to his 2004 campaign or Edwards' vigilant attention to Iowa since then, his status as the Iowa front-runner is enhanced by Vilsack's withdrawal, Squire said.

New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama "could carry on with only a reasonable finish in Iowa," Squire said. "But for Edwards, he really does need to land a knockout blow in Iowa to have the momentum he needs to carry him to the next couple of states."

Edwards has visited Iowa more often than any prospective presidential candidate in either party since the 2004 election.

Edwards' continued commitment to the theme that sparked his rise during the 2004 Iowa campaign is more important to Davenport Democrat Bev Strayhall, an Edwards supporter, than his repeated visits to Iowa over the past two years.

He has continued to hone the message that Americans ought to do more to improve the lives of the poor.

"He didn't just use that as a platform to run. Thank God he kept talking about it because when Katrina hit, people said, 'Oh, yeah. There it is,' " said Strayhall said, referring to the attention the 2005 hurricane shone on poverty in the Gulf Coast.

Edwards left elected office two years ago, after deciding in 2003 not to seek re-election to the U.S. Senate, where he served just one term.

Since then, he has traveled widely to key political states, helping candidates raise money for the 2006 midterm elections and campaigning for ballot initiatives to increase the minimum wage.

Edwards also moved back to North Carolina from Washington, D.C., in 2005 and helped establish a public policy institute at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill that researches poverty's causes and possible remedies.

In November 2005, Edwards wrote an op-ed column for the Washington Post in which he called his support for the resolution a mistake.

As a candidate for president this year, he has broadened his critique of the war to include the Democrat-controlled Congress, calling any action short of ending the war "betrayal."

Edwards' reversal on the war does not discourage Iowa City Democrat Lisa Fender from considering him as her choice in the caucuses.

His stance on the war, which has drawn attention to Clinton's refusal to call her vote a mistake, is a mark of Edwards' "humanity," Fender said.

"Whether it's a political move or not, he's saying he was wrong in plain terms. We want someone to admit when they were wrong, because we don't have that now," she said. "It doesn't suggest weakness. It suggests humility and part of being human."

Fender is undecided about whom she will support in the caucuses, now less than 11 months away. She is weighing Clinton, Edwards and Obama.

Despite Edwards' shifts on the war and health care, he has remained at or near the top of Iowa polls.

One survey in January showed Clinton ahead, while another showed Edwards and Obama tied for the early Iowa lead.

Most polls, however, have resembled one published last week, in which Edwards received support from 24 percent likely Democratic caucusgoers, compared to 18 percent for Clinton and Obama.

It's too early to say whether Edwards will inherit supporters, donors and staff from the defunct Vilsack campaign. He has hired Jennifer O'Malley to run his Iowa campaign. O'Malley was a top Iowa staffer for Edwards in 2004. The campaign expects to add roughly two dozen staff to the Iowa organization in the coming weeks, Edwards advisers said.

A lot can happen in the months before the caucuses, Edwards said. "I think we would expect to be competitive if the caucus were held today, but the caucus is not held today," he said. "We have a long campaign in front of us and I've been through this before."

Gore's Global Warming Doc Wins Oscar (AP)

By Gary Gentile, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 26, 2007

"An Inconvenient Truth," the documentary that turned former vice president Al Gore's power-point presentation on global warming into an engaging and entertaining film, won the Oscar Sunday night.

The best-documentary win was a triumph for Gore, who has kept a sense of humor about his loss in the 2000 election that was decided in George W. Bush's favor by a U.S. Supreme Court decision.

"I am Al Gore. I used to be the next president of the United States of America," Gore says in the film, repeating a line he has used often.

Sunday, Gore used the Oscar win not to further his political career but to boost his campaign to find solutions for global warming and other environmental problems.

"My fellow Americans," Gore said to laughter from the crowd. "People all over the world, we need to solve the climate crisis. It's not a political issue, it's a moral issue. We have everything we need to get started with the possible will to act. That's a renewable resource. Let's renew it."

Earlier in the evening, Gore and Leonardo DiCaprio took the stage to unveil a series of efforts the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences took to make this year's awards more environmentally friendly.

Pressed by DiCaprio about any other major announcement he might like to make, the former vice president pulled out a statement.

"My fellow Americans, I'm going to take this opportunity right here and now, to formally announce my intentions to ..." Gore said before the orchestra broke in and he walked off, arm-in-arm and laughing, with DiCaprio.

Backstage, Gore put speculation to rest, saying "I do not have plans to become a candidate for office again."

Instead, Gore said he was dedicating all his efforts to pressuring governments to act on climate-crisis issues.

"It is the overriding world challenge of our time," Gore said. "I really hope the decision by the academy to honor the work by director Davis Guggenheim and these producers will convince people who did not go see it before to see the movie and learn about the climate crisis and become a part of the solution."

Party Talk (NY)

New Yorker, February 26, 2007

"Saturday Night Live" is erratic in middle age but rarely cruel. An exception came late last spring, when, at the stroke of eleven-thirty, an NBC announcer gravely told the American people to stand by for a "message from the President of the United States," and Al Gore, surrounded by Oval Office knickknacks, came into focus to deliver what could best be described as an interim report from a parallel, and happier, galaxy. President Gore reviewed some of his actions and their unintended consequences:

In the last six years we have been able to stop global warming. No one could have predicted the negative results of this. Glaciers that once were melting are now on the attack. As you know, these renegade glaciers have already captured parts of upper Michigan and northern Maine. But I assure you: we will not let the glaciers win.

Nor was this the only problem. Although Social Security had been repaired, the cost had been high: the budget surplus was "down to a perilously low eleven trillion dollars." The price of gas had dropped to nineteen cents a gallon, and the oil companies were hurting. ("I know that I am partly to blame by insisting that cars run on trash.") After winning the plaudits of a grateful world—and turning Afghanistan into a premier "spring-break destination"—Americans could no longer risk travelling abroad, for fear of "getting hugged." Even the national pastime was in danger. "But," Gore added hopefully, "I have faith in baseball commissioner George W. Bush when he says, 'We will find the steroid users if we have to tap every phone in America!' "

The cruelty here was not to Gore, who probably requires no prompting to brood now and then about what might have been, but to the audience. It is worse than painful to reflect on how much better off the United States and the world would be today if the outcome of the 2000 election had been permitted to correspond with the wishes of the electorate. The attacks of September 11, 2001, would likely not have been avoided, though there is ample evidence, in the 9/11 Commission report and elsewhere, that Gore and his circle were far more alert to the threat of Islamist terrorism than Bush and his. But can anyone seriously doubt that a Gore Administration would have meant, well, an alternate universe, in which, say, American troops were sent on a necessary mission in Afghanistan but not on a mistaken and misbegotten one in Iraq; the fate of the earth, not the fate of oil-company executives, was the priority of the Environmental Protection Agency; civil liberties and diplomacy were subjects of attention rather than of derision; torture found no place or rationale?

In increasing numbers, poll results imply, Americans are disheartened by the real and existing Presidency, and no small number also feel regret that Gore—the winner in 2000 of the popular vote by more than half a million ballots, the almost certain winner of any reasonable or consistent count in the state of Florida—ended up the target of what it is not an exaggeration to call a judicial coup d'état. Justice Antonin Scalia routinely instructs those who question his vote in Bush v. Gore to stop their ceaseless whinging. "It's water over the deck," he told an audience at Iona College last month. "Get over it." But it is neither possible nor wise to "get over it." The historical damage is too profound.

And yet, despite the burden of injury and injustice, Gore, more than any other major Democratic Party figure, including the many candidates assembled for next year's Presidential nomination, has demonstrated in opposition precisely the quality of judgment that Bush has lacked in office. Gore's critiques of the Administration's rush to war in Iraq and of the deceptions used to justify it were early, brave, and correct. On the issue of climate change, of course, he has exercised visionary leadership. With humor and intelligence, and negligible self-pity, he dispensed with the temptations of political martyrdom and became a global Jeremiah. Beginning in the nineteen-eighties, he waged what was at first a fairly lonely campaign to draw attention to the problem; now, as a popularizing propagandist, he has succeeded in registering it as a crisis with nearly everyone, from field-tripping schoolchildren to reality-dubious members of the Administration. With his documentary film, "An Inconvenient Truth," Gore made the undeniability of the crisis a matter of consensus; thanks largely to him, an environmental issue will be an electoral issue. His secular evangelism has earned him an honored night at the Academy Awards and—almost as glittering—a nomination for the Nobel Peace Prize.

For the moment, Gore has absented himself from the 2008 Presidential race with a deliberately provisional explanation: He has no plans to be a candidate. He doesn't expect to be a candidate. (Or, as he satirized his language for Jay Leno when talking about his future in the movies, "I just want to clarify: I have no plans to do a nude scene. I have no intention to do a nude scene. I don't expect to do a nude scene. But I haven't made a Shermanesque statement about it.")

Gore's reluctance is understandable. The balloting in Iowa and New Hampshire is nearly a year away. He is in no rush. He may have shared Bill Clinton's love of policymaking but not his relish for full-immersion politicking. In the view of former aides still close to him, Gore can't lose by staying on the electoral sidelines. While Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama start competing—warily at first, and then, inevitably, taking direct aim at one another's weaknesses—Gore can stand unbruised, nursing the lingering glamour of his popular margin in 2000 and, perhaps, demanding by quiet inference that we take stock of a distinguished public career that began three decades ago, when Gore was a twenty-eight-year-old Vietnam veteran freshly elected to Congress.

If only to take an honest man's word for it, Gore's entry into the race is unlikely. Clinton, Obama, Bill Richardson, John Edwards, Joseph Biden, Christopher Dodd—the field already provides a pool of talent and a range of possibilities infinitely more encouraging than the status quo. Moreover, the nomination and election of any one of the first three would take America a long way toward keeping the unfulfilled promise of "We the people"—not least because the appeal of all three is based only incidentally upon gender, race, or ethnic heritage.

If the next few months produce an obvious and relatively intact nominee, fine. Gore can stay active in his new role, and perhaps carry that role further, as a kind of climate czar in a Democratic Administration. But, as someone once said, stuff happens. The campaign may get nasty quickly. Clinton's Iraq position may prove untenable in any of its iterations. Obama's youthful charisma may look like inexperience after prolonged exposure to electoral gamesmanship. David Geffen might grow claws. A year is a very long time in politics, especially in the circular shooting contests that the Democrats so often convene.

There will still be Gore, patient and untrammelled. In any case, he will not have embarrassed himself. Post-lock-box, he has developed a keener sense of that. When the writers at "Saturday Night Live" suggested that he take part in a sketch featuring some scatological themes, Gore demurred with a combination of ironic self-preservation and his customary good judgment. "I'm sure this is funny," he said, "but at the end of this I want to have some bread crumbs left leading back to my dignity."

Warner Backs McCain (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has been among the staunchest supporters of President Bush's effort to increase troop levels in Iraq, is set to receive the endorsement of one of the most prominent critics of the "surge" plan.

Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) will announce his support of McCain's 2008 presidential bid today, lending the name of one of the chamber's most respected old bulls to the Republican frontrunner's developing Capitol Hill support.

In a brief interview, Warner, a former Armed Services chairman and one-time secretary of the Navy, cited his long personal history with McCain — as well as the importance of national security issues in the 2008 campaign — as the chief factors that led to his endorsement.

"To me, voters are going to seek out that candidate, be it Republican or Democrat, that's got the proven credentials on issues that concern security abroad and here at home," Warner said.

McCain, a Naval aviator who spent five and a half years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was released from captivity in 1973 while Warner was serving as Navy Secretary.

Warner recalled that on his trips to Vietnam as secretary, he would stop in Hawaii to be briefed by Adm. John McCain Sr., Sen. McCain's father who was commander in chief of the U.S. Pacific Command at the time.

"Of the people who worked with me in that period ... he was one of the most valued advisers that I had in that intense period of the war," Warner said of the senior McCain. "He was absolutely superb."

In recent weeks, however, Warner has been the chief GOP spokesman in the Senate against Bush's latest Iraq War strategy, going so far as to draft a bipartisan resolution that expressed that opposition.

McCain and his two main rivals for the 2008 GOP nod, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, support the president's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

But while Warner and McCain have been on opposite ends of the surge debate, the two men have a long history of shared causes.

Warner noted that his "fierce battles" against McCain on the Senate floor only served to boost their mutual respect.

DOJ_NMG_0136381

"We've gone toe-to-toe together and we've gone arm-and-arm together," Warner said. "I think that strengthens the relationship."

In the previous Congress, McCain and Warner were instrumental members of the "Gang of 14," which sought to avert a Senate showdown over judicial nominations.

Also, Warner and McCain backed now-Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott's (R-Miss.) leadership bid last fall. Lott is now one of McCain's most active presidential backers.

Last week, McCain's campaign rolled out the endorsements of Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) and Rep. Chip Pickering (R-Miss.), both of whom are close to Lott and are far more conservative than Warner.

While political insiders debate the ultimate worth and impact of Congressional endorsements, McCain's campaign has been steadily adding to its ranks after getting off to what was perceived as a slow start.

Romney was most aggressive out of the gate in January in garnering Hill supporters and some Republican observers have privately speculated that McCain's team was caught off-guard initially.

With the addition of Warner, McCain now has eight backers in the Senate and 17 in the House, with more to come soon. Both Romney's and Giuliani's support is rooted almost entirely in the House.

In a recent interview, McCain acknowledged he has been slow to add Congressional endorsements, saying he's been preoccupied by the Senate debate over Bush's troop proposal. McCain took a leading role in the discussions as one of the top supporters of the plan.

"I am working on it," McCain said of lining up backers. "I've been working so much on Iraq, I haven't had as much time meeting with people. I'll take some time when the Iraq debate dies down a little."

He also said that Congressional endorsements were less about numbers and more about the weight those supporters carry back home.

While Giuliani has been out front in most public polls that tested the GOP field, McCain's national security credentials, political apparatus and leftover support from his unsuccessful 2000 bid put him first among most political handicappers in the race for the 2008 nod. Still, McCain's thorny relationship with social conservatives remains the biggest wild card in his path to the nomination.

Romney, who is the least-known of all three top contenders, began a TV ad campaign last week to boost his profile.

Meanwhile, McCain also has recently announced the support of several people with ties to Capitol Hill.

Former Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), who was defeated for re-election last year, will chair McCain's campaign in Ohio and former Sen. Warren Rudman (R-N.H.) will be a co-chairman of his national exploratory committee. DeWine was a member of the Gang of 14 along with McCain.

Last week, McCain also got the backing of Indiana Gov. Mitch Daniels (R), a former Office of Management and Budget director, and moderate Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.).

Intensive Care For RomneyCare (WSJ)

By Sally C. Pipes

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Presidential hopeful John Edwards recently unveiled a plan for universal health care, proving that the bad idea of raising taxes on employers and forcing individuals to purchase insurance holds bipartisan appeal. Before others get carried away with this model, they should take a look at its most recent manifestation in Massachusetts.

When then-Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, introduced a universal health-insurance plan in the Bay State early last year, it was widely acclaimed. But less than a year after passage, RomneyCare is in the intensive care unit, soon to be wheeled into hospice.

The first signs of trouble appeared last August. In a filing to support general obligation bonds, officials projected that the new plan would increase state government health-care spending by $276.4 million in 2007. That's $151 million more than what the public had been told the plan would cost. Meanwhile, the state's new bureaucracy, busily signing up people for free care, has run into trouble finding affordable plans for those who have to pay. The premiums for subsidized plans would consume up to 6% of a person's income -- prompting calls from activists and echoes from politicians that they should be exempted from the individual mandate. So much for universal coverage.

Reality fully hit in late January of this year, when private insurers submitted bids to the bureaucracy that would administer the new program. The average premium for the unsubsidized plans was not $200 per month -- as Mr. Romney promised from the stump -- but rather $380. That's more than 15% of the target audiences' income -- and for a plan with a $2,000 deductible and a total cost sharing of $5,000. People were stunned, outraged. Naturally, "greedy" private insurers were blamed. Politicians called for price controls.

Interestingly, monthly premiums of $325 were forecast by insurers cited in an April 6, 2006 article in the Boston Globe entitled "Health Bill Premiums May Exceed Prediction." At the time, Romney administration consultant and MIT economist Jonathan Gruber, who helped design the plan and now advises the bureaucracy, dismissed the predictions.

There's a slim chance that the new Democratic governor Deval Patrick and the Democratic legislature will implement this plan and enforce the mandate. But if they do, an individual with a $30,000 income would be on the hook for 32% of his or her income before being fully covered by insurance. Yet there is an equally small chance that the politicians will deregulate the state's insurance market.

Regulators are however settling in comfortably to their jobs, dictating health-insurance design by creating the standards for Minimum Creditable Coverage (MCC) that individuals must meet to avoid paying the fine. If these standards are implemented, they would render illegal roughly 200,000 high-deductible policies currently in force -- exactly the sort of insurance that makes sense for the self-employed and young individuals.

Meanwhile, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has introduced an even more comprehensive plan to guarantee universal coverage. The $12 billion plan includes individual and employer mandates, expansion of Medi-Cal and Healthy Families, and a tax on doctors and hospitals. If enacted, Californians will face higher taxes, a much larger bureaucracy and increased spending. And I predict the problem of the uninsured will not be solved.

Libertarian Candidate In '88, Paul Eyes GOP Nomination (NH)

By Benjamin Kepple

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 26, 2007

CONCORD – U.S. Rep. Ron Paul, R-Texas, brought his anti-war and limited government message to a gathering of largely like-minded activists here yesterday, and condemned the Republican establishment for forsaking principles it claims to uphold.

Paul, who ran as the Libertarian Party's presidential candidate in 1988, is now exploring a run for the Republican Party's presidential nomination. Should he decide to enter the race, he would prove a long shot at best, and run at a considerable disadvantage in terms of fundraising. The Texas congressman said yesterday he believed his message would garner support from those upset about how the nation is now run.

"The message is always the same - government intrusion into our lives is way too much," said Paul prior to his talk. "I think the Republicans have failed to live up to their commitments to smaller government."

On the national scene, Paul, a physician, largely toils in obscurity, although The Washington Post last year wrote a profile which mentioned his nickname, "Dr. No." This sobriquet referred to Paul's general opposition to spending proposals and other measures he considers outside the government's Constitutional scope.

Paul - who had been in New Hampshire since Thursday - found himself treated like a rock star at yesterday's event, and a couple of hundred people were on hand to hear him speak at the Free State Project's New Hampshire Liberty Forum. About half the 350 people who attended the days-long conference, at the Holiday Inn on North Main Street, were from New Hampshire, organizers said.

Paul, who received a standing ovation before and after his remarks, touched on many points during his address. For instance, he noted his long-standing opposition to the war in Iraq, which he said stemmed from his belief there was no security threat to America and the vote authorizing the war represented an illegal transfer of power to the president. He also called for the United States to withdraw from Iraq.

"The worst thing that could happen to al-Qaeda is for that war to end," Paul said.

Among other issues, Paul also voiced support for abandoning the war on drugs, allowing gold and silver to serve as legal tender, repealing the Seventeenth Amendment €" which lets voters directly elect U.S. Senators €" and ending the practice of withholding taxes from one's pay. Instead, taxpayers would have to actually write checks to pay their taxes, a move Paul figured would soon end what he called the present tax-and-spend philosophy of government.

Yesterday, Paul said he planned to take part in a debate among Republican presidential candidates scheduled for Apr. 4. However, he said he was still unsure about whether he would actually throw his hat into the ring.

"If this exploratory committee doesn't go well, maybe I ought to consider moving here and running (in) a statewide race," Paul said, to cheers.

War Critic Speaks From Heart Of Bush Country (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0136383

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 26, 2007

KEARNEY, Neb. — Jeff Strong, a recently retired National Guardsman and "rock-ribbed Republican," churned with conflicting emotions as he sat in an auditorium at the University of Nebraska at Kearney, waiting for Sen. Chuck Hagel.

Strong personifies the dilemma for many residents in this state, where President Bush captured two-thirds of the vote in 2004. Strong is uncomfortable with the role Hagel, the state's Republican senior senator, has taken in criticizing Bush's war plans. "I just don't understand how his anti-war rhetoric is helping to stabilize Iraq," said Strong, a postal worker.

Yet Strong is less enthusiastic about Bush, who got his vote two years ago. Hagel, who served in the infantry in Vietnam, gets "the benefit of the doubt because he's been on the ground," Strong said. "The people running the country now, they haven't been on the ground. They haven't suffered. They just played with people's lives."

Such sentiments in this Great Plains community are an indication of the challenge facing Bush as Congress returns this week with more confrontations in store on Iraq.

In the Senate, Democrats will try to revoke the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq. Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., said Sunday on Meet the Press that legislation he is drafting would remove most combat troops from Iraq by next year. In the House, Democrats are working on requirements for equipping and resting troops that would make it harder for Bush to send as many to Iraq as he'd like.

So far, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has been able to hold the line in the Senate, where it takes 60 votes to move legislation. How long he can continue to do so remains an open question, given doubts that are arising in Bush country.

The president has been enormously popular in Nebraska. Only Utah, Wyoming and Idaho gave him larger margins of victory in the last presidential election. But Hagel has not only emerged as a leading critic of the administration's foreign policy, he's also flirting with running for president next year — possibly on a hybrid ticket that would include a Democrat.

"If I decide to get into this, I would run not just to make a statement," Hagel, 60, said in an interview last week.

He said that if he ran he would seek the Republican nomination. Yet he's also talking up Unity08. That's a plan by a bipartisan group of political operatives to draft a bipartisan presidential ticket on the Internet and offer voters an alternative to the Democratic and Republican candidates next year.

"I think it's a very intriguing enterprise," Hagel said. He said most Americans are disenchanted with the major political parties.

Despite his own stated misgivings, Hagel voted with 76 other senators in October 2002 to give Bush the authority to go to war in Iraq. He said he did so after being assured by the president and his advisers that "he was going to use that leverage to get the diplomatic effort on track."

Since then, Hagel has become a prominent critic of Bush's policies in Iraq and the Middle East generally. This culminated in an impassioned speech last month in a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing when he challenged his colleagues to take a stand on a resolution he co-sponsored disapproving of the president's planned troop increase in Iraq. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes," he said.

When his resolution hit the floor of the Senate, Hagel voted first against and then for allowing the debate to proceed. The first vote was an act of party loyalty, he said. He wanted to give Senate GOP leader McConnell negotiating leverage to win a vote on a separate resolution expressing opposition to cutting funds for troops in Iraq.

Hagel acknowledged that the vote McConnell was seeking was intended to "embarrass the other party," but argued, "Why not have the debate that we all say we want, let the resolutions come, let them be debated and let the American people sort it out?"

When it appeared that wasn't going to happen, he and other Republican war critics switched their votes, but the effort to force debate on a resolution of disapproval still fell four votes short of 60.

In Nebraska last week, Hagel warned that Bush's troop increase will plunge U.S. soldiers into "a vat of chaos." In his speech at Kearney, Hagel turned his attention to Iran and accused the administration of blowing a chance to win a "pro-American generation" of young Iranians. Instead of saber rattling over Iran's nuclear ambitions, Hagel said, the administration should open a consulate in Tehran.

Hagel has irked the White House. "I believe firmly in Ronald Reagan's '11th Commandment': Thou shalt not speak ill of a fellow Republican," Vice President Cheney told Newsweek magazine in an interview this month. "But it's very hard sometimes to adhere to that where Chuck Hagel is involved."

At home, however, Hagel seems to be paying no great political price for his apostasy. While there have been some angry letters to the editor of the Omaha World-Herald, no Republican has emerged to challenge Hagel next year, when he will be up for election to a third term.

In fact, Republican leaders ranging from McConnell to Nebraska Gov. Dave Heineman to the state GOP chairman, Mark Quandahl, say they want Hagel to run again.

Hagel's continued popularity in Republican circles is in part a reflection of his work at shoring up his base. Quandahl said the senator has been "very helpful" in recruiting candidates and raising money for the party. It may also be a sign that more Nebraskans are beginning to share Hagel's Iraq concerns.

Bob Lucas, a private investigator who attended Hagel's speech in Kearney, supported Bush in the 2004 election but said "I'm not sure I do now." Bush is "too rigid" in his foreign policy, Lucas said. "I agree with Hagel that talking with people doesn't cost anything."

The state's Republican governor, a longtime Hagel friend, said his constituents tend to be more tolerant of criticism when it comes from a Vietnam War vet. Hagel brings "an unusual insight that needs to be respected," Heineman said.

Heineman acknowledged that more Nebraskans are questioning the president. Nevertheless, Hagel "has lost a lot of support out here, no question about it," he said. "There's a lot of nervousness. A lot of people don't want to lose this war and yet, the concern is, is there a way to win it?"

Which 2008 Candidates Are Most Web Savvy? (NSWK)

By Daren Briscoe

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

In the early race for 2008, most national polls have Hillary Clinton thumping Democratic rival Barack Obama by double digits. But the junior senator from Illinois can take comfort in at least one tally: MySpace, apparently, is Obama country. About 48,000 members of the wildly popular social-networking site have added Obama to their online profiles as a "friend," while only 25,000 have "friended" Clinton. It may seem a trivial statistic. But to the political junkies who run techPresident.com, a new "group blog" that obsessively follows how the presidential campaign is playing on the Internet, no Web trend is too small to track.

Micah Sifry, the site's cofounder and editor, says he's trying to make sense of "how candidates are using the Web and how the Web is using them." A lot has changed since the 2004 campaign, when Howard Dean helped pioneer a new kind of Net politicking, creating an online community of supporters that ultimately brought in $27 million and redefined campaign fund-raising. Now all candidates—drawn by the Web's potential to help get their message out, yet leery of its ability to magnify the smallest mistake—are Web savvy. (Or at least they hire people who are.) Sifry is trying to make sense of it: "We want to be an interpreter, to help people understand how the Internet is changing politics on a daily basis."

The trick is doing that without being accused of being a stooge for one side or the other. TechPresident's stable of bloggers includes Zephyr Teachout, the Internet director of Dean's 2004 campaign, and Mike Turk, the e-campaign director for Bush-Cheney 2004. Sifry, a former political reporter for the left-wing Nation magazine, forbids techPresident bloggers from making "partisan" arguments. "If we have a bias, it's toward making campaigns to make smarter use of the Web," he says. (TechPresident is financed by cofounder Andrew Rasiej and doesn't pay bloggers.) In recent posts, the site critiqued a photo of Bill and Hillary Clinton in a fund-raising e-mail (too much Bill, not enough Hill); praised John Edwards for linking to 24 different social-networking sites on his homepage ("I like the spaghetti tactic—let's throw it all at the wall and see what sticks."); and chided the major Republican candidates for not having a single, candidate-created MySpace profile among them ("The No. 1 most popular watering hole," wrote David All, a "modern media" consultant for Republican candidates. "I guess I just see things a little bit differently."). In addition to the blogs, the site also features a tracker tallying how often candidates are mentioned in the blogosphere and a daily digest of what other sites on the Web are saying about online campaigning.

And prominently displayed on the homepage is that up-to-the-minute scorecard of nearly all of the presidential candidates' MySpace friends. The Republican hopeful with the most pals—2,757, as of last Friday—is Ron Paul, a GOP Texas congressman who's running for president. Sifry says the MySpace numbers mean ... something, though it's unclear if a candidate's online friends will cast real-world votes. "It is a measure of enthusiasm," he says. "It's the world live Web now, and it reflects the conversations people are having around the digital water cooler." Such as: who, exactly, is this Ron Paul guy?

Where's The Beef.com? (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

Presidential candidates have the opportunity to set the national agenda by bringing forward new proposals and innovative policies. Some do this: Bill Clinton in 1992, George W. Bush in 2000. Others don't. Like most or all of the 2008 candidates. Click through their websites, and what you find is pretty thin gruel.

Especially so from the two leading in the polls. Hillary Rodham Clinton's home page links to her recent Senate speech on Iran, but not her 2002 speech backing the Iraq war resolution. She calls for putting "some of the oil industry's windfall profits into a fund that would help develop practical new sources of renewable energy," but with no details. You might find out more by clicking on her "Let the Conversation Begin" webcasts. Rudy Giuliani tells you even less. His exploratory committee website has an account of his work as mayor of New York. But I could find nothing on what he would do as president.

John McCain's website makes some interesting points. As president he would "use the veto pen" on pork and earmarks. The section on "human dignity and the sanctity of life" mentions his opposition to abortion for many years and to funding embryonic stem cell research: a reminder to cultural conservatives that he's been on their side, though he has seldom talked about it. For Iraq he wants a "more robust counterinsurgency strategy"-which seems to be under way now. Barack Obama's issue positions seem to be taken more or less intact from his senatorial website. He cites his work with various Republican senators on important issues. He wants government to assume domestic autoworkers' healthcare costs if they invest half in fuel-efficient technology, and he promises more "resources" to teachers: something for the United Auto Workers and the teachers unions.

John Edwards provides more detail. He wants withdrawal from Iraq "within 12-18 months," plus direct talks with Iran and Syria and a regional peace conference. Would Israel be invited? Variety reported (and Edwards denied) that he told a Hollywood crowd an attack by Israel on Iran was the greatest threat to world peace. He calls for universal health insurance through requiring employer coverage, expanding Medicaid, "reform[ing] insurance," and restricting drug ads. Eliminating poverty, his trademark theme in 2004, gets one paragraph. Mitt Romney has an Issue Watch tab, with single-paragraph discussions of eight issues and multiple recent Romney quotes. He calls for "address[ing] entitlement programs" and universal health insurance "through market reforms."

Rest of the pack. Single-digit candidates' websites vary. Mike Huckabee has a four-word slogan and a YouTube link. Duncan Hunter discusses border security, trade, and the war on terrorism. Joe Biden has a few paragraphs on 10 issues (with Afghanistan and Darfur treated as one issue). Chris Dodd identifies six issues but has single paragraphs on only four so far. Jim Gilmore reports on his record as governor of Virginia. John Cox, a Chicago-area accountant who ran for the Senate in 2004, wants lower spending, calls global warming "overblown," and stresses his opposition to abortion.

Some offer more. Bill Richardson invites you to sign a petition for diplomacy with Iran and has one-paragraph takes on seven issues. Dennis Kucinich's front page is mostly about Iraq but has links to long comments on 10 issues from healthcare to the Patriot Act. Mike Gravel highlights his opposition to the Iraq war and his proposals for national initiative elections. Sam Brownback mentions issues he's taken the lead on (human rights, Darfur) and calls for a $5,000 tax credit for rural first-time home buyers. Tom Tancredo starts with immigration, his signature issue, but provides some detail on 10 others (he's for a flat tax or national sales tax).

Yes, it's early yet. The candidates haven't had time to get issue shops up and running. Clinton and Bush got started much later in the 1992 and 2000 cycles. But so far, candidates have told us very little about where they think the world is headed and what we should do about it. And they've shown us little to indicate that they've thought seriously about governance and long-term problems like Social Security and Medicare. Let's hope they do better as they make their way through Iowa's 99 counties and New Hampshire's 234 cities and towns.

Cole Ponders Change Of Course (RC)

By Nicole Duran And David M. Drucker

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) believes a strategy combining the “all races are local” mantra of his predecessor with the nationalized campaign Democrats employed is the way to undo the drubbing the GOP took at the polls this past year.

This cycle the NRCC will spread the wealth among consultants and pollsters, giving political professionals inside and outside the Beltway a crack at consulting contracts, Cole said Friday. Cole did not disavow the localized approach to House races preferred by former NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), but said his 2008 plan will include key elements of a nationalized campaign.

“The ‘you have a national campaign or a local campaign’ is a false dichotomy,” Cole said by telephone from Oklahoma. “There’s no question that good campaigns address both things. I tell our members: ‘Know your locality, but also you are going to have to address the big national issues.’”

Cole already has eschewed Reynolds’ tactic of playing in the occasional Republican primary. He built his own team and generally snubbed top Reynolds’ aides, which made clear he is abandoning the mind-set that recently prevailed at the NRCC. Saying 2008 “unquestionably will be a national election,” Cole is adjusting the committee’s governing political strategy.

Where Reynolds only strayed from "all races are local" in those House districts where the big national issues were of most concern to voters, Cole espouses splitting the difference, running all campaigns with one eye on the national and one eye on the local.

"It's really about crafting the right message and finding the right balance," said Cole, a political consultant by trade before being elected to Congress in 2002.

According to one Republican strategist with knowledge of how the NRCC was run during the 2004 and 2006 cycles, Reynolds did rely on national issues when necessary.

Meanwhile, Cole is reviewing the NRCC's past dealings with political consultants, media firms and pollsters and studying their work product. Some of it was quite good, he said, while some of it needs to be revisited.

Whom Cole chooses to conduct polling, produce direct-mail pieces, television ads and provide general consulting for the committee, could say the most about which strategic direction he will go. In particular, pollsters wield a lot of influence and affect committee tactics the most.

But the Oklahoma Republican — who retains a financial interest in his old consulting firm, Cole Hargrave Snodgrass & Associates — has yet to sign up any firms, and he is in no hurry to do so.

"We're going to try and spread the work around more broadly," he said. "That's no reflection on the people who have done it, but we just think with the number of competitive races we expect to see this cycle, we need to have a big enough range of people so they aren't overloaded."

As Cole makes changes, Republican consultants are debating the merits of the "all-races-are-local" path the GOP tread since the 1998 cycle, in light of House Democrats' 30-seat pickup last year.

Some, citing a shifting media environment and the television viewing habits of voters, contend that the day of the localized House race — even in a non-wave election — is over.

But others, echoing Reynolds, former Republican National Republican Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman and White House strategist Karl Rove, say each district must be handled separately, with Republican candidates campaigning on national or local issues according to what is likely to be the most effective.

Glen Bolger, a Republican consultant who specializes in House races, cautioned against reading too much into the results of the 2006 elections, which most political professionals say was unique.

"I think it's a little bit of a stretch to say this is the end of local politics. All politics has never been local, but it's not all going to be national, either," Bolger said. "It depends on how contentious or polarized the national environment is. When it's less controversial, there will be more of a default to local politics."

The Republican strategist with knowledge of the NRCC under Reynolds said the committee this past year relied on national issues to win races in campaigns where the Democratic candidate did not have a voting record that could be exploited.

In those cases, Republicans relied on poll-tested attack lines that the Democratic candidate would raise taxes or be weak on border security.

"Localizing is code for giving the people in that district a reason to disqualify your opponent," this strategist said. "If [the NRCC] had better issues to talk about in that district, it did."

David Dixon of the Democratic Dixon/Davis Media Group said Democrats will continue to beat the GOP in Congressional elections if the Republican candidates seem detached from the bigger picture, as he believes many appeared to be last year.

"Candidates needed to acknowledge there was a scandal, they didn't have to do 'mea culpa' ads but there was no communication from their side even recognizing there was a problem," Dixon said.

As to the NRCC's reliance on tried and true messages, Dixon said voters eventually want to hear something new.

"They went to the well on abortion and gay marriage too many times — they used those issues like doctors use antibiotics to treat children's ear infections, but sometimes the arithromycin stops working."

Special Set (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) has asked that June 19 be the date for a special election to fill the 10th district seat of Rep. Charlie Norwood (R), who died Feb. 13.

State Sens. Ralph Hudgens (R) and Jim Whitehead (R) have emerged as the early frontrunners in the race for the Augusta-based seat, which leans heavily toward Republicans.

Both men will have to relinquish their state legislative seats once they qualify to run in the special election under Georgia law. Georgia Secretary of State Karen Handel (R) has agreed to set the qualifying date for the Congressional election after the current session of the General Assembly concludes, allowing Hudgens and Whitehead to continue to serve through the end of the session.

Several Democrats have said they are contemplating running in the special election. If no candidate gets more than 50 percent in the all-party June special election, a runoff between the top two vote-getters, regardless of party, will be held on July 17.

Another Conservative May Challenge Gilchrest (RC)

By Josh Kurtz

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

A conservative Maryland state Senator is taking steps to challenge Rep. Wayne Gilchrest in the 2008 Republican primary, though he said Friday that he has not completely decided whether to make the race.

State Sen. Andrew Harris said he has thought about challenging the Congressman for several months and was leaning against it until two weeks ago, when Gilchrest joined 16 other House Republicans in voting for a resolution that criticized President Bush's proposal to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

"That has changed the calculus a little bit," Harris said.

Gilchrest easily turned back conservative challengers in 2002 and 2004, but Harris, the sole physician in the state Senate, could be more formidable because he is no stranger to tough races.

He was elected to the state Senate in 1998 by ousting the sitting Minority Leader, a moderate, in the GOP primary. Last fall, he beat back an expensive general election challenge in his Baltimore County district from the president of the Maryland State Teachers Association, whose campaign was fueled by labor support.

Harris also has collected chits throughout the 1st district, which spans both sides of the Chesapeake Bay, by campaigning for Republican candidates for legislative and local offices in 2006.

But Harris conceded that Gilchrest remains a difficult target. Even though conservative groups routinely criticize him, the unassuming former teacher and house painter remains a popular figure in his district.

Although he is not a prodigious fundraiser, Gilchrest began 2007 with $308,000 in his campaign account, after spending just $178,000 on his 2006 re-election, which he won with 69 percent of the vote. Harris, who would not have to sacrifice his Senate seat to run for Congress, said he spent about $250,000 on his own re-election last year and estimated that he would need $750,000 to beat Gilchrest.

Both Gilchrest's chief of staff and communications director could not be reached for comment by press time Friday. But Chris Baron, a spokesman for the Republican Main Street Partnership, a national group that aids GOP centrists, said Gilchrest's reputation as "an independent fighter" with a strong record on taxes, the environment and agriculture should serve him well in a primary with Harris.

"He's somebody who we think is a good fit for his district," Baron said.

Still, Harris said he detected a restlessness among Republican voters in Maryland that could accrue to his benefit, especially since the Iraq vote. He called Gilchrest wrong on economic policies, social issues and the Iraq War, and said Republicans want a more faithful conservative in a district that gave Bush 62 percent of the vote in 2004.

"I just don't understand how Congressman Gilchrest didn't get the message from the last election that Republicans are supposed to return to their base," Harris said. "A district as Republican as the 1st Congressional district should elect as conservative a Republican as we can."

Harris said he would spend the next several weeks meeting with interest groups and attending local Republican meetings before deciding whether to run. He could be aided by several national organizations, including the Victory Caucus, a new group put together by conservative talk show hosts dedicated to defeating the 17 House Republicans who opposed the troop surge, and the Club for Growth, the anti-tax group.

Last year, Gilchrest was listed as 212th of 232 Republican House Members when it came to supporting club priorities, and the group's political action committee has worked against Gilchrest in the past.

In 2002, the club endorsed David Fischer, a lawyer and political neophyte who took just 36 percent of the vote in his primary challenge against Gilchrest. Later that year, the club sent Gilchrest a check for the general election — which he refused to deposit and has kept as a souvenir.

Two years later, the club stayed out when another conservative state Senator, Richard Colburn (R), took just 38 percent of the primary vote against Gilchrest.

Club President Pat Toomey, a former Pennsylvania Congressman, said the group is aware of Harris but has not yet had a conversation with him.

"We'll just have to see how it develops," Toomey said.

Farrakhan In Speech: 'My Time Is Up' (AP)

By Jeff Karoub, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 26, 2007

Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan was greeted by cheers, tears and chants from tens of thousands as he returned to the public eye just long enough to say he would be leaving it soon.

Farrakhan, who ceded leadership duties last year because of illness, spoke for nearly two hours Sunday. Looking healthy and fit, he credited the prayers of millions from all walks of life for allowing him to take the stage at Detroit's Ford Field.

His vitality seemed at odds with his message, that his time left in the spotlight was short.

"My time is up," the 73-year-old Farrakhan said, describing his exit from leadership. "I believe ... that my time to be with my spiritual father and his sender has come. And your time to go through serious trial has come."

The topic of the speech was "One Nation Under God." But Farrakhan said the world is at war because Christians, Muslims and people of other faiths are divided.

Farrakhan said Jesus Christ and the Prophet Muhammad would embrace each other with love if they were on the stage behind him.

"Our lips are full of praise, but our hearts are far removed from the prophets we all claim," he said. "That's why the world is in the shape that it's in."

The leader of 1995's Million Man March said he is leaving at a time of great conflict, citing the war in Iraq specifically, and he believes God is angry with leaders who are putting politics and greed above service to others. He predicted "the fall of the great Babylon, the United States of America."

He said President Bush should be impeached or at least censured for his "wicked policies," and urged young people to avoid joining a military that will have them "leave one way and come back another."

The speech at the home of the National Football League's Detroit Lions capped the Nation's three-day convention in the city where it was founded in 1930.

The downtown venue was not filled to capacity, but seats on the field and in the lower levels of the 65,000-seat stadium were packed.

Anita Baker performed two songs before Farrakhan took the stage and speakers from various religious and ethnic groups welcomed him. Among those on the stage behind him were U.S. Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich.; Russell Simmons, hip-hop pioneer and entrepreneur; and Joe Shirley Jr., Navajo Nation president.

The annual convention, usually held in Chicago, honors Nation founder Wallace D. Fard, who attracted black Detroiters on the margins of society with a message of self-improvement and separation from whites. Fard said whites were inherently evil because of their enslavement of blacks.

The Nation of Islam, which promotes black empowerment and nationalism, was rebuilt by Farrakhan in the late 1970s after W.D. Mohammed, the son of longtime leader Elijah Mohammed, moved his followers toward mainstream Islam.

Farrakhan became notorious for calling Judaism a "gutter religion" and suggesting crack cocaine might have been a CIA plot to enslave blacks. He met with foreign leaders at odds with the United States — Moammar Gadhafi, Fidel Castro and Saddam Hussein — prompting the State Department in 1996 to accuse him of "cavorting with dictators."

Farrakhan, who embraced W.D. Mohammed on stage in 2000 after years of discord, has credited his steps toward reconciliation to what he called a "near death" experience related to prostate cancer, which he began battling in 1991.

Detroiter Che-Lin Aldridge, who described herself as spiritual but not a member of the Nation, welcomed Farrakhan and what he had to say.

"This message is something everybody needs to hear — a message that's universal," Aldridge said. "What he said was critical for our lives today."

Farrakhan recalled the story of the final message delivered by the Prophet Muhammad, who was dying at the time. "Within 80 days ... he expired," Farrakhan said.

"I don't see expiration for me," he said, "but I do see exaltation."

A Necessary Vaccine (NYT)

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Debate over a new vaccine to prevent cervical cancer and genital warts has reached a high pitch. State legislatures are debating whether to mandate the vaccine or insist that its use be kept voluntary. The manufacturer stopped a vigorous lobbying campaign lest it provoke more opposition than support. And some health professionals who had been championing the vaccine flinched at making it mandatory, at least for now.

Even so, state legislatures should require that all young girls be given this vaccine, which protects against a virus that causes some 10,000 new cases of cervical cancer in the United States each year — and 3,700 cancer deaths.

Three weeks ago we applauded Gov. Rick Perry for making Texas the first state to require vaccinating young schoolgirls — ages 11 and 12 — against the human papillomavirus. In the ensuing uproar, the Texas House has moved to overturn his order, but the Virginia Legislature has approved a similar mandate. Some 20 states have bills pending to require the vaccinations for school attendance.

We have endorsed a mandate because the vaccine — Merck's Gardasil — looks highly effective against strains that cause 70 percent of all cervical cancer. With more than two million doses already distributed, the reported side effects have been mostly minor, such as dizziness or fainting. Many parents who oppose a mandate are aghast at the thought of vaccinating such young girls against a sexually transmitted disease. But the vaccine works only if taken before a girl becomes infected. Social conservatives object that the vaccine will encourage promiscuity, but it seems farfetched to believe that protection from cervical cancer will change any girl's behavior. Others complain that a mandate will pre-empt parental rights to make health decisions, but all vaccine mandates do that, to protect the children and those they might infect.

The strongest arguments against moving ahead quickly tend to be practical and financial. States have typically used school mandates for vaccines that are already in wide use, and it is possible that unexpected side effects could emerge (though any mandate could be suspended if that happened). Health professionals also need to be certain that there are stable supplies, adequate insurance coverage, ample public money to vaccinate low-income children and physician support.

Merck deserves praise for developing Gardasil at a time when many companies shun the vaccine business as risky and unprofitable. But it is charging $360 for a three-dose regimen, a price that might come down if a competing vaccine enters the market soon, as expected.

The vaccine could prevent thousands of new cases of cervical cancer annually and hundreds of thousands of cases of genital warts and precancerous growths. A mandate would force the health care system to get cracking. And it is the best way to ensure that all children get the vaccine, not just those who are aware of it and can afford it.

Bush To Warn Pakistan To Act On Terror (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Mark Mazzetti

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25 — President Bush has decided to send an unusually tough message to one of his most important allies, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan, warning him that the newly Democratic Congress could cut aid to his country unless his forces become far more aggressive in hunting down operatives with Al Qaeda, senior administration officials say.

The decision came after the White House concluded that General Musharraf is failing to live up to commitments he made to Mr. Bush during a visit here in September. General Musharraf insisted then, both in private and public, that a peace deal he struck with tribal leaders in one of the country's most lawless border areas would not diminish the hunt for the leaders of Al Qaeda and the Taliban or their training camps.

Now, American intelligence officials have concluded that the terrorist infrastructure is being rebuilt, and that while Pakistan has attacked some camps, its overall effort has flagged.

"He's made a number of assurances over the past few months, but the bottom line is that what they are doing now is not working," one senior administration official who deals often with South Asian issues said late last week. "The message we're sending to him now is that the only thing that matters is results."

Democrats, who took control of Congress last month, have urged the White House to put greater pressure on Pakistan because of statements from American commanders that units based in Pakistan that are linked to the Taliban, Afghanistan's ousted rulers, are increasing their attacks into Afghanistan.

For the time being, officials say, the White House has ruled out unilateral strikes against the training camps that American spy satellites are monitoring in North Waziristan, in Pakistan's tribal areas on the border. The fear is that such strikes would result in what one administration official referred to as a "shock to the stability" of General Musharraf's government.

General Musharraf, a savvy survivor in the brutal world of Pakistani politics, knows that the administration is hesitant to push him too far. If his government collapses, it is not clear who would succeed him or who would gain control over Pakistan's arsenal of nuclear weapons.

But the spread of Al Qaeda in the tribal areas threatens to undermine a central element of Mr. Bush's argument that he is succeeding in the administration's effort to curb terrorism. The bomb plot disrupted in Britain last summer, involving plans to hijack airplanes, has been linked by British and American intelligence agencies to camps in the Pakistan-Afghan border areas.

General Musharraf has told American officials that Pakistani military operations in the tribal areas in recent years so alienated local residents that they no longer provide the central government with quality intelligence about the movements of senior Islamic militants.

Congressional Democrats have threatened to review military assistance and other aid to Pakistan unless they see evidence of aggressive attacks on Al Qaeda. The House last month passed a measure linking future military aid to White House certification that Pakistan "is making all possible efforts to prevent the Taliban from operating in areas under its sovereign control."

Pakistan is now the fifth-largest recipient of American aid. Mr. Bush has proposed $785 million in aid to Pakistan in his new budget, including $300 million in military aid to help Pakistan combat Islamic radicalism in the country.

The rumblings from Congress give Mr. Bush and his top advisers a way of conveying the seriousness of the problem, officials said, without appearing to issue a direct threat to the proud Pakistani leader themselves.

"We think the Pakistani aid is at risk in Congress," said the senior official, who declined to speak on the record because the subject involved intelligence matters.

The administration has sent a series of emissaries to see the Pakistani leader in recent weeks, including the new secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates. Mr. Gates was charged with prompting more action in a region in which American forces operate with great constraints, if they are allowed in at all.

"This is not the type of relationship where we can order action," said an administration official involved in discussions over Pakistan policy. "We can strongly encourage."

Relations between General Musharraf and Mr. Bush have always been tense, as the Pakistani leader veers between his need for American support and protection and his awareness that many Pakistani people — and the intelligence service — have strong sympathies for Al Qaeda and the resurgent Taliban. Officials involved with the issue describe the current moment between the leaders as especially fraught.

Mr. Bush was deeply skeptical of the deal General Musharraf struck with the tribal leaders last year, fearing that it would limit the government's powers to intercede in what Mr. Bush has called the "wild west" of Waziristan, administration officials said at the time.

During his visit to Washington last fall, General Musharraf said the agreement he signed with tribal leaders, giving them greater sovereignty in the region, had "three bottom lines." He said one was "no Al Qaeda activities in our tribal agencies or across the border in Afghanistan." The second was "no Taliban activity" in the same areas. And the third was "no Talibanization," which he described as "obscurantist thoughts or way of life."

American intelligence officials have made an assessment that senior Qaeda leaders in Pakistan have re-established significant control over their global network and are training operatives in some of the camps for strikes on Western targets.

One American official familiar with intelligence reports about Pakistan said intelligence agencies had established "clear linkages" between the Qaeda camps and the plot to blow up trans-Atlantic flights that was thwarted last August. American analysts said the recent trials of terrorism suspects in Britain showed that some defendants had been trained in Pakistan.

American officials say one reason General Musharraf agreed to pull government troops back to their barracks in North Waziristan and allow tribal leaders greater control over security was to give him time to rebuild his intelligence network in the border region gradually.

Rice: Pakistan Must Control Border Area (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, February 26, 2007

The White House is pressuring Pakistan to crack down on al-Qaida and Taliban operatives in the lawless border area with Afghanistan that President Bush recently said was "wilder than the Wild West."

The move comes amid growing concern in Congress and the administration that terrorist forces are regrouping in the border area and preparing for a spring offensive in Afghanistan.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday the administration was concerned that al-Qaida was attempting to stage a comeback.

"I don't doubt that al-Qaida has tried to regenerate some of its leadership," Rice said on ABC's "This Week." "I don't doubt that. I don't think that anybody would claim that this is the same organization or the same kind of organization that operated out of Afghanistan.

"But we have to be vigilant, and that's why we are working with the Pakistanis, we are working with the Afghans, we're working worldwide in our intelligence network to continue to degrade this institution, this organization worldwide and on the Afghan border," the secretary said.

Pakistan's border regions have long been suspected to be the hiding places for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri. Pakistan, an Islamic country, is one of the biggest beneficiaries of U.S. foreign aid.

Rice, asked whether Musharraf was constrained in how tough he could be, said, "I'm certainly aware that there are political issues in Pakistan. To not say that would be not to face reality."

But she said Musharraf has been "a stalwart fighter" and himself a target of al-Qaida assassination attempts.

"And the Pakistani leadership knows that al-Qaida would like nothing better than to destabilize Pakistan and to use Pakistan as the base rather than Afghanistan for its operations," Rice said. "And so we have excellent cooperation with the Pakistanis on hunting down al-Qaida, on working to disrupt its network. More al-Qaida have been caught in Pakistan and in Saudi Arabia than any other place in the world.

"And so they are working very hard with us," the secretary said. "We have excellent cooperation on that.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates, earlier this month, traveled to Pakistan for talks with Musharraf, about the terrorist traffic across its border into Afghanistan. Recent sharp criticism of Pakistan's porous border has triggered angry denials from Musharraf.

Asked whether he had talked with Pakistan President Gen. Pervez Musharraf about the hunt for al-Qaida fugitive Osama bin Lden, Gates said he would not "get into specifics" about their talks.

But, said Gates, "If I were Osama bin Laden, I'd keep looking over my shoulder."

No 'Brakes' On Iran Nuclear Effort (WP/AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 25 -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Sunday that his country's disputed nuclear program was like a train "without brakes" or a reverse gear, prompting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to respond that Iran needs "a stop button."

The comments came as senior officials representing Germany and the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- the United States, Britain, France, China and Russia -- prepared to meet in London on Monday to discuss increasing international pressure on Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment program.

The International Atomic Energy Agency last week reported that Iran had ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze the enrichment program and instead had expanded it by setting up hundreds of centrifuges. Iran has repeatedly refused to halt enrichment as a precondition to negotiations about the program.

"The train of the Iranian nation is without brakes and a rear gear," state radio quoted Ahmadinejad as telling a gathering of Muslim clerics. "We dismantled the rear gear and brakes of the train and threw them away some time ago."

He also repeated his call for further negotiations, saying the time for "bullying" had expired.

Rice responded by saying, "They don't need a reverse gear. They need a stop button." She also told "Fox News Sunday" that Iran needs "to stop enriching and reprocessing, and then we can sit down and talk about whatever is on Iran's mind."

"I've said that I am prepared to meet my counterpart or an Iranian representative at any time if Iran will suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities. That should be a clear signal," she added.

Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel, but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building a bomb. The United States and its allies fear that Iran is using its nuclear program in an effort to produce atomic weapons, an allegation Iran denies, saying its aim is solely to generate electricity.

In December, the Security Council imposed limited sanctions on Iran over its refusal to suspend enrichment and gave it 60 days to halt enrichment. The deadline expired Wednesday.

Meanwhile, in Pakistan, seven Muslim nations warned of a "dangerous escalation of tension" over Iran's nuclear program and urged that the standoff be resolved diplomatically rather than by force.

The statement came after ministers from Egypt, Indonesia, Jordan, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Pakistan met to seek ways to resolve Middle East conflicts, including the Iran issue.

Rice Offers Iran Conditional Talks (USAT)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday that the United States would hold direct talks with Iran if the Islamic republic suspended its nuclear program. "I am prepared to meet my counterpart or an Iranian representative at any time if Iran will suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities. That should be a clear signal," Rice said on Fox News Sunday.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad pledged to continue enriching uranium. He likened the country's nuclear program to a train without a reverse gear or brakes.

Diplomats from the five permanent United Nations Security Council members and Germany were to meet today in London. They planned to discuss what steps to take to increase international pressure on Iran to cooperate with U.N. demands to halt its nuclear program.

Cheney visits Oman; plane experiences electrical glitch

Vice President Cheney arrived Sunday in Oman, an oil-rich U.S. ally in the Middle East that allows the United States to use four air bases.

An Omani government official told the Associated Press that Cheney was to discuss regional security issues, including the U.S. standoff with Iran over its nuclear program. The official, in the capital, Muscat, spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the news media. A U.S. Embassy spokesman in Oman declined to detail Cheney's plans or the focus of his visit.

Earlier Sunday, Cheney's plane experienced "an electrical problem involving a generator, but no safety issue," White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said. "The plane is fine." She said the problem was fixed during a planned stop in Singapore. Cheney left Australia after a three-day visit to thank the government for contributing troops to Iraq and Afghanistan. He had earlier visited Japan and Guam.

Rice Says She'd Meet With Iran (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday that the U.S. would hold direct talks with Iran if it suspended its nuclear program. Iran's president, however, pledged to move ahead with enrichment activity that Washington contends masks weapons development.

"I am prepared to meet my counterpart or an Iranian representative at any time if Iran will suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities. That should be a clear signal," Rice said in Washington.

Earlier, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad compared his nation's nuclear program to a train without a reverse gear or brakes. "We dismantled the rear gear and brakes of the train and threw them away some time ago," he was quoted on the radio as telling Muslim clerics.

Rice, in response, said that the Iranians "don't need a reverse gear. They need to stop and then we can come to the table and we can talk about how to move forward."

The International Atomic Energy Agency said Thursday that Iran had ignored a United Nations Security Council mandate to freeze its uranium enrichment program and had expanded the program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges.

A council resolution adopted Dec. 23 penalized Tehran and warned of further punishment if it did not comply.

Diplomats from the five permanent Security Council members and Germany planned to meet in London today to begin discussing what steps to take to increase international pressure on Tehran to cooperate.

US Renews Offer Of Talks With Iran (AFP)

By David Milliken

AFP, February 26, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brushed aside Iran's latest defiant statements on its nuclear program Sunday to reaffirm her offer of talks with Tehran if it suspends uranium enrichment.

Rice also expressed confidence that US, Russian, Chinese and European diplomats due to meet in London on Monday would find common ground on measures to increase pressure on Iran over its suspected nuclear arms drive.

"We all agreed we needed to pursue the Security Council track," Rice said in an interview on Fox News Sunday, referring to the possibility of additional UN sanctions against Iran.

"We're leaving open the track of negotiations, because the best way to resolve this would be to have Iran come to the table," she said.

Earlier Sunday, Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insisted his government would press ahead with its uranium enrichment regardless of UN threats, comparing the program -- which Tehran insists is aimed only at producing nuclear power -- to a runaway train.

"Iran has reached the technology to produce nuclear fuel and Iran's movement on this path is like a train on a one-way track with no room for stopping, reverse gear or braking," he said.

"They don't need a reverse gear, they need a stop button," retorted Rice.

"Then we can come to the table and we can talk about how to move forward," she said.

"We're all prepared to have full-scale negotiations anytime, at any place," she said.

Rice said UN and US sanctions imposed on Tehran since December after Iran refused to comply with an earlier demand it suspend its enrichment program were beginning to fuel dissatisfaction among Iranians over Ahmadinejad's actions.

"People are looking hard at investment in Iran, at the reputational risk, the investment risk of dealing with a country that is under Chapter 7 status," she said, referring to the mandatory UN sanctions resolution passed in December.

"If you just read the press you see the criticism of President Ahmadinejad by people inside Iran, knowledgeable and authoritative people in Iran, that (his) policies are isolating Iran," she said in a separate interview on ABC television.

Rice sidestepped questions on whether President George W. Bush's policy toward the largely Shiite Muslim nation, which he has branded part of an "axis of evil," aimed to topple its radical Islamic regime.

New Yorker magazine reported Sunday that US covert actions against Iran had increased under a major recent shift in US Middle East strategy, with the unintended result of exacerbating regional Sunni-Shiite sectarian tensions and bolstering Sunni radicals hostile to the United States.

Reporter Seymour Hersh wrote in the magazine that US military and special-operations teams have increased activities inside Iran, entering from Iraq to gather intelligence and to pursue Iranian operatives leaving Iraq.

US clandestine operations in Iran, Lebanon and Syria under the redirected US regional approach "has brought the United States closer to an open confrontation with Iran and, in parts of the region, propelled it into a widening sectarian conflict between Shiite and Sunni Muslims," Hersh wrote.

"A by-product of these activities has been the bolstering of Sunni extremist groups that espouse a militant vision of Islam and are hostile to America and sympathetic to Al-Qaeda," Hersh concludes.

He said the strategy, guided by US Vice President Dick Cheney and reliant on Saudi Arabia's national security advisor Prince Bandar bin Sultan, had complicated the war in Iraq, where the rise to power of Shiites over the previously dominant Sunnis has empowered Iran.

Earlier this week Cheney reignited concerns the Bush administration could use military action against Iran.

"It would be a serious mistake if a nation like Iran were to become a nuclear power," Cheney warned during a visit to Australia. "All options are still on the table."

While Rice made no reference to the New Yorker article, she said pressing for democratic change in Iran remained a US policy goal, and reaffirmed that Washington's problems with Tehran extended beyond the nuclear dispute.

"Iran also has other activities that it needs to stop. It needs to stop its support for terrorism in places like Lebanon and in the Middle East more broadly," she said.

THE REDIRECTION (NY)

By Seymour M. Hersh

The New Yorker, March 5, 2007

A STRATEGIC SHIFT

In the past few months, as the situation in Iraq has deteriorated, the Bush Administration, in both its public diplomacy and its covert operations, has significantly shifted its Middle East strategy. The “redirection,” as some inside the White House have called the new strategy, has brought the United States closer to an open confrontation with Iran and, in parts of the region, propelled it into a widening sectarian conflict between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

To undermine Iran, which is predominantly Shiite, the Bush Administration has decided, in effect, to reconfigure its priorities in the Middle East. In Lebanon, the Administration has coöperated with Saudi Arabia’s government, which is Sunni, in clandestine operations that are intended to weaken Hezbollah, the Shiite organization that is backed by Iran. The U.S. has also taken part in clandestine operations aimed at Iran and its ally Syria. A by-product of these activities has been the bolstering of Sunni extremist groups that espouse a militant vision of Islam and are hostile to America and sympathetic to Al Qaeda.

One contradictory aspect of the new strategy is that, in Iraq, most of the insurgent violence directed at the American military has come from Sunni forces, and not from Shiites. But, from the Administration’s perspective, the most profound—and unintended—strategic consequence of the Iraq war is the empowerment of Iran. Its President, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has made defiant pronouncements about the destruction of Israel and his country’s right to pursue its nuclear program, and last week its supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said on state television that “realities in the region show that the arrogant front, headed by the U.S. and its allies, will be the principal loser in the region.”

After the revolution of 1979 brought a religious government to power, the United States broke with Iran and cultivated closer relations with the leaders of Sunni Arab states such as Jordan, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia. That calculation became more complex after the September 11th attacks, especially with regard to the Saudis. Al Qaeda is Sunni, and many of its operatives came from extremist religious circles inside Saudi Arabia. Before the invasion of Iraq, in 2003, Administration officials, influenced by neoconservative ideologues, assumed that a Shiite government there could provide a pro-American balance to Sunni extremists, since Iraq's Shiite majority had been oppressed under Saddam Hussein. They ignored warnings from the intelligence community about the ties between Iraqi Shiite leaders and Iran, where some had lived in exile for years. Now, to the distress of the White House, Iran has forged a close relationship with the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

The new American policy, in its broad outlines, has been discussed publicly. In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in January, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that there is "a new strategic alignment in the Middle East," separating "reformers" and "extremists"; she pointed to the Sunni states as centers of moderation, and said that Iran, Syria, and Hezbollah were "on the other side of that divide." (Syria's Sunni majority is dominated by the Alawi sect.) Iran and Syria, she said, "have made their choice and their choice is to destabilize."

Some of the core tactics of the redirection are not public, however. The clandestine operations have been kept secret, in some cases, by leaving the execution or the funding to the Saudis, or by finding other ways to work around the normal congressional appropriations process, current and former officials close to the Administration said.

A senior member of the House Appropriations Committee told me that he had heard about the new strategy, but felt that he and his colleagues had not been adequately briefed. "We haven't got any of this," he said. "We ask for anything going on, and they say there's nothing. And when we ask specific questions they say, 'We're going to get back to you.' It's so frustrating."

The key players behind the redirection are Vice-President Dick Cheney, the deputy national-security adviser Elliott Abrams, the departing Ambassador to Iraq (and nominee for United Nations Ambassador), Zalmay Khalilzad, and Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi national-security adviser. While Rice has been deeply involved in shaping the public policy, former and current officials said that the clandestine side has been guided by Cheney. (Cheney's office and the White House declined to comment for this story; the Pentagon did not respond to specific queries but said, "The United States is not planning to go to war with Iran.")

The policy shift has brought Saudi Arabia and Israel into a new strategic embrace, largely because both countries see Iran as an existential threat. They have been involved in direct talks, and the Saudis, who believe that greater stability in Israel and Palestine will give Iran less leverage in the region, have become more involved in Arab-Israeli negotiations.

The new strategy "is a major shift in American policy—it's a sea change," a U.S. government consultant with close ties to Israel said. The Sunni states "were petrified of a Shiite resurgence, and there was growing resentment with our gambling on the moderate Shiites in Iraq," he said. "We cannot reverse the Shiite gain in Iraq, but we can contain it."

"It seems there has been a debate inside the government over what's the biggest danger—Iran or Sunni radicals," Vali Nasr, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, who has written widely on Shiites, Iran, and Iraq, told me. "The Saudis and some in the Administration have been arguing that the biggest threat is Iran and the Sunni radicals are the lesser enemies. This is a victory for the Saudi line."

Martin Indyk, a senior State Department official in the Clinton Administration who also served as Ambassador to Israel, said that "the Middle East is heading into a serious Sunni-Shiite Cold War." Indyk, who is the director of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution, added that, in his opinion, it was not clear whether the White House was fully aware of the strategic implications of its new policy. "The White House is not just doubling the bet in Iraq," he said. "It's doubling the bet across the region. This could get very complicated. Everything is upside down."

The Administration's new policy for containing Iran seems to complicate its strategy for winning the war in Iraq. Patrick Clawson, an expert on Iran and the deputy director for research at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, argued, however, that closer ties between the United States and moderate or even radical Sunnis could put "fear" into the government of Prime Minister Maliki and "make him worry that the Sunnis could actually win" the civil war there. Clawson said that this might give Maliki an incentive to coöperate with the United States in suppressing radical Shiite militias, such as Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

Even so, for the moment, the U.S. remains dependent on the coöperation of Iraqi Shiite leaders. The Mahdi Army may be openly hostile to American interests, but other Shiite militias are counted as U.S. allies. Both Moqtada al-Sadr and the White House back Maliki. A memorandum written late last year by Stephen Hadley, the national-security adviser, suggested that the Administration try to separate Maliki from his more radical Shiite allies by building his base among moderate Sunnis and Kurds, but so far the trends have been in the opposite direction. As the Iraqi Army continues to founder in its confrontations with insurgents, the power of the Shiite militias has steadily increased.

Flynt Leverett, a former Bush Administration National Security Council official, told me that "there is nothing coincidental or ironic" about the new strategy with regard to Iraq. "The Administration is trying to make a case that Iran is more dangerous and more provocative than the Sunni insurgents to American interests in Iraq, when—if you look at the actual casualty numbers—the punishment inflicted on America by the Sunnis is greater by an order of magnitude," Leverett said. "This is all part of the campaign of provocative steps to increase the pressure on Iran. The idea is that at some point the Iranians will respond and then the Administration will have an open door to strike at them."

President George W. Bush, in a speech on January 10th, partially spelled out this approach. “These two regimes”—Iran and Syria—“are allowing terrorists and insurgents to use their territory to move in and out of Iraq,” Bush said. “Iran is providing material support for attacks on American troops. We will disrupt the attacks on our forces. We’ll interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq.”

In the following weeks, there was a wave of allegations from the Administration about Iranian involvement in the Iraq war. On February 11th, reporters were shown sophisticated explosive devices, captured in Iraq, that the Administration claimed had come from Iran. The Administration’s message was, in essence, that the bleak situation in Iraq was the result not of its own failures of planning and execution but of Iran’s interference.

The U.S. military also has arrested and interrogated hundreds of Iranians in Iraq. “The word went out last August for the military to snatch as many Iranians in Iraq as they can,” a former senior intelligence official said. “They had five hundred locked up at one time. We’re working these guys and getting information from them. The White House goal is to build a case that the Iranians have been fomenting the insurgency and they’ve been doing it all along—that Iran is, in fact, supporting the killing of Americans.” The Pentagon consultant confirmed that hundreds of Iranians have been captured by American forces in recent months. But he told me that that total includes many Iranian humanitarian and aid workers who “get scooped up and released in a short time,” after they have been interrogated.

“We are not planning for a war with Iran,” Robert Gates, the new Defense Secretary, announced on February 2nd, and yet the atmosphere of confrontation has deepened. According to current and former American intelligence and military officials, secret operations in Lebanon have been accompanied by clandestine operations targeting Iran. American military and special-operations teams have escalated their activities in Iran to gather intelligence and, according to a Pentagon consultant on terrorism and the former senior intelligence official, have also crossed the border in pursuit of Iranian operatives from Iraq.

At Rice’s Senate appearance in January, Democratic Senator Joseph Biden, of Delaware, pointedly asked her whether the U.S. planned to cross the Iranian or the Syrian border in the course of a pursuit. “Obviously, the President isn’t going to rule anything out to protect our troops, but the plan is to take down these networks in Iraq,” Rice said, adding, “I do think that everyone will understand that—the American people and I assume the Congress expect the President to do what is necessary to protect our forces.”

The ambiguity of Rice’s reply prompted a response from Nebraska Senator Chuck Hagel, a Republican, who has been critical of the Administration:

Some of us remember 1970, Madam Secretary. And that was Cambodia. And when our government lied to the American people and said, “We didn’t cross the border going into Cambodia,” in fact we did.

I happen to know something about that, as do some on this committee. So, Madam Secretary, when you set in motion the kind of policy that the President is talking about here, it’s very, very dangerous.

The Administration’s concern about Iran’s role in Iraq is coupled with its long-standing alarm over Iran’s nuclear program. On Fox News on January 14th, Cheney warned of the possibility, in a few years, “of a nuclear-armed Iran, astride the world’s supply of oil, able to affect adversely the global economy, prepared to use terrorist organizations and/or their nuclear weapons to threaten their neighbors and others around the world.” He also said, “If you go and talk with the Gulf states or if you talk with the Saudis or if you talk with the Israelis or the Jordanians, the entire region is worried. . . . The threat Iran represents is growing.”

The Administration is now examining a wave of new intelligence on Iran’s weapons programs. Current and former American officials told me that the intelligence, which came from Israeli agents operating in Iran, includes a claim that Iran has developed a three-stage solid-fuelled intercontinental missile capable of delivering several small warheads—each with limited accuracy—inside Europe. The validity of this human intelligence is still being debated.

A similar argument about an imminent threat posed by weapons of mass destruction—and questions about the intelligence used to make that case—formed the prelude to the invasion of Iraq. Many in Congress have greeted the claims about Iran with wariness; in the Senate on February 14th, Hillary Clinton said, “We have all learned lessons from the conflict in Iraq, and we have to apply those lessons to any allegations that are being raised about Iran. Because, Mr. President, what we are hearing has too familiar a ring and we must be on guard that we never again make decisions on the basis of intelligence that turns out to be faulty.”

Still, the Pentagon is continuing intensive planning for a possible bombing attack on Iran, a process that began last year, at the direction of the President. In recent months, the former intelligence official told me, a special planning group has been established in the offices of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, charged with creating a contingency bombing plan for Iran that can be implemented, upon orders from the President, within twenty-four hours.

In the past month, I was told by an Air Force adviser on targeting and the Pentagon consultant on terrorism, the Iran planning group has been handed a new assignment: to identify targets in Iran that may be involved in supplying or aiding militants in Iraq. Previously, the focus had been on the destruction of Iran’s nuclear facilities and possible regime change.

Two carrier strike groups—the Eisenhower and the Stennis—are now in the Arabian Sea. One plan is for them to be relieved early in the spring, but there is worry within the military that they may be ordered to stay in the area after the new carriers arrive, according to several sources. (Among other concerns, war games have shown that the carriers could be vulnerable to swarming tactics involving large numbers of small boats, a technique that the Iranians have practiced in the past; carriers have limited maneuverability in the narrow Strait of Hormuz, off Iran's southern coast.) The former senior intelligence official said that the current contingency plans allow for an attack order this spring. He added, however, that senior officers on the Joint Chiefs were counting on the White House's not being "foolish enough to do this in the face of Iraq, and the problems it would give the Republicans in 2008."

PRINCE BANDAR'S GAME

The Administration's effort to diminish Iranian authority in the Middle East has relied heavily on Saudi Arabia and on Prince Bandar, the Saudi national-security adviser. Bandar served as the Ambassador to the United States for twenty-two years, until 2005, and has maintained a friendship with President Bush and Vice-President Cheney. In his new post, he continues to meet privately with them. Senior White House officials have made several visits to Saudi Arabia recently, some of them not disclosed.

Last November, Cheney flew to Saudi Arabia for a surprise meeting with King Abdullah and Bandar. The Times reported that the King warned Cheney that Saudi Arabia would back its fellow-Sunnis in Iraq if the United States were to withdraw. A European intelligence official told me that the meeting also focussed on more general Saudi fears about "the rise of the Shiites." In response, "The Saudis are starting to use their leverage—money."

In a royal family rife with competition, Bandar has, over the years, built a power base that relies largely on his close relationship with the U.S., which is crucial to the Saudis. Bandar was succeeded as Ambassador by Prince Turki al-Faisal; Turki resigned after eighteen months and was replaced by Adel A. al-Jubeir, a bureaucrat who has worked with Bandar. A former Saudi diplomat told me that during Turki's tenure he became aware of private meetings involving Bandar and senior White House officials, including Cheney and Abrams. "I assume Turki was not happy with that," the Saudi said. But, he added, "I don't think that Bandar is going off on his own." Although Turki dislikes Bandar, the Saudi said, he shared his goal of challenging the spread of Shiite power in the Middle East.

The split between Shiites and Sunnis goes back to a bitter divide, in the seventh century, over who should succeed the Prophet Muhammad. Sunnis dominated the medieval caliphate and the Ottoman Empire, and Shiites, traditionally, have been regarded more as outsiders. Worldwide, ninety per cent of Muslims are Sunni, but Shiites are a majority in Iran, Iraq, and Bahrain, and are the largest Muslim group in Lebanon. Their concentration in a volatile, oil-rich region has led to concern in the West and among Sunnis about the emergence of a "Shiite crescent"—especially given Iran's increased geopolitical weight.

"The Saudis still see the world through the days of the Ottoman Empire, when Sunni Muslims ruled the roost and the Shiites were the lowest class," Frederic Hof, a retired military officer who is an expert on the Middle East, told me. If Bandar was seen as bringing about a shift in U.S. policy in favor of the Sunnis, he added, it would greatly enhance his standing within the royal family.

The Saudis are driven by their fear that Iran could tilt the balance of power not only in the region but within their own country. Saudi Arabia has a significant Shiite minority in its Eastern Province, a region of major oil fields; sectarian tensions are high in the province. The royal family believes that Iranian operatives, working with local Shiites, have been behind many terrorist attacks inside the kingdom, according to Vali Nasr. "Today, the only army capable of containing Iran"—the Iraqi Army—"has been destroyed by the United States. You're now dealing with an Iran that could be nuclear-capable and has a standing army of four hundred and fifty thousand soldiers." (Saudi Arabia has seventy-five thousand troops in its standing army.)

Nasr went on, "The Saudis have considerable financial means, and have deep relations with the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafis"—Sunni extremists who view Shiites as apostates. "The last time Iran was a threat, the Saudis were able to mobilize the worst kinds of Islamic radicals. Once you get them out of the box, you can't put them back."

The Saudi royal family has been, by turns, both a sponsor and a target of Sunni extremists, who object to the corruption and decadence among the family's myriad princes. The princes are gambling that they will not be overthrown as long as they continue to support religious schools and charities linked to the extremists. The Administration's new strategy is heavily dependent on this bargain.

Nasr compared the current situation to the period in which Al Qaeda first emerged. In the nineteen-eighties and the early nineties, the Saudi government offered to subsidize the covert American C.I.A. proxy war against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. Hundreds of young Saudis were sent into the border areas of Pakistan, where they set up religious schools, training bases, and recruiting facilities. Then, as now, many of the operatives who were paid with Saudi money were Salafis. Among them, of course, were Osama bin Laden and his associates, who founded Al Qaeda, in 1988.

This time, the U.S. government consultant told me, Bandar and other Saudis have assured the White House that "they will keep a very close eye on the religious fundamentalists. Their message to us was 'We've created this movement, and we can control it.' It's not that we don't want the Salafis to throw bombs; it's who they throw them at—Hezbollah, Moqtada al-Sadr, Iran, and at the Syrians, if they continue to work with Hezbollah and Iran."

The Saudi said that, in his country's view, it was taking a political risk by joining the U.S. in challenging Iran: Bandar is already seen in the Arab world as being too close to the Bush Administration. "We have two nightmares," the former diplomat told me. "For Iran to acquire the bomb and for the United States to attack Iran. I'd rather the Israelis bomb the Iranians, so we can blame them. If America does it, we will be blamed."

In the past year, the Saudis, the Israelis, and the Bush Administration have developed a series of informal understandings about their new strategic direction. At least four main elements were involved, the U.S. government consultant told me. First, Israel would be assured that its security was paramount and that Washington and Saudi Arabia and other Sunni states shared its concern about Iran.

Second, the Saudis would urge Hamas, the Islamist Palestinian party that has received support from Iran, to curtail its anti-Israeli aggression and to begin serious talks about sharing leadership with Fatah, the more secular Palestinian group. (In February, the Saudis brokered a deal at Mecca between the two factions. However, Israel and the U.S. have expressed dissatisfaction with the terms.)

The third component was that the Bush Administration would work directly with Sunni nations to counteract Shiite ascendance in the region.

Fourth, the Saudi government, with Washington's approval, would provide funds and logistical aid to weaken the government of President Bashir Assad, of Syria. The Israelis believe that putting such pressure on the Assad government will make it more conciliatory and open to negotiations. Syria is a major conduit of arms to Hezbollah. The Saudi government is also at odds with the Syrians over the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese Prime Minister, in Beirut in 2005, for which it believes the Assad government was responsible. Hariri, a billionaire Sunni, was closely associated with the Saudi regime and with Prince Bandar. (A U.N. inquiry strongly suggested that the Syrians were involved, but offered no direct evidence; there are plans for another investigation, by an international tribunal.)

Patrick Clawson, of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, depicted the Saudis' coöperation with the White House as a significant breakthrough. "The Saudis understand that if they want the Administration to make a more generous political offer to the Palestinians they have to persuade the Arab states to make a more generous offer to the Israelis," Clawson told me. The new diplomatic approach, he added, "shows a real degree of effort and sophistication as well as a deftness of touch not always associated with this Administration. Who's running the greater risk—we or the Saudis? At a time when America's standing in the Middle East is extremely low, the Saudis are actually embracing us. We should count our blessings."

The Pentagon consultant had a different view. He said that the Administration had turned to Bandar as a "fallback," because it had realized that the failing war in Iraq could leave the Middle East "up for grabs."

JIHADIS IN LEBANON

The focus of the U.S.-Saudi relationship, after Iran, is Lebanon, where the Saudis have been deeply involved in efforts by the Administration to support the Lebanese government. Prime Minister Fouad Siniora is struggling to stay in power against a persistent opposition led by Hezbollah, the Shiite organization, and its leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah. Hezbollah has an extensive infrastructure, an estimated two to three thousand active fighters, and thousands of additional members.

Hezbollah has been on the State Department's terrorist list since 1997. The organization has been implicated in the 1983 bombing of a Marine barracks in Beirut that killed two hundred and forty-one military men. It has also been accused of complicity in the kidnapping of Americans, including the C.I.A. station chief in Lebanon, who died in captivity, and a Marine colonel serving on a U.N. peacekeeping mission, who was killed. (Nasrallah has denied that the group was involved in these incidents.) Nasrallah is seen by many as a staunch terrorist, who has said that he regards Israel as a state that has no right to exist. Many in the Arab world, however, especially Shiites, view him as a resistance leader who withstood Israel in last summer's thirty-three-day war, and Siniora as a weak politician who relies on America's support but was unable to persuade President Bush to call for an end to the Israeli bombing of Lebanon. (Photographs of Siniora kissing Condoleezza Rice on the cheek when she visited during the war were prominently displayed during street protests in Beirut.)

The Bush Administration has publicly pledged the Siniora government a billion dollars in aid since last summer. A donors' conference in Paris, in January, which the U.S. helped organize, yielded pledges of almost eight billion more, including a promise of more than a billion from the Saudis. The American pledge includes more than two hundred million dollars in military aid, and forty million dollars for internal security.

The United States has also given clandestine support to the Siniora government, according to the former senior intelligence official and the U.S. government consultant. "We are in a program to enhance the Sunni capability to resist Shiite influence, and we're spreading the money around as much as we can," the former senior intelligence official said. The problem was that such money "always gets in more pockets than you think it will," he said. "In this process, we're financing a lot of bad guys with some serious potential unintended consequences. We don't have the ability to determine and get pay vouchers signed by the people we like and avoid the people we don't like. It's a very high-risk venture."

American, European, and Arab officials I spoke to told me that the Siniora government and its allies had allowed some aid to end up in the hands of emerging Sunni radical groups in northern Lebanon, the Bekaa Valley, and around Palestinian refugee camps in the south. These groups, though small, are seen as a buffer to Hezbollah; at the same time, their ideological ties are with Al Qaeda.

During a conversation with me, the former Saudi diplomat accused Nasrallah of attempting "to hijack the state," but he also objected to the Lebanese and Saudi sponsorship of Sunni jihadists in Lebanon. "Salafis are sick and hateful, and I'm very much against the idea of flirting with them," he said. "They hate the Shiites, but they hate Americans more. If you try to outsmart them, they will outsmart us. It will be ugly."

Alastair Crooke, who spent nearly thirty years in MI6, the British intelligence service, and now works for Conflicts Forum, a think tank in Beirut, told me, "The Lebanese government is opening space for these people to come in. It could be very dangerous." Crooke said that one Sunni extremist group, Fatah al-Islam, had splintered from its pro-Syrian parent group, Fatah al-Intifada, in the Nahr al-Bared refugee camp, in northern Lebanon. Its membership at the time was less than two hundred. "I was told that within twenty-four hours they were being offered weapons and money by people presenting themselves as representatives of the Lebanese government's interests—presumably to take on Hezbollah," Crooke said.

The largest of the groups, Asbat al-Ansar, is situated in the Ain al-Hilweh Palestinian refugee camp. Asbat al-Ansar has received arms and supplies from Lebanese internal-security forces and militias associated with the Siniora government.

In 2005, according to a report by the U.S.-based International Crisis Group, Saad Hariri, the Sunni majority leader of the Lebanese parliament and the son of the slain former Prime Minister—Saad inherited more than four billion dollars after his father's assassination—paid forty-eight thousand dollars in bail for four members of an Islamic militant group from Dinniyeh. The men had been arrested while trying to establish an Islamic mini-state in northern Lebanon. The Crisis Group noted that many of the militants "had trained in al-Qaeda camps in Afghanistan."

According to the Crisis Group report, Saad Hariri later used his parliamentary majority to obtain amnesty for twenty-two of the Dinniyeh Islamists, as well as for seven militants suspected of plotting to bomb the Italian and Ukrainian embassies in Beirut, the previous year. (He also arranged a pardon for Samir Geagea, a Maronite Christian militia leader, who had been convicted of four political murders, including the assassination, in 1987, of Prime Minister Rashid Karami.) Hariri described his actions to reporters as humanitarian.

In an interview in Beirut, a senior official in the Siniora government acknowledged that there were Sunni jihadists operating inside Lebanon. "We have a liberal attitude that allows Al Qaeda types to have a presence here," he said. He related this to concerns that Iran or Syria might decide to turn Lebanon into a "theatre of conflict."

The official said that his government was in a no-win situation. Without a political settlement with Hezbollah, he said, Lebanon could "slide into a conflict," in which Hezbollah fought openly with Sunni forces, with potentially horrific consequences. But if Hezbollah agreed to a settlement yet still maintained a separate army, allied with Iran and Syria, "Lebanon could become a target. In both cases, we become a target."

The Bush Administration has portrayed its support of the Siniora government as an example of the President's belief in democracy, and his desire to prevent other powers from interfering in Lebanon. When Hezbollah led street demonstrations in Beirut in December, John Bolton, who was then the U.S. Ambassador to the U.N., called them "part of the Iran-Syria-inspired coup."

Leslie H. Gelb, a past president of the Council on Foreign Relations, said that the Administration's policy was less pro democracy than "pro American national security. The fact is that it would be terribly dangerous if Hezbollah ran Lebanon." The fall of the Siniora government would be seen, Gelb said, "as a signal in the Middle East of the decline of the United States and the ascendancy of the terrorism threat. And so any change in the distribution of political power in Lebanon has to be opposed by the United States—and we're justified in helping any non-Shiite parties resist that change. We should say this publicly, instead of talking about democracy."

Martin Indyk, of the Saban Center, said, however, that the United States "does not have enough pull to stop the moderates in Lebanon from dealing with the extremists." He added, "The President sees the region as divided between moderates and extremists, but our regional friends see it as divided between Sunnis and Shia. The Sunnis that we view as extremists are regarded by our Sunni allies simply as Sunnis."

In January, after an outburst of street violence in Beirut involving supporters of both the Siniora government and Hezbollah, Prince Bandar flew to Tehran to discuss the political impasse in Lebanon and to meet with Ali Larijani, the Iranians' negotiator on nuclear issues. According to a Middle Eastern ambassador, Bandar's mission—which the ambassador said was endorsed by the White House—also aimed "to create problems between the Iranians and Syria." There had been tensions between the two countries about Syrian talks with Israel, and the Saudis' goal was to encourage a breach. However, the ambassador said, "It did not work. Syria and Iran are not going to betray each other. Bandar's approach is very unlikely to succeed."

Walid Jumblatt, who is the leader of the Druze minority in Lebanon and a strong Siniora supporter, has attacked Nasrallah as an agent of Syria, and has repeatedly told foreign journalists that Hezbollah is under the direct control of the religious leadership in Iran. In a conversation with me last December, he depicted Bashir Assad, the Syrian President, as a "serial killer." Nasrallah, he said, was "morally guilty" of the assassination of Rafik Hariri and the murder, last November, of Pierre Gemayel, a member of the Siniora Cabinet, because of his support for the Syrians.

Jumblatt then told me that he had met with Vice-President Cheney in Washington last fall to discuss, among other issues, the possibility of undermining Assad. He and his colleagues advised Cheney that, if the United States does try to move against Syria, members of the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood would be "the ones to talk to," Jumblatt said.

The Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, a branch of a radical Sunni movement founded in Egypt in 1928, engaged in more than a decade of violent opposition to the regime of Hafez Assad, Bashir's father. In 1982, the Brotherhood took control of the city of Hama; Assad bombarded the city for a week, killing between six thousand and twenty thousand people. Membership in the Brotherhood is punishable by death in Syria. The Brotherhood is also an avowed enemy of the U.S. and of Israel. Nevertheless, Jumblatt said, "We told Cheney that the basic link between Iran and Lebanon is Syria—and to weaken Iran you need to open the door to effective Syrian opposition."

There is evidence that the Administration's redirection strategy has already benefitted the Brotherhood. The Syrian National Salvation Front is a coalition of opposition groups whose principal members are a faction led by Abdul Halim Khaddam, a former Syrian Vice-President who defected in 2005, and the Brotherhood. A former high-ranking C.I.A. officer told me, "The Americans have provided both political and financial support. The Saudis are taking the lead with financial support, but there is American involvement." He said that Khaddam, who now lives in Paris, was getting money from Saudi Arabia, with the knowledge of the White House. (In 2005, a delegation of the Front's members met with officials from the National Security Council, according to press reports.) A former White House official told me that the Saudis had provided members of the Front with travel documents.

Jumblatt said he understood that the issue was a sensitive one for the White House. "I told Cheney that some people in the Arab world, mainly the Egyptians"—whose moderate Sunni leadership has been fighting the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood for decades—"won't like it if the United States helps the Brotherhood. But if you don't take on Syria we will be face to face in Lebanon with Hezbollah in a long fight, and one we might not win."

THE SHEIKH

On a warm, clear night early last December, in a bombed-out suburb a few miles south of downtown Beirut, I got a preview of how the Administration's new strategy might play out in Lebanon. Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader, who has been in hiding, had agreed to an interview. Security arrangements for the meeting were secretive and elaborate. I was driven, in the back seat of a darkened car, to a damaged underground garage somewhere in Beirut, searched with a handheld scanner, placed in a second car to be driven to yet another bomb-scarred underground garage, and transferred again. Last summer, it was reported that Israel was trying to kill Nasrallah, but the extraordinary precautions were not due only to that threat. Nasrallah's aides told me that they believe he is a prime target of fellow-Arabs, primarily Jordanian intelligence operatives, as well as Sunni jihadists who they believe are affiliated with Al Qaeda. (The government consultant and a retired four-star general said that Jordanian intelligence, with support from the U.S. and Israel, had been trying to infiltrate Shiite groups, to work against Hezbollah. Jordan's King Abdullah II has warned that a Shiite government in Iraq that was close to Iran would lead to the emergence of a Shiite crescent.) This is something of an ironic turn: Nasrallah's battle with Israel last summer turned him—a Shiite—into the most popular and influential figure among Sunnis and Shiites throughout the region. In recent months, however, he has increasingly been seen by many Sunnis not as a symbol of Arab unity but as a participant in a sectarian war.

Nasrallah, dressed, as usual, in religious garb, was waiting for me in an unremarkable apartment. One of his advisers said that he was not likely to remain there overnight; he has been on the move since his decision, last July, to order the kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid set off the thirty-three-day war. Nasrallah has since said publicly—and repeated to me—that he misjudged the Israeli response. "We just wanted to capture prisoners for exchange purposes," he told me. "We never wanted to drag the region into war."

Nasrallah accused the Bush Administration of working with Israel to deliberately instigate fitna, an Arabic word that is used to mean "insurrection and fragmentation within Islam." "In my opinion, there is a huge campaign through the media throughout the world to put each side up against the other," he said. "I believe that all this is being run by American and Israeli intelligence." (He did not provide any specific evidence for this.) He said that the U.S. war in Iraq had increased sectarian tensions, but argued that Hezbollah had tried to prevent them from spreading into Lebanon. (Sunni-Shiite confrontations increased, along with violence, in the weeks after we talked.)

Nasrallah said he believed that President Bush's goal was "the drawing of a new map for the region. They want the partition of Iraq. Iraq is not on the edge of a civil war—there is a civil war. There is ethnic and sectarian cleansing. The daily killing and displacement which is taking place in Iraq aims at achieving three Iraqi parts, which will be sectarian and ethnically pure as a prelude to the partition of Iraq. Within one or two years at the most, there will be total Sunni areas, total Shiite areas, and total Kurdish areas. Even in Baghdad, there is a fear that it might be divided into two areas, one Sunni and one Shiite."

He went on, "I can say that President Bush is lying when he says he does not want Iraq to be partitioned. All the facts occurring now on the ground make you swear he is dragging Iraq to partition. And a day will come when he will say, 'I cannot do anything, since the Iraqis want the partition of their country and I honor the wishes of the people of Iraq.' "

Nasrallah said he believed that America also wanted to bring about the partition of Lebanon and of Syria. In Syria, he said, the result would be to push the country "into chaos and internal battles like in Iraq." In Lebanon, "There will be a Sunni state, an Alawi state, a Christian state, and a Druze state." But, he said, "I do not know if there will be a Shiite state." Nasrallah told me that he suspected that one aim of the Israeli bombing of Lebanon last summer was "the destruction of Shiite areas and the displacement of Shiites from Lebanon. The idea was to have the Shiites of Lebanon and Syria flee to southern Iraq," which is dominated by Shiites. "I am not sure, but I smell this," he told me.

Partition would leave Israel surrounded by "small tranquil states," he said. "I can assure you that the Saudi kingdom will also be divided, and the issue will reach to North African states. There will be small ethnic and confessional states," he said. "In other words, Israel will be the most important and the strongest state in a region that has been partitioned into ethnic and confessional states that are in agreement with each other. This is the new Middle East."

In fact, the Bush Administration has adamantly resisted talk of partitioning Iraq, and its public stances suggest that the White House sees a future Lebanon that is intact, with a weak, disarmed Hezbollah playing, at most, a minor political role. There is also no evidence to support Nasrallah's belief that the Israelis were seeking to drive the Shiites into southern Iraq. Nevertheless, Nasrallah's vision of a larger sectarian conflict in which the United States is implicated suggests a possible consequence of the White House's new strategy.

In the interview, Nasrallah made mollifying gestures and promises that would likely be met with skepticism by his opponents. "If the United States says that discussions with the likes of us can be useful and influential in determining American policy in the region, we have no objection to talks or meetings," he said. "But, if their aim through this meeting is to impose their policy on us, it will be a waste of time." He said that the Hezbollah militia, unless attacked, would operate only within the borders of Lebanon, and pledged to disarm it when the Lebanese Army was able to stand up. Nasrallah said that he had no interest in initiating another war with Israel. However, he added that he was anticipating, and preparing for, another Israeli attack, later this year.

Nasrallah further insisted that the street demonstrations in Beirut would continue until the Siniora government fell or met his coalition's political demands. "Practically speaking, this government cannot rule," he told me. "It might issue orders, but the majority of the Lebanese people will not abide and will not recognize the legitimacy of this government. Siniora remains in office because of international support, but this does not mean that Siniora can rule Lebanon."

President Bush's repeated praise of the Siniora government, Nasrallah said, "is the best service to the Lebanese opposition he can give, because it weakens their position vis-à-vis the Lebanese people and the Arab and Islamic populations. They are betting on us getting tired. We did not get tired during the war, so how could we get tired in a demonstration?"

There is sharp division inside and outside the Bush Administration about how best to deal with Nasrallah, and whether he could, in fact, be a partner in a political settlement. The outgoing director of National Intelligence, John Negroponte, in a farewell briefing to the Senate Intelligence Committee, in January, said that Hezbollah "lies at the center of Iran's terrorist strategy. . . . It could decide to conduct attacks against U.S. interests in the event it feels its survival or that of Iran is threatened. . . . Lebanese Hezbollah sees itself as Tehran's partner."

In 2002, Richard Armitage, then the Deputy Secretary of State, called Hezbollah "the A-team" of terrorists. In a recent interview, however, Armitage acknowledged that the issue has become somewhat more complicated. Nasrallah, Armitage told me, has emerged as "a political force of some note, with a political role to play inside Lebanon if he chooses to do so." In terms of public relations and political gamesmanship, Armitage said, Nasrallah "is the smartest man in the Middle East." But, he added, Nasrallah "has got to make it clear that he wants to play an appropriate role as the loyal opposition. For me, there's still a blood debt to pay"—a reference to the murdered colonel and the Marine barracks bombing.

Robert Baer, a former longtime C.I.A. agent in Lebanon, has been a severe critic of Hezbollah and has warned of its links to Iranian-sponsored terrorism. But now, he told me, "we've got Sunni Arabs preparing for cataclysmic conflict, and we will need somebody to protect the Christians in Lebanon. It used to be the French and the United States who would do it, and now it's going to be Nasrallah and the Shiites.

"The most important story in the Middle East is the growth of Nasrallah from a street guy to a leader—from a terrorist to a statesman," Baer added. "The dog that didn't bark this summer"—during the war with Israel—"is Shiite terrorism." Baer was referring to fears that Nasrallah, in addition to firing rockets into Israel and kidnapping its soldiers, might set in motion a wave of terror attacks on Israeli and American targets around the world. "He could have pulled the trigger, but he did not," Baer said.

Most members of the intelligence and diplomatic communities acknowledge Hezbollah's ongoing ties to Iran. But there is disagreement about the extent to which Nasrallah would put aside Hezbollah's interests in favor of Iran's. A former C.I.A. officer who also served in Lebanon called Nasrallah "a Lebanese phenomenon," adding, "Yes, he's aided by Iran and Syria, but Hezbollah's gone beyond that." He told me that there was a period in the late eighties and early nineties when the C.I.A. station in Beirut was able to clandestinely monitor Nasrallah's conversations. He described Nasrallah as "a gang leader who was able to make deals with the other gangs. He had contacts with everybody."

TELLING CONGRESS

The Bush Administration's reliance on clandestine operations that have not been reported to Congress and its dealings with intermediaries with questionable agendas have recalled, for some in Washington, an earlier chapter in history. Two decades ago, the Reagan Administration attempted to fund the Nicaraguan contras illegally, with the help of secret arms sales to Iran. Saudi money was involved in what became known as the Iran-Contra scandal, and a few of the players back then—notably Prince Bandar and Elliott Abrams—are involved in today's dealings.

Iran-Contra was the subject of an informal "lessons learned" discussion two years ago among veterans of the scandal. Abrams led the discussion. One conclusion was that even though the program was eventually exposed, it had been possible to execute it without telling Congress. As to what the experience taught them, in terms of future covert operations, the participants found: "One, you can't trust our friends. Two, the C.I.A. has got to be totally out of it. Three, you can't trust the uniformed military, and four, it's got to be run out of the Vice-President's office"—a reference to Cheney's role, the former senior intelligence official said.

I was subsequently told by the two government consultants and the former senior intelligence official that the echoes of Iran-Contra were a factor in Negroponte's decision to resign from the National Intelligence directorship and accept a sub-Cabinet position of Deputy Secretary of State. (Negroponte declined to comment.)

The former senior intelligence official also told me that Negroponte did not want a repeat of his experience in the Reagan Administration, when he served as Ambassador to Honduras. "Negroponte said, 'No way. I'm not going down that road again, with the N.S.C. running operations off the books, with no finding.' " (In the case of covert C.I.A. operations, the President must issue a written finding and inform Congress.) Negroponte stayed on as Deputy Secretary of State, he added, because "he believes he can influence the government in a positive way."

The government consultant said that Negroponte shared the White House's policy goals but "wanted to do it by the book." The Pentagon consultant also told me that "there was a sense at the senior-ranks level that he wasn't fully on board with the more adventurous clandestine initiatives." It was also true, he said, that Negroponte "had problems with this Rube Goldberg policy contraption for fixing the Middle East."

The Pentagon consultant added that one difficulty, in terms of oversight, was accounting for covert funds. "There are many, many pots of black money, scattered in many places and used all over the world on a variety of missions," he said. The budgetary chaos in Iraq, where billions of dollars are unaccounted for, has made it a vehicle for such transactions, according to the former senior intelligence official and the retired four-star general.

"This goes back to Iran-Contra," a former National Security Council aide told me. "And much of what they're doing is to keep the agency out of it." He said that Congress was not being briefed on the full extent of the U.S.-Saudi operations. And, he said, "The C.I.A. is asking, 'What's going on?' They're concerned, because they think it's amateur hour."

The issue of oversight is beginning to get more attention from Congress. Last November, the Congressional Research Service issued a report for Congress on what it depicted as the Administration's blurring of the line between C.I.A. activities and strictly military ones, which do not have the same reporting requirements. And the Senate Intelligence Committee, headed by Senator Jay Rockefeller, has scheduled a hearing for March 8th on Defense Department intelligence activities.

Senator Ron Wyden, of Oregon, a Democrat who is a member of the Intelligence Committee, told me, "The Bush Administration has frequently failed to meet its legal obligation to keep the Intelligence Committee fully and currently informed. Time and again, the answer has been 'Trust us.' " Wyden said, "It is hard for me to trust the Administration."

Iran Defiant On Nuclear Pursuit (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136402

President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad warned on Sunday that Iran would not retreat from its nuclear programme, while Tehran sought to underline its technological prowess by announcing that it had fired a rocket into the atmosphere.

"Iran has obtained the technology to produce nuclear fuel and Iran's move is like a train that has no brakes . . . and no reverse gear," Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said, according to Iran's ISNA student news agency.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's comments were quickly picked up by Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state. "They don't need a reverse gear," she responded on Fox News. "They need a stop button."

Iran failed last week to meet a United Nations deadline to curb activities related to uranium enrichment, a process that can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

The extent to which Iran has mastered such technology remains one of the most important questions in the controversy over the nuclear programme, together with other factors such as Tehran's true intentions and the difficulty of forging a common front on the issue among big powers.

In a sign of the heightened tension, Manouchehr Mohammadi, a deputy foreign minister, said on Sunday: "We have prepared ourselves for any situation, even for war."

However, the Iranian foreign ministry is not generally considered to be one of the main actors in the dispute over Iran's nuclear programme, and western diplomats say they believe Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's influence in the country is declining in favour of a corps of more established pragmatists.

At the weekend, Vice-President Dick Cheney reiterated the US position that "all options" were on the table for dealing with Iran's nuclear ambitions, adding that it was "still our preference" to resolve the issue peacefully through working with the European Union and the UN.

Diplomats from the permanent five members of the UN Security Council and Germany meet in London today to make a first attempt to reach consensus on a new set of UN sanctions on Iran.

"It's reassuring that the Americans are working this way," a French diplomat said. "We certainly don't have the impression that they want a military conflict."

In a further source of tension, Iran was yesterday initially reported by agencies to have fired a rocket into space using technology similar to intercontinental ballistic missiles.

But Ali Akbar Golrou, the executive deputy of Iran's aerospace research centre, later told Fars News Agency the rocket was not a missile capable of reaching space but would eventually fall back to earth after reaching a suborbital position.

As U.S. Puts Pressure On Iran, Gulf's Religious Rift Spreads (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

MUHARRAQ, Bahrain -- One night last fall, incendiary leaflets denouncing Iran suddenly appeared on the walls of houses and mosques in this tiny Persian Gulf kingdom.

"Iranians are trying to occupy your homes, the homes of your fathers and grandfathers," warned the anonymous tracts. "Do you want to be ruled by these people? No, a thousand times no!"

Bahrain, a crucial American ally and home to the U.S. Navy's Fifth Fleet, was quickly caught up in a wave of anti-Iranian paranoia. Politicians, clerics and the media jumped on the theme, turning Iran into a big issue in bitter local elections at the end of the year.

The trigger for all the noisy alarm? A ruckus over the purchase of a ramshackle house by a handful of local Bahrainis who share the Shiite Muslim faith of Iran.

At a time of rising tension between Washington and Tehran, the scare-mongering in Bahrain shows how America's geopolitical standoff with Iran is paralleled by much older animosities between the Muslim world's two great traditions, Sunni and Shiite. The Arab world is majority Sunni while Persian Iran is mostly Shiite. In a dangerous dynamic, legitimate concerns about Tehran's intentions are being overlain with phobias and political calculation as Arab governments, rabble-rousing politicians and clerics fan sectarian fears.

Washington views Iran as a rogue nation that arms militias in Iraq, wants to build a nuclear bomb and seeks Israel's destruction. From Arab kingdoms on the Persian Gulf to Lebanon on the Mediterranean, however, Iran is also viewed through another prism, as a non-Arab, and, for some, heretical power intent on expanding the clout of itself and fellow Shiites at the expense of the region's Sunni establishment.

Containing Tehran has become a major American foreign-policy goal. But for these countries, Iran is a hot-button domestic issue as well. Bahrain is ruled by a Sunni royal family but roughly 70% of the populace is Shiite. The nation was shaken by a series of clashes this month between Shiite protesters and security forces dominated by Sunnis.

Saudi Arabia frets about the Shiite minority who inhabit its oil-producing eastern region next to Bahrain. Kuwait, too, has a sizable Shiite minority. Lebanon's Sunni-dominated government is under threat from Hezbollah, a Shiite militia.

Even countries with hardly any Shiites, such as Egypt and Jordan, have domestic concerns. By denouncing Iran (and by association Shiites), leaders hope to outflank their most virulent critics -- militant Sunni Islamists, who often fume against Shiites as heretics. They also seek to blemish the reputation of Hassan Nasrallah, the Shiite Hezbollah leader whose radical views spook Sunni leaders but delight some of their citizenry.

When the U.S. invaded Iraq in 2003, it believed that the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, a Sunni, would seed tolerant democracy there and elsewhere. The war instead uncorked pent-up sectarian tensions in Iraq, pitting the country's once-dominant Sunni minority against its long-oppressed Shiite majority. The Iraqi chaos also has emboldened neighboring Iran to flex its muscles in Iraq and beyond, further stirring passions rooted in centuries of theological, political and ethnic rivalry.

Until recently, Washington focused on Sunni threats, from Sunni insurgents in Iraq to the remnants of al Qaeda, a Sunni outfit. In his January state of the union address, however, President Bush also warned of the menace posed by Shiite extremists who "take direction from the regime in Iran." It has become clear, he said, that "we face an escalating danger" from militant Shiites "determined to dominate the Middle East." This reassessment of America's enemies underpins what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has hailed as a "realignment in the Middle East" -- a drawing together of Sunni-led Arab countries against Iran.

Some experts on the region warn that America's standoff with Iran is exacerbating Sunni-Shiite rivalry and pushing the U.S. into some unruly company. Indeed, America now unintentionally finds itself on the same page as Sunni firebrands who loathe America but sometimes hate Shiites even more. Much of the most venomous anti-Iranian rhetoric comes from militants whose views echo Osama bin Laden's.

Anti-Shiite fervor, says Vali Nasr, a professor at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif., is "part of the DNA" of America's biggest foes, Sunni extremists. In recent testimony to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, he urged a cooling of tempers with Iran. "It will boomerang back against us," he says.

Shiites make up 15% or less of the world's Muslim community, but in many Sunni eyes they hold outsize influence because of Shiite-ruled Iran, which now rivals and sometimes even eclipses Israel as an object of loathing. On the gallows in Baghdad at the end of December, Saddam Hussein used his last words to denounce Americans and "Persians," or Iranians. He didn't name Israel.

A lexicon of Arab polemic previously dominated by "Zionists" and "Crusaders" -- i.e., Israel and America -- now has a new villain: the Safawis, or Iranians. The term refers to the Safavid dynasty that established Shiism as Iran's state religion in the 16th century.

The most splenetic diatribes against Iran and Shiites often come from militant Sunnis who previously focused their fire on the U.S. In a January document entitled "Covenant of the Supreme Council of Jihad Groups," for example, a Kuwaiti extremist cleric ranked Iran ahead of the U.S. and Israel in a hierarchy of foes. He railed against the "Safawi enemy that seeks the destruction of Islamic civilization."

Saudi Arabia, a prime source of toxic jihad theology in the past, now also churns out bile against Iran and Shiites. At the end of December, Abdel-Rahman al-Barrak, a senior cleric, labeled Shiites "more dangerous than Jews and Christians." King Abdullah, in a recent interview with a Kuwaiti newspaper, predicted defeat for what he suggested was an Iranian-backed campaign to convert the Sunni world to Shiism and "to diminish [the Sunnis'] historical power."

Fear of Iran, of course, is anchored in real-world issues. Tehran's nuclear-research push has caused widespread jitters and prompted Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia to suggest they might start nuclear programs, too. Iran's involvement in Iraq since the toppling of Mr. Hussein's Sunni tyranny has stirred real fear that Iraq will be led by a Shiite regime loyal to Tehran.

The hostility between Sunnis and Shiites began with the death of the Prophet Muhammad in 632 and a dispute that followed over whether his father-in-law (the Sunni choice) or his son-in-law (the Shiite candidate) was the worthy successor. The schism later fed into another rift now at the heart of the region's rivalries -- between ethnically Persian Iran, which became Shiite, and the ethnically Arab heartland, which became mostly Sunni.

Bahrain, home to some 2,500 U.S. military personnel, plays a key role in U.S. efforts to contain Iran. The Fifth Fleet's command center here controls an armada of U.S. warships -- beefed up this month by a second aircraft-carrier battle group -- that is America's main military lever against Tehran. A banking center and weekend playground for revelers from neighboring Saudi Arabia, Bahrain boasts a vibrant economy and is much more open than most Arab countries.

But as a predominantly Shiite land of roughly 700,000 ruled by Sunnis, Bahrain also sits astride the Muslim fault line shaking the region.

At the beginning of the decade, Bahrain began opening up its political system. As Shiites began to demand real power, however, the opening stalled. Washington, preoccupied by Iraq and then Iran, muted calls for greater democracy here and elsewhere in the region.

"We notice a change in America's view," says Mohammed Bin Mubarak Al Khalifa, the deputy prime minister and a member of the Sunni ruling family. "Iraq was supposed to be a good example. It failed." Democracy's weakness, he adds, is that it gives "too much influence to outsiders" -- which in this part of the world means Iran.

This month, violence flared after police arrested three Shiite activists who had long denounced Sunni political dominance. The trio were released after being charged with illegal agitation and other crimes. In one Shiite area last week, youths hurled fire bombs and riot police fired tear gas. More arrests followed. Newspapers close to the government alleged a conspiracy to sow chaos and reported that Shiites had set up a military training camp. Shiites denounced the reports as fabrication.

Mohammed Khaled Ebrahim, a hard-line Sunni member of Bahrain's parliament, urges visitors to read a document called "The Secret Plan of the Ayatollahs in Light of New Circumstances." It purports to detail an Iranian plot to dominate the Middle East and force Sunnis to convert. In tone and taste for conspiracy it mimics The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a century-old Russian forgery and classic of anti-Semitic propaganda.

"It explains everything," says Mr. Ebrahim, waving an Arabic translation of the supposedly covert, Farsi-language plan. He found it on the Internet.

Though he is a shrill critic of America, he says he supports any effort to restrain Iran. He doesn't want the U.S. Navy to leave Bahrain because this "would clear the area for Iran." This, he says, is "what Shiites want." America is "like a cancer" but Iran is still more dangerous and "much more devious."

The spark for a recent flare-up of Sunni-Shia tension was a modest property investment in Muharraq, a predominantly Sunni area. Five local Shiites, all members of Bahrain's small and centuries-old community of ethnic Persians, pooled their money to buy a decrepit house for around $400,000 from its Sunni owner. They registered the purchase and then got planning permission to tear down most of the structure and rebuild separate new homes. Contractors moved in last spring to start demolition work.

One of the first to ring the alarm was Isa Adwan, a Sunni zealot and part-time preacher who lives next door. Mr. Adwan complained about "Iranians" ruining the neighborhood. A likeminded preacher joined his campaign.

Sitting on the floor of his dingy living room, Mr. Adwan explains that he despises America, too, but thinks Shiites are worse and wishes President Bush well against Tehran. He thinks Shiites have too many children -- he has six himself -- and don't pray at the right time. But most disturbing, says Mr. Adwan, is Shiite reverence for Iranian religious figures, which he believes makes them loyal to Iran, not Bahrain. The house next door, says Mr. Adwan, was just "their first target." Iranians "want to take over the whole neighborhood, the whole country."

The neighborhood tiff reached a wider audience with the posting of the anti-Iranian leaflets. The tracts infuriated Shiites and also moderate Sunnis. Police quickly tore them down. "These things are very dangerous," says the Sunni governor of Muharraq, Salman Bin Hindi.

Instead of fading, the fear of an Iranian plot was then fanned by local media. A flurry of articles reported that officials had uncovered a secret plan by Iran to buy up land using local Shiite proxies. Authorities, prodded by Sunni politicians, formed a committee to investigate the Iranian connection.

As campaigning heated up for elections in November and December for Bahrain's largely powerless parliament, several Sunni hopefuls grabbed onto the issue. They claimed that an Iranian state-owned bank and the Iranian Embassy were financing home purchases by Shiites.

"We sniffed something very strange," recalls Isa Ahmed Abul Fateh, a Sunni former banker who was in a tight race for a seat in Muharraq, a small island. Denunciations of Iran became a big part of his campaign. Iran, he says, has been buying up land in Basra, Iraq, and "maybe they have the same objective in Bahrain."

Rivals slammed the fear-mongering -- and lost. Islamists -- both Sunni and Shiite -- won all but a handful of seats. The big losers were secular candidates who bridge the sectarian divide.

In the middle of the real-estate flap, a bombshell hit: A British national of Sudanese origin who had worked as a government consultant released a report that, backed by official documents, detailed a campaign by some hard-line Sunni officials to manipulate sectarian tensions, exploit fears of Iran and entrench Sunni dominance. One of the leaked documents was a policy paper that warned, among other things, that Shiites were buying property in Muharraq.

The former consultant, Salah Al Bander, says he sent his findings to the royal family last August and, when he received no response, later sent copies to the American, British and German embassies and to the local press. He was promptly expelled to Britain. After a burst of press coverage, the government charged the former consultant with stealing documents and other offenses. He denies doing anything wrong and says he hasn't received any notification of the charges.

Another policy paper recommends that Bahraini authorities play on U.S. hostility toward Iran and "explain to the American embassy and the international community in general" that Bahrain's main Shiite party is a Bahraini version of Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Lebanese militia.

It is unclear whether the proposals were ever acted on or when they were made. But, say Shiite activists, they reflect the mindset of at least some in the government.

"The government strategy is to invest in anti-Iranian feeling in the West, particularly in America," says Mr. Bander, the former consultant, who is himself a Sunni.

Sheik Mohammed, the deputy prime minister, derides Mr. Bander's claims as a "mockery" but declined to comment in detail, saying the case is now in the hands of the judiciary.

At the end of September, the five Shiites who bought the house next to Mr. Adwan received a letter from the Ministry of Municipalities and Agriculture. It ordered them to sell their property, which by this point had been mostly demolished to make way for rebuilding. The letter gave no explanation other than citing a 1975 decree allowing forced purchases in "the public interest." The Shiites ignored the order. Police arrived to force their contractors to stop work.

In December, Muharraq's governor, Mr. Bin Hindi, announced that he would start vetting all property deals as a part of what he said was a drive to preserve old buildings. Shiite activists howled in protest, accusing the government of sectarian zoning.

The property next to Mr. Adwan is still empty. Its Shiite owners recently received a second letter ordering them to sell. They're haggling over compensation. The committee looking into Iran's role hasn't found any Iranian connection. But says Mr. Adwan, Iranian influence has been rolled back a few yards. Had the Shiites moved in, "I'd be surrounded on all sides."

Iran Says It Launched A Suborbital Rocket (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 25 — Iran announced Sunday that it had launched a research rocket that attained a suborbital altitude, a test that appeared to move it closer toward its aim of putting its own satellites into space.

Initially, the director of the Aerospace Research Center, Mohsen Bahrami, was quoted by the Iranian Student News Agency on Saturday as saying that the rocket, carrying a research cargo, “was launched successfully into space.” But he did not disclose any information about the altitude the rocket reached or when it was launched. The state television also reported the news on Sunday.

Ali Akbar Golrou, another official at the center, told the Fars News Agency on Sunday that the rocket was a so-called sounding rocket carrying atmosphere-testing equipment that rose 94 miles before falling back to earth by parachute, he said.

“The rocket was launched only for scientific and research purposes,” Mr. Golrou was quoted as saying. “Some of the news agencies have reported that a missile has been launched into space, which is false,” he said, referring to earlier reports that the launching might have been a weapons test.

A test rocket capable of reaching greater altitudes would have had significant meaning not only for Iran’s effort to put satellites into orbit, but also for developing a transcontinental ballistic missile, making it a topic of keen interest to other countries. The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 that imposed a ban on trade of goods or technology related to Iran’s nuclear and missile programs. Iran refused to comply with a two-month deadline in the resolution to suspend its uranium enrichment program, and now, the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council are meeting in London on Monday to discuss possible further sanctions.

Mr. Bahrami told the Iranian Students News Agency that the cargo intended for research was produced jointly by the Aerospace Research Center and the Ministry of Defense.

Iran launched its first satellite, known as Sina-1, from a Russian rocket in 2005. But it said that it wanted to improve its Shahab-3 missile, which has a range of 1,250 miles, to launch satellites. Iran says it needs to launch four more satellites by 2010 to increase the number of people with access to telephones or cellphones to 80 million from 22 million, and to increase the number of Internet users to 35 million from 5.5 million.

Defense Minister Mohammad Najar said that “building satellites, launchers, launching the first satellite of Sina with Russia and entering the space club, creating missile test centers and expanding its infrastructure and training personnel are among the ministry’s plans,” the daily Etemad Meli quoted him as saying Sunday.

Science and Technology Minister Mohammad Soleimani said Iran planned to accelerate its space program, the students news agency reported. “Investment in space is very serious and requires time,” he said, “but we are trying to speed it up.”

Cheney Arrives In Persian Gulf For Talks (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, February 26, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney landed in the U.S.-allied Arab monarchy of Oman on Sunday and went directly to talks with its foreign minister, Omani government officials said.

A U.S. embassy spokesman in Oman declined to detail Cheney's plans or the focus of his visit to the sparsely populated oil-producing state, which allows the United States use of four air bases. But an Omani government official said Cheney was to discuss regional security issues, including the U.S. standoff with Iran over its nuclear program. The official, in the capital Muscat, spoke on condition of anonymity because he was unauthorized to speak to the press.

Oman sits across the strategically important Strait of Hormuz from Iran, through which two-fifths of the world's oil passes.

The sultanate allows the United States to use the air bases — including one just 50 miles from Iran — for refueling, logistics and storage of pre-positioned military supplies. Little has been revealed publicly about U.S. military ties with the reclusive country, a deeply sensitive topic inside Oman, an isolated country on the southeastern corner of the Arabian peninsula that has been a quiet U.S. military ally for decades.

The country's cooperation with the U.S. military appears to have dwindled over the past few years, but renewed U.S. access to its bases would give a huge boost to any American action on Iran.

"The Omanis are very careful not to associate themselves with American forces. There are major objections to U.S. activities in Oman and they don't want a large visible presence," said Mustafa Alani, a Gulf Research Center military analyst.

An Omani Foreign Ministry official said Foreign Minister Yousuf bin Alawi bin Abdullah was to urge U.S. support for an immediate revival of the Palestinian-Israeli peace process.

Cheney's stopover could be seen as an attempt to ratchet up military pressure on Iran ahead of a meeting by the U.N. Security Council that will discuss tightening of sanctions imposed over its disputed nuclear program.

The visit to Oman was Cheney's second during his time as vice president. In March 2002, Cheney toured U.S. installations at the Masirah Island Air Base, which hosted U.S. B-1B bombers, C-130 transports and U.S. Special Forces AC-130 gunships during the war in Afghanistan, according to press and research reports.

Cheney left Australia on Sunday after a three-day visit to thank the government for contributing troops to Iraq and Afghanistan. He had earlier visited Japan and Guam.

A White House spokeswoman said the vice presidential plane had an electrical problem after leaving Australia earlier Sunday. Reporters on the plane said a power surge during the flight disabled the cabin's electrical outlets. The problem was fixed during a planned stop in Singapore.

A Congressional Research Service report said the Pentagon extended U.S. basing rights in 2000 by providing $120 million to Oman to upgrade its al-Musnanah air base, which sits next to the Strait of Hormuz.

CRS reported 550 U.S. troops were based in Oman as recently as 2004. But that number appears to have slipped to around 270 last year, mainly U.S. Air Force and Navy personnel, some of whom are training the Omani air force, according to the Dubai-based Gulf Research Center.

The CRS report said the Air Force maintains access rights to four Oman air bases, al-Musnanah; al-Seeb, just outside the capital Muscat; Thumrait, near the southern coast; and the Masirah Island Air Base, in the Arabian Sea.

Oman's Masirah air base was the staging base for the failed U.S. attempt to rescue 66 American hostages from the former U.S. embassy in Tehran in 1979.

Oman is led by the reclusive Sultan Qaboos, who overthrew his father in 1970. Qaboos has focused on modernizing Oman, but at a slower pace than the frenetic growth transforming neighboring United Arab Emirates and Qatar.

Hizbullah Builds New Line Of Defense (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

The metal sign dangling from a shiny new chain reads: "Warning. Access to this area is forbidden. Hizbullah."

The notice strung between two concrete blocks on a hillside overlooking the Litani River, is just one indication that the Shiite militants have relocated here to build a new line of defense.

Hizbullah's strengthening presence just across the Litani – the northern border of the zone UN peacekeeping forces and Lebanese troops have been policing since last summer's war between Hizbullah and Israel – coincides with a series of land purchases here by a Shiite businessman with ties to the militant group and, critics say, with funds from Tehran.

While analysts say the military buildup does not necessarily signal any intention by the Iranian-supported militants to launch a fresh round of fighting, they say it is a troubling sign that Hizbullah is rearming just out of sight of the United Nations.

Regionally, say critics, that means Iran could be rebuilding its ally's military capability inside Lebanon and could strike again at Israel. "If you have a major Iranian- American clash, one thing we fear is that the Iranian reaction could be from Lebanon," says Marwan Hamade, Lebanon's telecommunications minister and political opponent of Hizbullah.

Hizbullah has chosen to abandon its former stronghold in Lebanon's UN-patrolled southern border district where its fighters withstood Israel's month-long onslaught last summer.

In that area, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) has swelled to six times its former size with reinforcements from NATO countries such as France, Italy, and Spain. They have been joined by some 20,000 Lebanese troops and together they man around 100 checkpoints and conduct 500 patrols day and night, UNIFIL officials say.

To be sure, Hizbullah's fighters continue to live in the southern border villages and keep a close eye on movements along the Israeli border and on the newly arrived European UN troops. But UNIFIL officials say that they have seen no armed fighters since September and that Hizbullah's former "security pockets" and bunkers have been abandoned.

"Some arms caches have been found, but they are from before the war. There have been no instances of attempts to smuggle weapons into the area," says Milos Strugar, UNIFIL's senior adviser.

But now, locals say, Hizbullah is seen more frequently in these remote hills just north of the Litani. "They have always been in the area but there's a lot more movement now," says one man who lives in the vicinity but requested anonymity due to the sensitivity of the subject.

On a brush-covered hillside overlooking the Litani River, two Hizbullah fighters wearing camouflage uniforms and carrying rifles and walkie-talkies emerged from the bushes beside a stone track. They take the name of a visiting reporter and politely – but firmly – say that no entry is permitted into the area.

Less than a mile to the west, another Hizbullah position is guarded by an armed and uniformed fighter sitting in a small hut with a landline telephone.

According to one veteran Hizbullah fighter, during the war, long-range rockets were launched at Israel, around 10 miles to the south, from underground firing positions in this same area.

Lebanese troops man checkpoints along the main roads here, but are not interfering with Hizbullah's activities. With Hizbullah refusing to disarm and the Lebanese government and Army incapable of dismantling it by force, the fate of the group's arms remains an intractable political dilemma.

Hizbullah does not deny that it is replenishing its war-depleted stocks. Three weeks ago, a truck filled with rockets and mortars destined for Hizbullah was discovered by Lebanese customs police. Hizbullah asked that the weapons be returned, but the Lebanese minister of defense refused, saying they would be handed over to the Lebanese Army.

In a speech on Feb. 16, Hizbullah chief Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah admitted that the group was "transporting weapons to the front [in the south]."

"We have weapons of all kinds and quantities, as many as you want. We don't fight our enemy with swords made of wood," he said.

Still, the extent of the military buildup in these "security pockets" north of the Litani is unclear given the ingenuity of Hizbullah's engineers and the strict secrecy under which the group operates. Before the war last summer, Hizbullah spent six years secretly building bunkers, tunnels, and firing positions along the border with Israel.

In one case, a bunker complex 100 feet underground covering an area of almost a square mile was built within 300 yards of a UNIFIL observation post and an Israeli army position on the border, but its existence remained hidden until after the war.

"They let us see certain things like their observation posts along the border fence, but all the time they were building an underground city in the south that we never knew existed," says Timur Goksel, who retired as UNIFIL's senior adviser in 2003.

Hizbullah's area of deployment north of the Litani is populated by Shiites, Christians, and Druze who live in small villages and farmsteads tucked into the folds of these remote mountains.

For the past year, Ali Tajiddine, a Shiite businessman who traded diamonds in West Africa before branching into property development and construction, has been snapping up vast tracts of land in the district from impoverished Christian and Druze property holders.

On one barren windswept hillside, a new community called Ahmadiyeh is being built from scratch with houses and shops surrounding a stone quarry owned by Mr. Tajiddine. Some two-thirds of a nearby Druze village called Sraireh has been bought up and more than 440 acresof land has been purchased from the nearby Christian hamlet of Qotrani where 30 buildings are under construction and have been sold to Shiites, according to local residents.

"There's no living to make here, so people are selling their land and moving," says one of the 350 remaining residents of Sraireh, which has seen 80 percent of its population leave, mainly to the Druze-dominated Chouf mountains farther north. He says that Tajiddine was paying in cash whatever amount was requested by property owners.

Walid Jumblatt, leader of Lebanon's Druze and arch foe of Hizbullah, says that the land is being purchased with Iranian funds delivered to Hizbullah and disbursed by Tajiddine. Tajiddine's connections to Hizbullah are widely known locally in south Lebanon. One of his relatives was arrested in Antwerp, Belgium, in May 2003 in a case involving diamonds from West Africa and suspected money laundering on behalf of Hizbullah.

Mr. Jumblatt says the intention is to create a Shiite belt spanning the northern bank of the Litani, allowing Hizbullah freedom to operate while severing Christian and Druze districts from each other.

"I have bought some land in Sraireh to encourage people to stay," he says. "But I can't compete financially with Iran."

But Hizbullah officials dismiss the allegations as unfounded. "Walid Jumblatt likes to stir calm waters," says Sheikh Naim Qassem, Hizbullah's deputy leader. "Since when was Lebanon a series of cantons where Shiites can only buy land in Shiite areas?"

Tajiddine also plays down the sectarian nature of his business dealings, arguing that the area in question is only a "tiny fraction" of his nationwide property developments. "The buildings are for my employees who work in the quarries. I have employees who are Shiites, Druze, Sunnis, and Christians."

But the remaining residents of Qotrani and Sraireh question Tajiddine's interest in this remote district of south Lebanon. "There's nothing here. This is not an area for investment," says one, gesturing at the surrounding brush-covered mountains.

Israeli Troops Place Curfew On West Bank City (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 25 — The Israeli Army put the large West Bank city of Nablus under curfew on Sunday in one of the biggest military operations there in two years.

The Israeli forces discovered an explosives laboratory in Nablus, the second one found in two days, containing pipe bombs, explosive materials and a hand-held Lau guided missile and launcher that apparently had belonged to the Israeli Army, said Maj. Avital Leibovich of the Israeli Army.

It was not immediately clear whether the missile had been stolen or purchased.

The operation began Saturday and intensified before dawn on Sunday, with nearly 100 Israeli jeeps and armored vehicles moving into Nablus, blocking main roads. Troops began sweeps of the closely packed old city.

Some Palestinians responded by throwing stones or chunks of concrete, or by firing weapons. Two Israeli soldiers were slightly wounded, the army said, and six Palestinians were wounded, most by rubber-coated bullets, Palestinian medics said.

Two Palestinians were arrested and more than 30 detained for questioning, most of whom were released by nightfall on Sunday, Major Leibovich said.

Nablus, one of the largest cities in the West Bank, is a center for Palestinian militants, and the Israeli Army regularly patrols there. But this operation, the army said, was devised to “trim back” militant groups who had been stockpiling matériel, and to arrest some militants.

Hamas, which is more secretive in the Israeli-occupied West Bank than it is in Gaza, has been organizing in Nablus. It has quietly recruited members for a West Bank version of its police force in Gaza, known as the Executive Force, which it formed because the existing Palestinian police force is dominated by the rival Fatah faction.

Some 10,000 people in the center of Nablus were said to be under curfew. School classes were canceled. The Israeli Army also took over local television and radio stations, warning that the clampdown would remain in effect for several days, Palestinian residents said.

Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian negotiator and an aide to the Palestinian Authority’s president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, said, “This will undermine the efforts that are being made to sustain the cease-fire with Israel.”

In a statement, Mr. Abbas said, “This aggression by the Israeli occupation government is like cutting the road forward after all our efforts to find peace.”

In Gaza, Hamas officials said the raid had been intended to undermine efforts at completing a unity government that included Hamas and Fatah ministers. “We question why these military campaigns are increasing now,” said Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas-led government.

Referring to the recent talks between Palestinian leaders in Saudi Arabia, he said, “This indicates the Israeli government is trying to turn what was agreed upon in Mecca into a failure.”

A Hamas legislator also criticized King Abdullah II of Jordan for asking that a unity government meet international requirements and recognize Israel.

“I asked myself, What did the king offer to lift the siege on the Palestinian people and was he a part of the Arabic system or a part of another one?” said the lawmaker, Yehia Moussa.

DOJ_NMG_0136409

In an interview broadcast Saturday night on Israeli Channel 2, King Abdullah said, “There is Arabic and international harmony, and the upcoming Palestinian government must abide by this harmony.”

Elsewhere, a Jewish settler was stabbed to death Sunday near the West Bank city of Hebron, The Associated Press reported. The police said that it was unclear who killed the man, and that they were not ruling out a Palestinian attack, The AP said.

Israeli Troops Raid West Bank City (USAT)

Israeli security forces placed large areas of Nablus under curfew Sunday and conducted house-to-house raids in the largest military operation in the West Bank since July. Brig. Gen. Yair Golan said the operation was crucial to stop militant attacks against Israel. The army seized TV and radio stations, ordered people to stay indoors and said the clampdown would remain in effect for several days. The army said the curfew was to limit civilian casualties.

"We condemn this military incursion," said Saeb Erekat, a confidant to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. "This will undermine the efforts that are being made to sustain the cease-fire with Israel."

Prodi likely to stay in power

Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi's center-left coalition has secured enough support to win a confidence vote this week that will assure his continuation in power, a top ally said. "We have the majority," said Piero Fassino, who leads the coalition's largest party. Coalition partners committed to support Prodi's 12-point program. Prodi resigned Wednesday after losing a parliamentary vote on foreign policy, including keeping Italian troops in Afghanistan.

Guinea ruler agrees to demands

Guinea President Lansana Conte agreed to pick a new prime minister from a list proposed by opponents, a move that will end a general strike that has crippled the West African nation since Feb. 12.

"The strike will be lifted," union negotiator Ousmane Souare said. On Friday, the parliament rejected Conte's request to continue martial law, which has curbed street protests. Conte, 72, seized power in a 1984 coup. Political unrest has killed scores of people this year.

Pirates hijack U.N. aid ship

Pirates off the Horn of Africa hijacked a ship hired by the United Nations' World Food Program to carry aid to Somalia. "They have not made any demands," said Andrew Mwangura, director of the East African Seafarers Assistance Program.

Leo van der Velden, the food program's deputy country director for Somalia, said the Kenyan-owned freighter MV Rozen was empty after its 12-man crew had unloaded goods.

Out Of Gaza, Settlers In The Cold (LAT)

By Vita Bekker

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

NITZAN, ISRAEL — The wood-framed photo stands atop the television set, an obstinate reminder of what Avi Burstein's family lost.

In it, Burstein, his wife and four children are hugging one another on the green lawn of a sprawling red-roofed house. The tanned faces of the two grown sons stare bitterly into the camera. Their younger sisters, in long denim skirts with their brown hair pulled back, wear sad expressions.

The shot was taken hours before Israel removed more than 8,000 Jewish settlers, including the Bursteins, from the Gaza Strip in the summer of 2005.

"Imagine," Burstein said, a green knit skullcap covering his graying hair, as he peered at the photo through dark-rimmed glasses. "A person builds a house with his own 10 fingers. And then one day it's all erased."

But more than his home is gone. Burstein, 49, a farmer who grew lettuce, tomatoes and roses in greenhouses for export, has been jobless since the evacuation.

The Bursteins live in this southern Israeli community about 15 miles north of the Gaza Strip along with the biggest group of Gaza evacuees, numbering in the hundreds. Their temporary prefabricated house is less than half the size of the one they lost.

Straining to meet daily expenses, Burstein already has spent one-third of the compensation his family received to build a permanent home.

Other Gaza evacuees are in a similar fix. Many are older than 50 and unskilled for available jobs, an evacuees committee said. Others who restarted their businesses are losing money because costs in Israel are higher than in the Gaza Strip.

At this point, a quarter of the Gaza evacuees remain unemployed. And in more than 21 sites designated to become their permanent communities, construction has been delayed by the red tape of a resettlement program that has cost the Israeli government more than $2 billion.

The evacuees' predicament is a measure of the decline in political power of Israel's settler movement. It also is an indication of the difficulties Israel may encounter in any evacuation of the much larger number of settlements in the West Bank, considered an inevitable part of any final peace accord with the Palestinians. Only four small settlements in the northern West Bank were evacuated at the time of the Gaza withdrawal.

Israel's unilateral pullout from Gaza, led by then-Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, was widely welcomed by the international community as a step toward reviving long-moribund peace talks with the Palestinians. It was the first withdrawal from territories captured during the 1967 Middle East War and claimed by the Palestinians as part of a future state.

Most Israelis supported Sharon's "disengagement" from Gaza, which included the closing of Israel's military bases in the coastal strip. But the settlers, viewed by most Israelis as obstacles to peace, protested their "expulsion" from land they consider part of Jews' biblical birthright.

After Sharon suffered a debilitating stroke in January 2006, Ehud Olmert inherited the leadership of his newly formed centrist Kadima party, founded on a platform aiming to redraw Israel's borders.

Olmert was elected to succeed Sharon as prime minister in March 2006 on a pledge to withdraw many of the 250,000 settlers in the West Bank, a plan supported by the United States. The idea was shelved after Israel's war with Hezbollah last summer ended without clear resolution, weakening Olmert's government.

But the settler movement has not recovered.

The National Religious Party and the National Union, far-right parties closely identified with the movement, won a total of nine seats out of 120 in last year's parliamentary elections, and are part of the opposition. They had 11 seats between them in the previous parliamentary term, when they were initially part of the governing coalition.

Their decline is attributed in part to voter disappointment over their failure to influence the government to stop the withdrawal, political analysts say.

Another sign of the movement's waning power is the fact that few Gaza evacuees have chosen to restart their lives in the West Bank.

"People who in the past would have been considered perfect nominees for settling there are more hesitant because they're afraid they'll face the same future," said Yair Sheleg, a researcher at the Jerusalem-based Israel Democracy Institute and a columnist for the Haaretz newspaper.

Since the Gaza pullout, the settler movement has succeeded in pressing the government to support settlement expansion in the West Bank, in violation of Israel's commitment to freeze such activity under a 4-year-old U.S.-backed peace proposal known as the road map, with which neither side has complied.

Dror Etkes of Peace Now, an Israeli advocacy group that opposes settlements, said the settler population in the West Bank has continued to grow at a rate of about 5% a year in the last decade, mostly from births, and new construction has averaged about 1,500 housing units annually.

But the settlers have failed in efforts to persuade the government to establish new settlements in the West Bank. Defense Minister Amir Peretz approved plans in December to build a new housing outpost for Gaza evacuees on the site of an abandoned army base in the northern Jordan Valley, but an international outcry forced him to freeze construction a month later.

For many Gaza evacuees, their frustration has less to do with where they are allowed to relocate than how to make ends meet.

From his tiny office on the premises of what used to be a barber shop, about nine miles east of the city of Ashkelon, Lior Kalfa accuses the government of mishandling the evacuees' troubles.

"The system is doing all it can to wear us out," Kalfa, chairman of the evacuees committee, said.

Kalfa says the compensation settlers received for their Gaza homes is too little to allow them to build similar houses in southern Israel, where most have relocated.

Each family received between $70 and $93 per square foot of their former homes, he said, but in southern Israel building costs range from $90 to $110 per square foot.

Evacuees also say that compensation for their businesses, such as retail shops, factories and greenhouses, has been insufficient for them to start anew.

And they say Israeli law doesn't pay farmers for the loss of several growing seasons or compensate other business owners for the time it takes them to reestablish their companies.

"The Finance Ministry didn't want to create a costly precedent," Kalfa said. "They're worried about the financial significance of, God forbid, another withdrawal."

Avigdor Itzchaky, a member of Knesset, or parliament, with Olmert's Kadima party, acknowledged that the law had several "distortions" on payouts and he was mediating between the evacuees and the government to resolve them.

Criticism of the government's resettlement program has crossed political lines. Leading public figures who supported the Gaza pullout, including writers Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua, issued a petition this month warning the government that continued neglect of the evacuees "may erode the state's legitimacy" should it try to withdraw settlers from the West Bank.

Some of the problems stem from the fact that most Gaza evacuees rejected direct contact with the government until after the withdrawal. Nor did it help that the government agency created to administer the evacuation became fully operational only six months before the pullout.

Some evacuees won't let their disappointment get in the way of establishing new, remote settlements along Israel's desolate frontier lands.

Clad in a long beige skirt and black sweater, Dikla Cohen stood on a barren hill just east of the southern Israeli city of Kiryat Gat, surrounded by mostly hilly, rocky terrain speckled with patches of woods.

Two days earlier, Prime Minister Olmert had toured the area and promised to step up plans for seven new communities in Israel, mostly for Gaza evacuees. They would be situated less than a mile from the barrier separating Israel from the West Bank.

Cohen, 42, said her group's initial request to move to the West Bank was rejected by the government.

"We searched for a piece of land that Israel hasn't yet developed," said the mother of nine, with a gleam of eagerness in her blue eyes. "The government betrayed us with the evacuation, but they won't succeed in breaking my ideology."

Court Asked: Israel Still 'Occupying' Gaza? (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last week held up improvements in Gaza's only commercial link to the outside world as evidence of progress in Israeli-Palestinian relations.

But Sunday the Karni crossing at the Israel-Gaza border became the focus of a dispute in Israel's Supreme Court between human rights groups and the government. At issue: Does Israel have a responsibility to alleviate delays – lasting up to three months – in imported goods?

The debate highlights Gaza's murky legal status and whether Israel's control over the impoverished strip's key access points still determines it as an occupying power, even though it withdrew troops a year and a half ago.

The Supreme Court has yet to rule on the petition, submitted when Israel had shut down most crossings amid a military offensive there.

Human rights groups say Israel exercises an "invisible hand" in Gazans' daily lives because it can regulate commercial goods coming or leaving the territory. "The only way Gaza residents can receive a crate of milk ... and a shipment of medicines is through Israeli-controlled crossings,' " says Sari Bashi, the director of Gisha, an Israeli human rights group that cosponsored the petition. "Only Israel can fulfill this obligation to the residents of Gaza."

According to a Palestinian commercial group, the Karni crossing was open an average of five hours a day in December, despite Israel's commitment under a US-brokered accord on borders and access to ensure "continuous" operationover the terminal. Some 182 trucks carrying goods have been allowed in each day in the last half of 2006, compared with nearly twice that number in February 2006.

Still, both sides agree that commercial traffic has recovered in recent weeks – prompting Ms. Rice to cite the flow of goods at Karni to counter an impression that the Israeli-Palestinian peace process was stuck.

In November 2005, Israelis and Palestinians agreed to expand operation at Karni and Gaza's civilian crossing with Egypt at Rafah. Although Israel recently pledged to expand the hours at Karni, inspectors lacked funds to work at the crossing for more than one shift.

The dispute over Gaza's crossings underscores the tradeoff between Israeli security needs and the Palestinian need for the passage of people and commercial goods. In an affidavit submitted to the court, the Palestinian water utility said Gaza's main north-south highway has been flooded by sewage because Israeli authorities haven't let through the needed pipes. An Israeli army official, said that the pipe infrastructure has been dug up by militants and used in Kassam rockets to fire into Israel.

Gisha argued in January that Israel's occupation in Gaza remains in force. It claims that Israel controls everything from land crossings to tax policy to the Gaza population registry.

According to the 1907 Hague Convention on war, the litmus test to determine foreign occupation is whether an outside power exercises "effective control" over another territory.

Israel argues that it no longer occupies the Gaza Strip, having pulled out its last soldiers in September 2005. It points out that it has even turned its civilian passage with Gaza, the Erez crossing, into an international border terminal.

DOJ_NMG_0136412

Israel blames the Palestinians for their economic hardship, citing continued cross- border rocket fire and the Hamas-led Palestinian government, which refuses to meet international conditions for budgetary aid.

"The claim that Israel retains effective control today is to ignore reality," says Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

The Israeli-Palestinian peace accords in the 1990s defined the Gaza Strip and the West Bank as a single political unit, challenging Israel's claim to have ended the occupation in one area.

"It was a partial evacuation,' " says Yoram Dinstein, an expert on international law at Tel Aviv University. "There are remnants of the occupation, and access is one of those remnants."

U.S., Russia Envoys Seek To Cool Tension (AP)

By Desmond Butler

AP, February 26, 2007

The top U.S. and Russian diplomats on Sunday tried to play down concerns about a Cold War revival set off by Russian President Vladimir Putin's claim that Washington is fostering a global arms race.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov could not put aside disagreements about a proposed U.S. missile defense system in Europe.

Lavrov wrote in Sunday's Washington Post that Putin's recent remarks have been widely misinterpreted.

"From the reaction of some Western journalists and politicians, one would think that the Russian president wished to ignite a blast of anti-American rhetoric to spark another Cold War," Lavrov wrote.

Rice also denied the rhetoric could push the countries back to Cold War-era relations.

"Russia is not the Soviet Union and we have to recognize that," she said. "We are cooperating with the Russians on a number of fronts, on North Korea, on Iran, in nuclear — trying to prevent nuclear terrorism."

Putin said at a conference in Germany this month that the United States "has overstepped its national borders in every way" and is promoting a global arms race. His speech and subsequent Russian statements raised concerns about a proposed U.S. missile defense system in Europe that would include facilities in two former Soviet satellites, Poland and the Czech Republic.

Lavrov said Putin's speech reflected objections about the U.S. exerting its power without consulting other countries.

"He called for a world with many centers of influence where different interests work together, multilaterally, to shape a common denominator on global issues," Lavrov wrote. "What should Russia believe when the United States seeks to place anti-missile systems in Eastern Europe?"

Rice said Russia's objections to the missile defense system were unjustified.

"No one would suggest, anyone who knows anything about this, would suggest that somehow 10 interceptors deployed in Poland are going to threaten the thousands of warheads in the Russian deterrent," Rice said. "It's a ludicrous claim."

U.S. officials have said the interceptors being proposed for Europe could be overwhelmed easily by the size and speed of Russia's vast arsenal of intercontinental nuclear missiles and that the system is aimed at counteracting a potential threat from Iran.

Other parts of the system outside of Europe would be aimed at defending against a possible attack from North Korea.

But in an interview published Sunday, Lavrov repeated Russian concerns that the system would in fact be directed elsewhere.

"To retaliate against threats, even imagined ones, radars and anti-missile launch pads wouldn't seem necessary, because the trajectories of the imagined missiles flying from Iran or North Korea go in an absolutely different direction," Lavrov was quoted as saying by the Interfax news agency.

In his op-ed, Lavrov also addressed NATO's expansion into what was the Soviet sphere of influence.

"With the Warsaw Pact dissolved for more than 15 years, why does NATO still spread toward Russian borders?" he wrote.

Rice said NATO no longer threatened Russia.

"I think the expansion of NATO and the expansion of the European Union is, in fact, one of the great stories of the post-Cold War time," she said. "Russia has nothing to fear by having democracies on its borders."

Rice was interviewed on "Fox News Sunday."

Europe Warms To US Missile Shield (CSM)

By Jeffrey White, Contributor To The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, February 25, 2007

Concerns about Iran have reduced opposition to US plans to extend its 'star wars' defense system.

DOJ_NMG_0136413

PRAGUE, CZECH REPUBLIC

US plans to extend its "star wars" missile-defense program to Europe, which once dismissed the technology as an unproven cold-war anachronism, are gaining acceptance among governments here.

Despite Russia's mounting opposition, the Czech Republic, Poland, and – as of Friday – Britain have all expressed serious interest in hosting parts of the shield. Other countries traditionally cool to the idea have been notably quiet. The trigger: concern about a nuclear Iran.

"This is all a result of Iran," says Tim Williams, a European security analyst at the Royal United Services Institute for Defence and Security Studies in London. "Governments see that Iranian missiles can hit Europe, and suddenly they are very worried about the threat from ballistic missiles. They have to look at missile defenses."

Sunday, Iranian media reported that the country had launched a rocket into space, raising speculation that Iran was nearing the technological capacity to launch intercontinental missiles. That report, which quoted the head of Iran's aerospace research center, was quickly denied by his deputy, however.

There was no such equivocation from Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who, ahead of Tuesday's UN Security Council meeting on Iran's disputed nuclear program, compared its nuclear drive to a train that has no brakes.

The US, which says that a European shield would intercept ballistic missiles fired from "rogue states" such as Iran, wants to build a radar station here in the Czech Republic and a corresponding base with 10 interceptor missiles in neighboring Poland. After years of talks, the US last month approached the Czech and Polish governments about hosting the shield.

Since then, developments have come quickly. A week ago, Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolánek met with Polish Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski in Warsaw and said they expected to go along with the plan. Then on Friday, Britain confirmed that Prime Minister Tony Blair has been in talks with the US about stationing antiballistic missiles there as part of the shield.

Czech President Václav Klaus travels to Washington next month to discuss the matter with Vice President Dick Cheney. President Bush is weighing a trip to Poland and possibly here this summer.

Currently two bases – one in Alaska, one in California, believed to host 13 and three missiles respectively – make up the US missile defense shield. Detractors say missile defense technology – in which radars and missile silos work in tandem to pinpoint and then intercept enemy missiles – still remains unproven.

But Mr. Bush has made missile defense a priority: He has earmarked $18.5 billion to be spent by 2009. Czech media reported that the US plans to set aside $118 million for a base in Central Europe this year.

"The US is eager to move quickly on this because they have spent a lot of money and they want something to show for it," says Mr. Williams.

The plan is to start constructing the base and radar station next year, with the shield coming online by 2012.

Russia fears 'arms race'

Russia, whose Kaliningrad enclave borders Poland, has been the plan's most vocal opponent so far. A Russian general recently threatened Czechs and Poles with a future retaliatory missile strike.

And in Munich earlier this month, Russian President Vladimir Putin said the missile shield would plunge the world into a new arms race, and that the US, Europe, and Russia were on the brink of a new cold war.

"[The proposed shield] is very serious, and it breaks the strategic balance that now exists in Europe," says Alexey Fedotov, Moscow's ambassador to Prague.

Germany chided the US for not informing Russia of its designs on an antiballistic missile base in Poland, but it also appeared to throw some support to the US, calling for a full discussion of the proposal without protests and "anti-American insinuations." France, traditionally Europe's staunchest opponent of missile defense, has been silent on the issue, as have Denmark and Sweden – two countries that have been cool toward past US missile defense plans.

"You don't see the French and Germans kicking up much of a fuss about this," says Williams.

The shift away from opposition to US plans for a missile shield has been subtle and easy to miss, experts say. In a largely unnoticed speech about his country's nuclear strategy, for example, French President Jacques Chirac said last year for the first time that there was room in it for missile defense.

The US plan is moving ahead outside NATO, whose own shield proposal – the Active Load Theater Missile Defense – has dragged on for years in feasibility studies.

But it is NATO, experts say, which sheds some light on Russia's truculent opposition to a US missile base in Europe.

Since the fall of communism, Moscow watched as NATO continued to expand almost to its borders, incorporating most of the countries in the former Eastern Bloc.

"There is a moment when you suddenly remember all the bad things that have been happening for some time. You look at them and you see an array of negative signals, and you cannot ignore them," says Ivan Safranchuk, director of the Moscow branch of the World Security Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0136414

But Russia watchers see little likelihood that Moscow will act.

"Russia's response is totally political," says Alexander Golts, who covers security issues for Yezhednyevny Zhurnal, an online newspaper in Russia. "To all serious experts it's obvious that this missile defense cannot threaten Russia's nuclear forces."

Don't look for referendums

The Czech and Polish governments seem poised to move on the US plan without putting it to a pubic vote, despite a growing call in both countries for a referendums. A Czech poll last week put 60 percent of the country against hosting any part of the shield, and in Britain, antinuclear groups are already criticizing the Blair government for wanting to be involved in the US shield.

"What we're seeing now is the product of near on seven years of diplomatic effort led by the Bush administration to get European governments to leave behind the cold-war version of missile defense," says Tom Karako, director of the Claremont Institute, a conservative think tank in Claremont, Calif.

"Now that the cold war is over, these governments have come to the realization that that version ... won't suffice in the future."

Italy's Prodi Set To Revive Government (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

ROME -- After resigning as Italy's prime minister last week, Romano Prodi is preparing to resurrect his government with his old cabinet intact and push ahead with his political program.

Keeping his slate of ministers in place could be a positive sign for completing some of the ambitious fiscal and economic goals Mr. Prodi has set.

After Mr. Prodi's administration came undone last week when it lost a Senate vote, President Giorgio Napolitano directed him to rebuild his parliamentary coalition -- which had commanded only a one-vote Senate majority.

Over the past few days, Mr. Prodi has lured a few new allies to his side in order to bolster his narrow majority in Parliament. He also forced the members of his coalition to sign off on a 12-point document aimed at guaranteeing greater cohesion within the group, which now numbers 10 parties ranging from Catholics to hard-core communists. Among Mr. Prodi's new supporters are the members of a small centrist party founded by a former ally of center-right opposition leader Silvio Berlusconi.

With a new coalition tentatively in place, Mr. Prodi must address Parliament this week before facing confidence votes in the upper and lower houses.

In an unusual development, Mr. Prodi's cabinet is expected to remain unchanged. Past Italian government shake-ups have usually resulted in a shuffling of ministerial posts, as power is redistributed among different parties to maintain a delicate balance.

Mr. Prodi has achieved modest success in reversing years of runaway deficit spending that had risked unraveling the country's public accounts. He has also moved to open up various sectors of the economy -- from auto insurance to legal services -- that had remained buffered from competition.

Still, Mr. Prodi's coalition remains rife with internal divisions, particularly over foreign policy, and it remains to be seen whether he will be able to keep the different parties in line. Among the reasons the government lost the Senate vote last week were disagreements over whether Italian soldiers should remain part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization-led mission in Afghanistan.

Yesterday, one of Mr. Prodi's most ideologically charged allies, Oliviero Diliberto, head of the Party of Italian Communists, said the brief political crisis had "warned all of us to be more responsible." The government faces a thorny legislative agenda in the coming months, however, including a possible overhaul of Italy's costly pension regime -- an issue that is bound to divide members of Mr. Prodi's coalition.

Italian governments have usually emerged weaker, not stronger, from near-death experiences. Mr. Prodi was jettisoned as prime minister in 1998 after losing a budget measure by a single vote.

Prodi Prepares For Confidence Vote This Week (AFP)

AFP, February 26, 2007

Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi, who resigned over a foreign policy defeat last week only to be reappointed a few days later, will fight for his government's survival as he faces a confidence vote this week.

Parliamentary group chiefs from both houses of parliament are scheduled on Monday to set a date for the vote, with media predictions falling on Thursday in the Senate and Friday in the House of Representatives.

"Il Professore" as the 67-year-old Prodi is known, spent the weekend preparing a presentation of his new, 12 point "non-negotiable" programme which he imposed on his unwieldy centre-left coalition allies last Thursday.

Since securing renewed backing of his coalition partners after intense negotiations, Prodi and his allies believe the embattled former European Commission chief will muster enough votes to survive.

Prodi also got an unexpected boost when he won the support of opposition Senator Marco Follini, once a key ally of former prime minister Silvio Berlusconi.

Piero Fassino, leader of the largest party in Prodi's coalition, welcomed the move on Sunday as "the opening of a new phase" for the government, while the opposition accused Follini of a sell-out.

According to Italy's leading newspaper Corriere della Sera, Prodi's immediate survival is due more to preventing Berlusconi's rapid return to power than any new-found unity breaking out across his multi-hued coalition, which ranges from communist to Catholic parties.

"This agreement has not been made in order to govern but to avoid others regaining power," the newspaper said in an editorial Sunday.

Commentator Ilvo Diamanti, writing in the left-leaning La Repubblica, said "fear of the 'tyrant' Berlusconi is a little weak to keep the coalition together long-term."

Serbia Faces Judgment Day On Bosnia (WT/AP)

By Arthur Max, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

THE HAGUE -- In one of the most momentous cases in its 60 years, the United Nations' highest court will deliver its judgment today on Bosnia's demand to make Serbia accountable for the slaughter, terrorizing, rape and displacement of Bosnian Muslims in the early 1990s.

If it rules for Bosnia, the International Court of Justice could open the way for compensation amounting to billions of dollars from Serbia, the successor state of Slobodan Milosevic's Yugoslavia. Specific claims would be addressed later.

Such a ruling also would be a permanent stain on Serbia in the eyes of history, regardless of any effort by Belgrade to distance itself from the brutality of those years.

Reflecting the complexities, the 16 judges have deliberated for 10 months since hearing final arguments. Officials at the World Court, as it is informally known, say that reading out the summary of the judgment is likely to take three hours.

The court was created after World War II to adjudicate disputes among U.N. members, most often over borders or treaty violations. Its decisions are binding, without appeal and enforceable by the Security Council.

The Bosnia case touches deep nationalist chords and arouses strong emotions. Among survivors expected to stand vigil outside the baroque Peace Palace while the decision is read are women from Srebrenica, where about 8,000 men were killed in July 1995.

Bosnia first approached the court 14 years ago, during the chaos of Yugoslavia's bloody disintegration. The political landscape has since changed dramatically, with both Bosnia and Serbia separately seeking membership in the European Union.

"This will be a very significant judgment, both from the perspective of the aftermath of the conflict and for international law generally," said Andre Nollkaemper, director of the Amsterdam Center for International Law at the University of Amsterdam.

Other courts already have ruled that acts of genocide occurred during the Bosnian war, when more than 100,000 people were killed in a Bosnian Serbian campaign that gave the world the phrase "ethnic cleansing."

Two Bosnian Serbian officers have been convicted by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. Gen. Radislav Krstic is serving a 35-year prison term for aiding and abetting genocide, and Col. Vidoje Blagojevic is appealing his 18-year sentence for complicity in genocide. Mr. Milosevic died last year in his prison cell in the final weeks of his four-year-long genocide trial.

The World Court case, entirely separate from the tribunal's deliberations, is not about people. Bosnia says the Serbian state must accept blame.

It argues that Serbia's nationalist ideology incited genocidal hatred, its financial and military aid to the Bosnian Serbs gave them the tools for genocide, and Yugoslav army officers actively participated in driving out Muslims.

Serbia says it's not that simple. Genocide, by definition, requires the clear intent to wipe out an ethnic or racial group, in whole or in part, in specific territories. Serbia says it never waged such a systematic campaign.

Moving Kosovo On (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0136416

Earlier this month, a United Nations envoy, Martti Ahtisaari, presented a sensible plan for the future of Kosovo. The small Serbian province has been administered by the United Nations since 1999, when NATO went to war to defend its ethnic Albanian majority. Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal would effectively grant Kosovo independence, but with strict limits, extensive international supervision, and protection for the ethnic Serbs and other minorities who live there.

The plan has been attacked by all sides. Kosovo's Serbs, and their allies in Belgrade, say they will never recognize an independent Kosovo. Kosovo's Albanians will accept nothing less.

There are few heroes in this story. Kosovo's Albanians have failed to live up to standards of human rights and democratic governance laid down by the U.N. That is why their independence must be conditional. Kosovo's European stewards have repeatedly delayed decisions on independence, hoping the Serbs' anger would cool. It has not. Further delay, we fear, will not bring the two sides to a consensus.

The United States and Europe should press the Security Council to quickly endorse the Ahtisaari plan. The international community and NATO — having invested so much in Kosovo — must continue to stay deeply involved. It would not be surprising if, after seven years, interest has flagged. But without more outside help, there is little hope for building a peaceful democracy in Kosovo.

US In Macau To Discuss N. Korea Funds (AP)

By Min Lee

AP, February 26, 2007

A U.S. Treasury Department delegation was in Macau on Monday briefing local officials about the investigation of North Korean bank accounts in the Chinese territory, an American official said.

The visit came about two weeks after a breakthrough agreement in which North Korea agreed to initial steps to abandon its nuclear weapons program. American negotiators have agreed to resolve financial restrictions by mid-March.

North Korea has been especially angry about U.S. restrictions imposed in 2005 on Banco Delta Asia in Macau. Washington alleged the small bank was complicit in North Korea's counterfeiting and money laundering.

The U.S. allegations prompted Macau to freeze about $24 million at Banco Delta Asia. That led banks worldwide to shun North Korean business for fears of losing access to American markets.

On Monday, Dale Kreisher, spokesman at the U.S. Consulate General in Hong Kong, told The Associated Press that the U.S. Treasury delegation was in Macau briefing local officials about the Banco Delta Asia case.

"Discussions (with North Korea) along with the U.S. investigation have brought Treasury to the point where they think they can begin taking steps to resolve the BDA matter," said Kreisher, whose office is also responsible for Macau.

Kreisher declined to say if Washington was ready to lift the sanctions on the bank. He also wouldn't say who was in the delegation and how long it would spend in Macau.

Long Division (WSJ)

By Robert B. Zoellick

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

During President Hu Jintao's visit to the White House last spring, George Bush initiated a conversation over lunch about North Korea, and asked whether Kim Jong Il might consider Deng Xiaoping's pattern of reform. The Chinese president replied that he did not know, but thought Kim wanted to change. He added that when Deng took the risk of opening China in the late 1970s, he was reassured by a non-threatening external environment. Kim, said Mr. Hu, might find it easier to move if he received a positive signal. Mr. Bush replied, "What if we offered him a peace treaty?"

Not long thereafter, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi had his farewell stop at the White House. When Mr. Bush probed about China's influence with North Korea, Mr. Koizumi suggested that U.S. signals loomed large in Pyongyang's calculations. History had led the Koreans to be suspicious of their neighbors, including China, and Koreans sense the U.S. might be the most important guarantor for Korea's future.

These exchanges illuminate strategic perspectives that underpin the U.S. approach to the recent six-party accord. First, the administration views this initial step as the beginning of a course that extends far beyond North Korea's nuclear program or even peace on the peninsula: The U.S. wants to set a direction for security relations in Northeast Asia for decades to come. Left unchecked, North Korea's nuclear weapons and missiles might build a movement in South Korea and Japan for their own programs. Washington wants the six-party process both to stymie North Korea's programs and develop closer security relations among the participants.

China is already acting as a "responsible stakeholder" by urging North Korea to step back from confrontation. By proposing a peace treaty to replace the 1953 armistice, the U.S. not only seeks to close out this vestige of the Cold War but also to open the way to overcome the painful legacies on the peninsula and in the region dating back to World War II, the Russo-Japanese War of 1904-05, and even the Sino-Japanese War of 1894-95.

The hard work ahead involves not only maintaining pressure to close down all nuclear weapons programs, but steps to build confidence on the peninsula, security assurances and transparency -- between the Koreas, as well as with the neighbors the Koreans may fear more than one another. This process will open the way for returning Japanese abductees, connecting energy and economic support to North Korean reforms, and enhancing cooperation between China and Japan. These conditions would improve the international environment in which the two Koreas could someday end the cruel division of one people.

Second, the administration believes the best way to change North Korean behavior and improve the lives of its people is to combine pressure with an opportunity for North Korea to open to the world step by step. The regime bases its terrible repression on a bizarre self-image that combines superiority and a state of siege. To end this and open eyes to a different world, the other five parties are offering peace and the prospect of normal ties. In line with Mr. Hu's suggestion, Mr. Bush is shaping an external environment that removes the rationalization for keeping the lid on North Korea's stunted development.

Third, the U.S. government recognizes that the forces of history -- and economics -- are on its side, not North Korea's. Having lost a war in Vietnam 30 years ago, the U.S. is winning the peace because of the magnet of its economic dynamism, its central role in the institutions of the world economy, the power of the private sector, and its role as a counterweight in Asia. The trends in world economics, information flows, and technology give America a new type of "strategic depth" that enables it to confidently offer North Korea a path away from isolation. Ironically, as Messrs. Hu and Koizumi observed, a reforming North Korea is likely to perceive the U.S. as a resource and reassurance (as should South Korea).

Of course, this six-party accord is only a portal. North Korea needs to fulfill its September 2005 commitment to abandon all nuclear weapons and programs. North Korea's steps are likely to be halting as it weighs the risks of opening with those of isolation. Yet even if Pyongyang chooses belligerence, U.S. cooperation with the other four parties will position it better to quarantine the dangers. The five can best deter North Korea. They will be best able to prevent the selling of nuclear materials.

President Bush does not view this move as another accord limited to nonproliferation objectives. It opens the way for peace and reconciliation on the peninsula and a means to shape the future security arrangements in East Asia. It is a recognition that America's diplomatic toolkit for dangerous states involves more than threats of force and isolation. The challenge for this administration, and those to come, will be to avoid letting the process slip into minimalist, tactical tradeoffs and instead to maintain strategic vision guiding the diplomacy of opening North Korea.

Mr. Zoellick, a former U.S. trade representative and deputy secretary of state, is vice chairman, international, of Goldman Sachs.

Thais Struggle With Violent Insurgency (NYT)

By Seth Mydans

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

PATTANI, Thailand, Feb. 22 — Some are already calling it war, a brutal Muslim separatist insurgency in southern Thailand that has taken as many as 2,000 lives in three years with almost daily bombings, drive-by shootings, arson and beheadings.

It is a conflict the government admits it is losing. A harsh crackdown and martial law in recent years seem only to have fueled the insurgency by generating fear and anger and undermining moderate Muslim voices.

A new policy of conciliation in the past four months has been met by increased violence, including a barrage of 28 coordinated bombings in the south that killed or wounded about 60 people on Feb. 18.

“The momentum of violence is now beyond the control of government policy,” said Srisompob Jitpiromsri, a political scientist at Prince of Songkhla University here.

“The separatists can pick and choose the time and place of the violence without any effective resistance from the government,” he said. “They have the upper hand.”

Now the insurgents seem to be taking their war to a new stage, pitting local Buddhists against Muslims by attacking symbols of Buddhism with flamboyant brutality.

The two religions had coexisted through the years here, often in separate villages. That mutual tolerance is breaking down now, and there are fears of a sectarian conflict that could flare out of control.

“Buddhist monks, temples, novices,” said Sunai Phasuk, a political analyst with the monitoring group Human Rights Watch. “Buddhist monks have been hacked to death, clubbed to death, bombed and burned to death. This has never happened before. This is a new aspect of violence in the south.”

In another new development, said Francesca Lawe-Davies, an analyst with the International Crisis Group, some remote areas had become, in effect, off limits for the police or military, at least temporarily and perhaps permanently.

"It appears in the last year or so that insurgent groups are actually starting to control territory in a more conventional sense," she said.

Some Buddhist and Muslim villages have begun sealing themselves off from one another, and people in both the region's towns and villages say old friendships and patterns of cooperation are being undermined by mistrust.

Entire Buddhist communities have also fled in a "de facto ethnic cleansing," said Zachary Abuza, the author of "Militant Islam in Southeast Asia," in a report published last month. "The social fabric of the south has been irreparably damaged."

About 1.3 million ethnic Malay Muslims form a majority in Thailand's three southernmost provinces — Yala, Narathiwat and Pattani — a tiny percentage of the population of 65 million, which is overwhelmingly Buddhist.

The Muslims have complained of discrimination and attempts at forced assimilation since Thailand annexed the former Sultanate of Pattani a century ago. Armed insurgencies have risen and subsided over the past four decades, but the government may now be facing its most dangerous challenge.

"What is new about the current conflict is the level and degree of violence, the Islamist agenda of the insurgents and their unprecedented degree of cooperation and coordination," Mr. Abuza said.

"The level of violence in Thailand's south has never been higher," he said. "Nor has it been more brutal."

He said in his report that there had been more than 24 beheadings in the past three years and as many as 60 similar attacks.

Human Rights Watch counted more than 6,000 violent episodes over the past three years. It said more than 60 teachers and 10 students had been killed and 110 schools — the most visible signs of central government authority in many places — had been set ablaze.

About half the insurgents' attacks have been against other Muslims, especially those who cooperate with the government, in what appears to be an effort to weaken central control. The victims include not only village chiefs and suspected collaborators but also those who work in government jobs, teach at government-financed schools or work in major sectors like rubber tapping.

All of this adds up to war, Mr. Srisompob said. The military has flooded the region with up to 20,000 new troops; checkpoints have been set up along the roads; soldiers travel in convoys of armored vehicles.

"In the local communities in the red zones, it already is a war situation," he said. "It is different now from last year, from the last two years."

The insurgency is all the more difficult to combat because it does not show its face. Unlike most similar movements, this one has not set out its demands or published a manifesto. It is a collection of violent groups without clear central leadership.

When a Thai commander proposed a new policy of negotiation last year, he said it would be difficult because he did not know whom to negotiate with.

"We are fighting a ghost," said Chidchanok Rahimmula, a lecturer in security at Prince of Songkhla.

The policy of conciliation was put in place by Prime Minister Surayud Chulanont, who took power after Thaksin Shinawatra was ousted as prime minister in a coup in September.

Mr. Surayud apologized for the harsh policies of his predecessor during his six years in office, promised to investigate abuses and restructured the military command for the south.

People in rural areas say soldiers and police officers have become less aggressive and are trying to reach out by attending local fairs and holding dialogues.

Mr. Surayud conceded recently that none of that was working. "We can't see the results in three to four months because the painful feelings of southern people in the past four to five years run deep," he told reporters. "This is not easy to cure."

Indeed, the insurgency has responded by stepping up its violence, apparently in an effort to block any peace agreement. There has been no serious reply to Mr. Surayud's offer of negotiations.

People who live here, both in the villages and urban areas, say they have never been so frightened.

"Muslims feel fear, Buddhists feel fear," said Abdullayi Che-are-sae, 39, a local official in Tapong, a settlement of 200 Muslim families in a red zone near the city of Pattani. "But we don't know who we are afraid of."

At night, he said, the village falls silent as people close their doors and windows and turn off their lights, listening for the sounds of intruders.

Less than a mile down the road, the people of Khlong Tam, a Buddhist village, fall silent, too, he said, sharing the fears of their neighbors.

But the Muslims of Tapong and the Buddhists of Khlong Tam, who were once on cordial terms, have armed themselves and hardly speak to one another now, he said.

Here in the provincial capital, Chidchanok, who is Muslim, said she and her children check under the car every morning for bombs.

"And not only me," she said. "We don't go out at night. We shop at stalls in the street and don't go into the marketplace."

DOJ_NMG_0136419

She said that people were afraid now to stand close to a government official or a soldier or police officer, potential targets of bullets or bombs.

"When we are in a restaurant, if we see a soldier or policeman nearby we hurry to leave," she said.

Shopkeepers are wary too. "In the shops near the university, if a soldier or policeman comes to buy something, the owner says, 'Quickly — just buy something and leave.' "

Southern Thailand, she said, had become "a kingdom of terror, a kingdom of fear."

"We really wonder about their identity and how they can be doing this," she said of the insurgents. "They are destroying their own society. They kill the teachers. They kill the teachers who teach their own children."

U.N. Weighs Deploying Force To Chad (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

BAHAI, Chad (AP) — Tribal leaders are desperate for the deployment of a U.N. peacekeeping force along Chad's border with Sudan to protect refugees and stop increasing spillover from the violence in Darfur.

The U.N. Security Council is considering a mission, with up to 10,000 troops, largely because Sudan's government has resisted efforts to send U.N. peacekeepers to Darfur itself.

But Chad's president is worried about inflaming tensions with Sudan, while U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon has warned the Security Council that peacekeepers would face "serious risks" of rebel attacks.

The two countries have strained relations because Chad supports the Darfur rebellion against the Sudanese government, and Sudan strongly backs Chadian rebels settled in Darfur, Western observers say.

Tens of thousands of Darfur refugees live in scorching, wind-beaten camps on Chad's side of the border, competing with Chadian villagers over scarce water and firewood. Various rebel groups and militias roam the vast region.

"We are waiting impatiently for the international force to arrive and protect both the border and the refugees," said Timan Deby, the sultan or traditional ruler of Bahai, a desert outpost in Chad near the Sudanese border.

More than 200,000 people have died since ethnic African tribesmen in Darfur took up arms four years ago, complaining of discrimination by the Arab-dominated Sudanese government. The U.N. blames the Sudanese government's counterinsurgency for the bulk of the atrocities. Of the 2.5 million people who have fled their homes, 230,000 have ended up in refugee camps inside Chad.

Along the frontier, clashes between ethnic groups and cross-border raids are "carried out with impunity," the British aid group Oxfam said recently. Dozens of civilians have been killed in recent weeks, Oxfam said.

So far, none of the 12 refugee camps have been attacked, but several villages have been plundered.

The region's governor, Atom Dillo, said the U.N. force was necessary to stop Sudanese infiltration into Chad, which he said was part of Sudan's strategy to destabilize its neighbor and prevent aid workers from helping Darfur refugees.

Chad's President Idriss Deby has accepted the idea of a U.N. mission on his border in principle. But Western officials in Chad say he is worried the force might be used as a starting point for deployment into Darfur, which would anger Sudan.

"He doesn't want to be seen as facilitating a possible invasion of a neighboring state, even Sudan," said one Western official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the situation's sensitivity.

Ban said Deby has proposed that the U.N. mission be a civilian one. He told the Security Council last week that any peacekeeping mission should help keep peace in refugee camps and deploy at key points to prevent cross-border attacks. But he warned it would carry "serious risks."

Last year, Chadian rebels based in Sudan launched several raids, briefly seizing the major eastern Chad town of Abeche and attacking the capital, N'djamena. Reports of smaller clashes come almost daily.

Col. Vincent Tesnieres, who commands a 1,000-strong French force already deployed in Chad, accused Sudan of providing the rebels with the ground-air missiles that recently helped them down Chadian aircraft.

"What is striking is that we now witness a level of violence completely unknown to Chad before," said Serge Male, the head of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Chad.

The UNHCR says it has a contingency plan for up to 50,000 more people to arrive from Darfur. The agency is trying to relocate the Darfur refugee camps further east from the border to ease the strain on Chad's meager natural resources.

The Chadian army is trying to protect the Darfur refugee camps but can't do much because it needs to focus on protecting the border, said Gen. Kalimi Sangui Abdalla, who commands Chadian military operations on the eastern frontier.

"This is why we will welcome United Nations forces," he said.

Gambian Defends The International Criminal Court's Initial Focus On Africans (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

DOJ_NMG_0136420

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

THE HAGUE, Feb. 25 — The windows of Fatou Bensouda's office high up in the International Criminal Court's headquarters here offer her a sweeping view of orderly Dutch flatlands. But her attention is turned to her native Africa, on the chaos and killing at the heart of the court's first atrocities cases.

Mrs. Bensouda, a 45-year-old Gambian with an open and easy manner, is one of the court's top officials. She is the deputy to the chief prosecutor, and is in charge of trials concerning war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.

All of the cases set to be taken up by the five-year-old court so far involve Africa, and the people she hopes to try include a list of warlords from four nations, leaders who were most prominent in Africa's recent conflagrations, some of which continue today.

The Darfur region of Sudan looms large on that agenda, because on Tuesday the prosecution plans to file its first criminal charges linked to the conflict between the Sudanese government and the rebel fighters. The prosecution will disclose the names of several senior figures it believes to be among those most responsible for Darfur's devastating bloodshed and human disaster. Other names are expected to follow.

The arrest of the Sudanese suspects is not certain. Court officials said Sudan, while insisting it was cooperating, had done its best to obstruct the court's investigations, ordered by the United Nations Security Council two years ago.

In one of the newly outfitted courtrooms, though, Mrs. Bensouda has already met one of the warlords on her list. Thomas Lubanga, a Congolese citizen and once a powerful militia leader, has been charged with conscripting and abusing children, some as young as 10, during the fighting in the country's Ituri region. He is the only suspect in the court's custody, and his trial, expected later this year, will be the first since the tribunal opened for business in 2002.

Besides Darfur, other cases under investigation involve the civil war in Congo and conflicts in Uganda and the Central African Republic, which have caused tens of thousands of deaths and created millions of refugees. Requests for the investigations, except in the case of Darfur, came from the countries themselves, but that has not prevented concern among Africans that their continent is the new court's principal target.

Mrs. Bensouda calmly dismisses that notion. "This court does not intend to focus only on Africans; it will prove that in the future," she said. "But at the moment, Africa clearly presents the gravest situations."

"This is also our court. It is not imposed on us — we want to believe in it," she continued, pointing out that of the 104 nations who are now full members of the court, among the first to sign on were numerous African states. Some larger nations, including China, Russia and the United States, which distrust the court's powers, are not members.

Mrs. Bensouda's country, Gambia, has mostly escaped the kind of serious violence on which her career now focuses. But it was her revolt against widespread injustice that drew her to the law from an early age.

"I was not suffering, but around me there were many victims of violence and crime, often women, who had no means to defend themselves," she said. One of her uncles, a judge, "had a deep influence on me."

Today, Mrs. Bensouda is a prosecutor who, over the course of a career that now spans two decades, has gained wide experience, rising to become her country's minister of justice and a senior prosecutor at the United Nations tribunal dealing with the Rwandan genocide in the 1990s.

She has long worked for gaining more legal protection for women, by having laws changed at home, and by emphasizing large-scale sexual abuse of women during conflicts.

It was her past as an advocate for women's legal rights that led many women's groups to applaud her election to the International Court — and now, more recently, to criticize her, along with the broader prosecution strategy in Mr. Lubanga's case.

Human rights advocates have said the Congolese trial has been far too narrow in its scope, focusing only on charges of conscription of children by Mr. Lubanga, rather than addressing the worst crimes of the militia under his command.

Last year, eight human rights groups, known for their support for the court, wrote an open letter to the chief prosecutor, Luis Moreno Ocampo, deploring that two years of investigations had not produced a broader range of charges. It was well known, the letter said, that Mr. Lubanga, leader of the Union of Congolese Patriots, a violent militia, "has committed numerous other serious crimes, including murder, torture and sexual violence."

In a meeting with the prosecutor, some human rights activists said that prosecuting only child conscription, which war victims do not regard as serious as the many killings, rapes and mutilations, sent the wrong signal to victims.

"Yes, we have been criticized," Mrs. Bensouda said, "but we believe that the problem of child soldiers is very, very serious. Some are turned into killers, others are used as sex slaves. It is affecting a whole generation of children who are very difficult to reintegrate into society. Fighting is often all they know. It's a problem in many places, and we want to highlight this here."

According to a United Nations report, after the Congolese conflict more than 18,000 children were released from armed groups and thousands more escaped on their own in the past two years. Worldwide, as many as a quarter-million young children are forced to serve in wars, by some estimates.

Torture, rape and other sexual offenses, she said, were very much part of the other investigations before the court. As for Mr. Lubanga, she added, “for now he will be tried for child conscription because that is where we had the best evidence at the time we issued charges.”

Sudan, In Mud Brick And Marble (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Feb. 25 -- On the desert edges of Sudan's capital, Suzanne Yobu, who has a business degree and a decidedly proper manner, lives in a mud-brick house in a sprawling squatter's camp called Soba Aradi.

Sometimes, though, she attends church in the city, a place booming with oil money that comes mostly from her home region of southern Sudan, which she fled during a civil war that ended in 2005.

In a clankety bus, she passes the airport, where travelers can buy Gucci perfume these days. She rolls along smoothly paved boulevards, some lined with potted geraniums, and past scores of new buildings such as the swirling, white El Fateh Tower, a wildly futuristic hotel that symbolizes the government's vision of Khartoum as a kind of Dubai-on-the-Nile.

Seeing it all, though, Yobu thinks only about how soon she can leave.

"I don't like Khartoum particularly. All this money, the government brought it from the south. They are using our money to build their city and for this war," she said, referring to the crisis in Sudan's western Darfur region. "That is what is happening."

In Sudan, successive rebel movements -- first in the south and now in Darfur -- have voiced similar grievances against the government. The ruling party in Khartoum, they say, hoards power and wealth at the expense of the rest of the country, physically the largest in Africa.

And in the past several years, the new oil wealth and investment pouring into the city of 6 million have sharpened the contrast between center and periphery.

These days, Khartoum has palm trees wrapped in lights, new Toyota dealerships and an outdoor cafe where patrons can sip lattes under a delicately refreshing mist spray. This week marks the opening of Khartoum's first five-star hotel, Al Salam Rotana -- a swank, $300-a-night palace of marble and haute cuisine for the jet set.

At the city's edges, however, is the detritus of power struggles dating back decades -- a dozen or so squalid, off-the-map camps, most without running water or electricity, and filled with more than 2 million people. Most of the residents are non-Arab Africans who fled the conflict in the south. More recently, people have come here to escape the conflict in Darfur, now in its fourth year.

For people in the camps, the economic boom has had the perverse effect of further undermining their already precarious existence. With land at a premium, the local government of Khartoum state periodically sends police and bulldozers into the camps to plow under swaths of mud houses, pushing people even farther out into the desert, and then sells the cleared land to developers.

The technique, called kasha, was first used by the government in the mid-1980s to force out southerners who had fled the civil war. The current ruling party has "perfected" the technique, said Alfred Taban, editor in chief of the Khartoum Monitor newspaper and a frequent critic of the government.

"They are trying to say, 'You are not welcome here,' " he said. "This boom, it benefits probably 1 percent or less."

In Soba Aradi, people see little difference between the conflict in southern Sudan, the current conflict in Darfur and their own treatment in Khartoum.

Though the war in southern Sudan had a religious dimension in that it involved an attempt by the government to impose Islamic law on a population that is about 30 percent Christian, the primary grievances of the rebel movement there had more to do with access to resources and power. The conflict in Darfur also largely comes down to a struggle for resources.

"It's all the same because it's the same government," said Emmanuel Agrey Lado, a physician's assistant from southern Sudan whose home has been bulldozed twice in two years.

U.S. diplomats, however, have mostly treated southern Sudan and the conflict in Darfur separately.

After intense engagement by the Bush administration, the Sudanese government in 2005 signed a U.S.-backed peace agreement creating a semiautonomous region in southern Sudan, just as government troops were intensifying their onslaught in Darfur.

Last year, the government signed a separate peace agreement with one Darfur rebel group, but fighting between government-sponsored militias and an increasingly fragmented rebel movement has continued.

Since the conflict in Darfur began, as many as 450,000 people have died there from disease and violence and 2.5 million have fled to camps in the area or across the border in Chad.

In recent months, the humanitarian situation in Darfur has worsened, as aid workers have been targeted in the violence and many relief groups have pulled out, leaving hundreds of thousands of people without food, medicine or clean water. President Omar Hassan al-Bashir has consistently rejected a proposal to send in a force of several thousand United Nations peacekeepers to supplement a beleaguered African Union force of 7,000 troops currently deployed in Darfur.

Meanwhile, the peace agreement in the south is faltering, with southern Sudanese officials accusing the government of shortchanging them on oil revenue and failing to implement power-sharing arrangements.

Increasingly, leaders in the south say the fate of their region is very much intertwined with that of Darfur, a notion that hearkens back to the vision of John Garang, the widely popular and iconic leader of the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM) who died in a helicopter crash in 2005.

Under his leadership, the SPLM had strong ties to rebel groups not only in Darfur, but also in the north and the east, as Garang came to realize that the suffering extended beyond his own region and that the only way to achieve a more just order in Sudan was through a unified movement. After his death, those relationships languished.

In recent weeks, however, the current president of southern Sudan, Salva Kiir Mayardit, has been reaching out to Darfur rebel leaders.

"We have similar grievances," said Deng Alor Kuol, a southerner who became a minister in the national government after the 2005 peace agreement. "Marginalization and neglect."

As Charles Kalisto, a resident of Soba Aradi, put it, "When I see all these tall buildings" in Khartoum, "I ask, 'Why am I staying under a plastic sheet?' "

Kalisto, who has lived in Khartoum for 22 years, has watched the city become clad in scaffolding and layers of new asphalt. He has tried to get a construction job there, to no avail. Kalisto, like many southerners, said it is difficult to get a job if you are not well connected, and even harder if you are not Arab.

So he is leaving, along with hundreds of thousands of others who have returned to the south in the past two years, by truck or a treacherous barge journey down the Nile.

In Soba Aradi last week, he was among a handful of residents who showed up at a big white tent to register for a U.N. program that is helping 150,000 southerners return home in organized bus convoys before the rainy season starts in May.

Kalisto said he and his family have no hesitation about leaving Khartoum, even for all the unknowns of southern Sudan, where villages, farms and nearly every scrap of infrastructure were destroyed in the war and most people are living in tents.

When he arrives, the government will give him seeds, some sticks and a tarpaulin. Still, Kalisto said, "If tomorrow there is a train, we want to go."

Suzanne Yobu will not be far behind. In 2011, there will be a referendum in the south on independence from Sudan, an option she seems to find attractive.

"This government has a different feeling towards the southerners," Yobu said. "They look at the south as inferior and themselves as superior. If we separate, we'll have more revenue, and more freedom also. The south has oil, and gold. But right now, the money is in their hands."

Early Results: Senegal's President Leads (AP)

By Rukmini Callimachi

AP, February 26, 2007

The president of one of Africa's most stable democracies sought another five-year term Sunday, jostling with 14 contenders in a race that may hinge on the votes of young people hungry for jobs.

Early results reported by state-run Senegalese Press Agency indicated President Abdoulaye Wade was in the lead but did not say by how much. It was not known how many votes had been counted, but they included polling stations in key cities including the capital Dakar and Thies, the agency said. The first official results are not expected until later Monday.

Wade has presided over an era of peace rare in a tumultuous part of the continent, and the economy — though struggling by Western standards — is stronger than in many African nations. Still, thousands of desperate youths have already voted with their feet, risking their lives to slip illegally into Europe by sea.

The median age in this country of 12 million is about 19 years, according to U.S. government statistics, compared with 36 in the United States. About half of Senegal's work force is unemployed.

The 80-year-old Wade sounded confident as he cast his ballot in a dusty polling booth in this seaside capital.

"I will win, there is no question about it," he said. "It's evident that the youth have voted for me."

Among the top challengers are two of Wade's former prime ministers: Moustapha Niasse, a former U.N. envoy, and Idrissa Seck, jailed by the government for seven months on embezzlement charges that were never proved.

DOJ_NMG_0136423

To avoid a run-off, the top candidate needs to win more than 50 percent of the ballot. Though Wade is considered the favorite, the crowded field of challengers could splinter the vote and force a runoff.

When Wade's black-tinted Hummer pulled up at the polling station, it was mobbed by supporters chanting "gorgui" — a respectful Wolof word meaning "old man."

Each of the candidates appeared as a grainy photograph on 15 separate pieces of paper to ensure Senegal's largely illiterate population can easily make their choice.

But some voters complained the supposedly indelible pink-colored ink, used to mark voters' thumbs to ensure they did not cast multiple ballots, appeared to wash off with soap. To allay those concerns, Wade showed reporters that his thumb remained pink even after he rubbed it vigorously with a Kleenex.

For the Socialist Party's Tanor Dieng, one of the candidates challenging Wade, the president's reassurances were not good enough.

"All he can do is bluff, because he knows he's losing," Dieng said.

International election monitors said early evidence suggested the election was orderly and fair.

Wade, who spent three decades in the country's opposition, won in a landslide in 2000, defeating the long-ruling Socialist party. He pledged to abolish the system of privilege which characterized the final years of the Socialist regime, and promised investments in education and job training.

Wade claims he has made good on his promises, and has presided over 5 percent annual growth.

But with 48 percent unemployment and the capital suffering cuts in electricity service — a situation unheard of several years ago — many say it's not enough.

"It was the youth that brought him to power and for us it's been a great disappointment," said Moustapha Diagne, 48, a computer parts importer.

At least 31,000 Senegalese last year undertook the dangerous voyage in small boats by sea to try to reach Europe. Others journeyed north through the burning desert — and perished along the way.

Wade is also criticized by some for focusing on the problems of the capital and neglecting rural areas. He has not been able to end an insurgency in Senegal's south.

Still, the president is widely credited with keeping Senegal relatively peaceful on a continent where many nations have suffered coups and wars.

Senegalese Vote Hinges On Views Of Economic Growth (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

DAKAR, Senegal, Feb. 25 — Moudou Gueye was confident that Senegal's presidential election on Sunday would turn around his fortunes, at least in the short term.

Seven years ago he voted for Abdoulaye Wade, a rabble-rousing professor who, after decades in opposition to Socialist Party rule, sailed into office buoyed by the votes of frustrated young people like Mr. Gueye, who is now 32. They hoped that Mr. Wade, a free-market liberal, would transform this impoverished nation's economy, which had been stunted by generations of ineffective central planning.

But Mr. Gueye said he did not feel much better off now. He still has no regular job and gets by selling coffee on the streets. He said Sunday that he hoped to make about $15 selling his sugary brew at 10 cents a cup to early-morning voters. When the morning coffee rush died down, he would cast his own vote, but not for Mr. Wade.

"I had high hopes," said Mr. Gueye, his eyes hidden behind a pair of knockoff Ray-Ban sunglasses. "But now we are all disappointed."

Voters in Senegal, an oasis of stability in a turbulent corner of the globe, were deciding whether to re-elect the octogenarian Mr. Wade or choose a new president from 14 other candidates, including some from the Socialist Party that voters roundly rejected in 2000

Senegal's state-run news service reported initial results Sunday night that showed Mr. Wade with a strong lead, but the results came from only a relative handful of 11,000 polling stations nationwide. Official results are expected Monday.

If no candidate wins more than 50 percent of the vote in the first round, there will be a runoff between the top two candidates, expected to be in mid-March. The presidential term has been shortened, so the winner will serve for five years.

In the more than four decades since it won its independence from France, Senegal has never had a coup and suffers from almost none of the ethnic strife that has dragged many West African countries into civil war. It is one of Africa's oldest and most open democracies, with genteel politics that have been the envy of many of its neighbors.

But this election has been different. The campaign was marred by accusations that the government was trying to stifle opposition. One opposition rally was barred from taking place, though others were allowed.

A brawl last week between supporters of a religious leader loyal to Mr. Wade and the supporters of Idrissa Seck, a former Wade ally who is running for president, left six people seriously injured and several cars torched. Such violence is mild by regional standards but almost unheard of in Senegal.

The unrest reflects a wide unease with the country's fortunes. Senegal has had relatively robust economic growth that has hovered at around 5 percent over several years (it was lower last year, owing in part to high fuel prices, according to government officials), compared with the 1 percent achieved during much of the Socialist era, and dozens of huge public works projects.

While in some ways the country is better off, economic growth and a building binge have not produced large numbers of jobs in a country struggling to make the transition from an agrarian society based largely on peanut farming to one that harnesses the wealth of a global economy.

And so Mr. Wade has struggled to convince voters, particularly the young people who make up more than half of the population, that he deserves another term.

"In many ways it is a choice between people they can't stand and the person who disappointed them," said a senior Western diplomat here. "It's a sad choice."

There is no better indication of Senegal's economic desperation than the vast exodus of young people to Europe. At least 36,000 Africans, mostly young men from Senegal, headed for the Canary Islands as illegal migrants by sea last year, according to the Spanish government. At least 6,000 of those who attempted the desperate 850-mile crossing did not survive, yet thousands more wait for the next crossing season to begin, paying $1,000 or more for a seat in an open-decked fishing boat.

Mr. Wade staked his legacy on a series of building projects, part of a New Deal-like plan to jump-start the country's economy. Some of the projects are under way, like a new seaside highway that hugs Dakar's rugged coastline, along with a series of oceanfront luxury hotels. Others, like a plan to build a new capital and a second airport, are still on the drawing board.

J. Habib Sy, a political analyst and director of a nonprofit organization, Aid Transparency, that investigates public spending, said his examinations of government expenditures over the last seven years had shown widespread waste and mismanagement.

"People were hopeful, myself included, that as an old man he would be wise," Mr. Sy said. "But it didn't happen that way."

Mr. Wade's supporters say he has already delivered and deserves more time to complete his vision for the country's future.

"This government has done more in seven years than the Socialists did in 40 years," said Boubacar Kante, a 33-year-old electrician, standing in line at a school in the Grand Dakar slum, waiting to cast his vote. "I found a job after Wade was elected, and life is better."

Countering criticism that Mr. Wade is too old to serve another term — his official age is given as 80, but many people suspect he is older — his daughter, Sindiély, who has worked as a special assistant to the president, said he was as sharp and agile as ever.

"It is not a question of age," Ms. Wade said as she waited to cast her vote in downtown Dakar. "It is a question of dynamism and ideas and what you have planned for your country."

Along Dakar's seaside roadway, young men marveled at the cars whizzing below a brand-new overpass, one of Mr. Wade's long-anticipated public works projects.

Pap Ndiaye, an 18-year-old street vendor who sells baby clothes to people stalled in traffic, said the newly completed road was a sign that the country was moving in the right direction.

"Wade has done a lot for this country," Mr. Ndiaye said. "Our hope is that he will stay and finish his work."

Less than a mile away, the road abruptly ends with a bright yellow sign that says "déviation," or detour. With a hard turn to the right, drivers pour off the broad new highway, and back into the tangled, chaotic streets of one of Dakar's oldest and poorest neighborhoods.

High Cost Of Free Education In Kenya (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Nairobi, Kenya — THE story of Olympic Primary School reads like a movie script.

A spirited campus in Africa's largest slum overcomes dire surroundings to triumph as the top-ranked public elementary school in Kenya's capital, beating better-funded private academies and sending dozens of graduates to the nation's top high schools.

Unfortunately, the saga doesn't come with a Hollywood ending.

DOJ_NMG_0136425

Perched on a hill overlooking Kenya's notorious Kibera shantytown, the school is at the center of a growing public education crisis spurred by a national decision in 2003 to make primary education free to all. The move swelled Olympic's classrooms to record size, stretched its budget and eroded the school's hard-won standards.

Four years later, some of the brightest students are transferring to private competitors, causing the school's ranking to slip. Rather than being visited by international dignitaries praising its accomplishments, the school and its bulging classrooms are a tourist stop for guides offering sightseers a glimpse of Kenya's poverty and education woes.

Last month, Olympic's enrollment was 2,510 students, making it one of the largest schools in the country. With just 30 teachers, the average class size is 84, more than double what it was when the school was ranked No. 1.

"That's deadly," said Anne Nganga, Olympic's founder and former principal.

In 2004, having reached retirement age at 55 and fed up with the public school system, Nganga launched a private academy a few miles away. She worries that Olympic's facilities and teaching staff are stretched too thin. "I'm afraid it is going to break," she said.

Until 2003, Kenyan parents had to pay $150 a year to send their children to public primary school. That was less than what most private institutions charged, but even so the schools were out of reach for millions of children. Many families here live on just a few dollars a day.

Since the fees were eliminated, more than 1 million additional youngsters have entered public schools. The action has won international praise for President Mwai Kibaki, who is seeking reelection this year. His government said recently that it would attempt to extend free education into high school.

SO far, however, officials have failed to back their ambitious policy with adequate resources. Enrollment is up 24% since the fees were dropped, but the number of school facilities has barely expanded and the number of teachers has fallen 6%, according to the Education Ministry.

There are 10,000 fewer teachers than before the schools became free. With teacher salaries starting at slightly more than that of a maid — about $210 a month — some have quit in frustration and others have gone to private schools.

The government gives public schools $14.50 a year for each enrolled child, money that is supposed to cover everything from books and pencils to janitors and desks. At some schools, students must share textbooks. At a few, they sit on the floor or rocks because there isn't enough furniture.

At Olympic, because of its reputation, 3,000 newcomers showed up to enroll in 2003 when free education debuted. At the time, 1,700 children were being taught there. Frustrated parents threatened to burn down the new principal's office if she didn't enroll their children.

Even now, a line of hopeful parents snaked outside her office door one recent morning. With enrollment already at record levels, Principal Ruth Namulundu must seek a balance between the school's obligation as a government facility to admit students and her desire to maintain Olympic's academic standards.

This day, she accepted one youngster and asked the other parents to try again next month.

"I don't have the teachers," Namulundu said. "Admissions is a big problem. We have to provide access. But my teachers don't understand why I have to keep admitting students."

School infrastructure and upkeep are constant struggles. There are no functioning computers. A urine stench from nearby toilets wafts into the first-grade classrooms.

Recess commences in a dirt field with a couple of grazing cows but no playground equipment. During the weekly schoolwide assembly and prayer, students squeeze shoulder to shoulder in a courtyard the size of a volleyball court.

Desperate for funding, school officials recently asked each student to contribute 1 cent so brooms and buckets could be purchased to keep the classrooms tidy.

For Emmanuel Onyango, 14, Olympic's struggle to maintain excellence is anything but academic. His future is riding in large part on his school's performance.

The fresh-faced eighth-grader has consistently ranked No. 1 or 2 in his class since the first grade. In a schoolwide competition last year, he won a $5 book voucher, which he used to buy a Danielle Steel romance novel.

Looking awkward in a parent-provided uniform that includes knee socks and short pants, the teenager sits attentively in the front row. He dreams of attending one of Kenya's prestigious national high schools, the best in the country in quality and teaching. He wants to become a pilot.

"I think I can make it," he said.

But with class sizes doubled, teachers are more distracted. Slower students get most of the attention. "Bigger classes have meant that teachers can't concentrate on one person for very long," Emmanuel said.

Instead of receiving advanced instruction, he usually finds himself tutoring the weaker students. His teacher, who uses Emmanuel to help teach math, said the tutoring reinforced the material.

DOJ_NMG_0136426

"When advanced students know they will have to explain things to other students, they study harder and learn more," said Ochieng Otiento, 44, who has taught at Olympic for 10 years.

Emmanuel said he enjoyed the tutoring but sometimes yearned for a more competitive environment. "I'd like someone who could challenge me," he said.

School crowding is a problem across Africa, where education reform remains one of the toughest challenges. Factors including poverty and a surge in the number of AIDS-related orphans have left sub-Saharan Africa with the world's lowest gross enrollment rates.

Despite recent improvement, an estimated 40 million school-age children in Africa are out of the classroom, condemned to lives as unskilled laborers and perpetuating the cycle of poverty for another generation.

In Kenya, the plight and performance of public schools have reached the point where some middle-income and even poor families are pulling out their children. Last year, public school enrollment in half of Kenya's eight provinces dropped as parents who could afford private schools, where fees begin at about $260 a year, abandoned the public system.

Short-order cook Wambui Ndungu, 28, pulled her daughter from the local public school after the girl's grades and test scores plummeted. The daughter is thriving in private school, but Ndungu and her husband, who earn about $140 a month, are paying nearly a quarter of the family income in school fees. That means longer hours at the cafe for Ndungu and less meat on the family dinner table.

"I know public school is free, but it just wasn't worth it anymore," Ndungu said.

Government officials say they are working as fast as they can to provide relief.

"I try to tell them: 'Please continue your work. We are coming,' " said Margaret Thiongo, director of Nairobi's public primary schools.

At Olympic, Thiongo noted that the government added several new classrooms over the last three years but was running out of land for expansion. She blamed understaffing on a shortage of qualified teachers.

WITH national graduation exams looming at the end of the year, Emmanuel is feeling pressure. Five years ago, Olympic sent nearly three dozen graduates to public national high schools. Last year, it sent five.

"I must score well," he said. "This is the year that will determine my future."

That's not just teenage drama speaking. Eighth grade is a key year in Kenya's educational system, marking the end of the line for many. Due to a severe shortage of public and private high schools, only about half of graduating primary school students find places.

Last year, 50 of 204 Olympic graduates were unable to go to high school because there weren't enough seats.

With the decline in quality and test scores at public schools, graduates of the private academies, which account for only 10% of all schools, now make up 90% of the students at the best high schools.

With the odds stacked against him, Emmanuel is wasting no time, enrolling in after-school and weekend classes. That means staying at school from 7 a.m. to 5 p.m. during the week, eight hours on Saturday and another five hours on Sunday, not including the one to two hours of homework each night.

Sunday afternoon offers his only free time. "I sleep," he said.

Even if he performs well, there's no guarantee his mother will be able to afford the $450 in annual fees. With four children in school, his mother, a nurse, is saving for Emmanuel, but an older sister who was accepted to a top national campus had to settle for one that ranks lower and is less expensive.

"I'm praying God will help us," Perazia Pilli Ogingo said.

Olympic officials also are doing what they can to keep standards high. Although its No. 3 ranking last year is impressive for a school of Olympic's size, administrators who recall past performance remain fiercely competitive.

"Next year we will be No. 1 again," said Monica Omwoyo, Olympic's deputy principal.

To lower class size in the all-important eighth grade, the school shifted a teacher from another grade. The average eighth-grade class size dropped to 65. It also added after-school and weekend classes and recently issued a plea to eighth-grade parents for a one-time $5 donation to administer monthly practice exams, a luxury not afforded in the government budget.

But one parent complained to government regulators that Olympic was improperly charging for items that are supposed to be free, such as $4 a month for weekend classes and even the penny for a broom.

Government officials said Olympic might be crossing the line. "There should never be a policy by which students who don't pay don't learn," said Thiongo, the city education director. She said weekend classes could be shut down.

But Emmanuel said he needs the extra study to stay sharp. He and his fellow students recently took a practice graduation exam for the first time. He was aiming for a score of 415. He got 412.

Not So Fast On Fast Track (RC)

DOJ_NMG_0136427

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

President Bush's fast-track trade negotiating authority expires June 30, but a new business coalition pushing for its renewal has crafted a long-term plan, indicating that pro-trade lobbyists expect a much longer slog than they would like to admit.

The Trade for America Coalition, according to sources familiar with the effort, has planned for a new set of co-chairmen to take over six months into the campaign, which would take it beyond the deadline for fast-track renewal. A lobbyist whose clients are involved in the coalition said that even though Members and Bush administration officials continue to negotiate to renew it before the authority lapses, this likely will be no quick lobbying battle. And no matter what happens this year, pro-trade lobbyists are energizing a next generation of advocates as they anticipate many fights to come.

Fast track, also known as trade promotion authority, allows the administration to negotiate trade agreements with other countries. Congress can then approve or reject the agreements, without adding any amendments.

"I think everybody thinks TPA is a long-term prospect," said the lobbyist. "I don't think it's likely to happen in the short-term. It is likely to be a multi-year process."

Opponents of trade promotion authority — emboldened by the Democratic-controlled Congress — have geared up their own effort, working closely with the office of Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine). Michaud's staff is meeting regularly with representatives from the AFL-CIO and other labor unions, Sierra Club, Friends of the Earth, Public Citizen and the U.S. Business and Industry Council.

Peter Chandler, Michaud's chief of staff, said his boss, along with Rep. Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.), is working with the groups to come up with a wholesale alternative to fast track and plans to unveil a package in the coming weeks. "A simple labor fix isn't enough," Chandler said. "It would look drastically different. We're going to come up with some sort of model that will be far better." That model will include international labor organization standards, and is expected to draw widespread opposition from business groups.

Yvette Pena Lopes, a legislative representative for the Teamsters, attends the Michaud meetings every other week in the Cannon House Office Building, as do Brett Gibson, who handles trade policy for the AFL-CIO, and Alan Tonelson, a research fellow with the U.S. Business and Industry Council.

On the other side of the aisle, the office of House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) has run coalition efforts in recent years to pass trade pacts such as the Central American Free Trade Agreement. But for now, Blunt spokesman Amos Snead said, "there is no formal coalition, because there is no package yet. The whip's office is actively involved in encouraging people to support TPA, and if the right package materializes, then we'd actively reach out internally and externally. That's when you might see a coalition form."

Trade lobbyists on both sides of the debate acknowledged the heightened possibility of Republican defections on a TPA vote in the House — either because the Bush administration accepts too many labor and environmental provisions, or because of pressure from constituents who fear that more trade deals mean fewer jobs in the United States.

While still pushing for renewal by this June, the Trade for America Coalition, whose members include usual suspects such as the National Association of Manufacturers and the Business Roundtable, has three co-chairmen, including up-and-comers in the trade policy fights.

Bill Lane, a longtime free-trade advocate with Caterpillar, said, "We're very aware that as part of promoting trade liberalization, we have to be serious about succession planning, and as part of that we are exceedingly focused on making sure there are leadership opportunities for the next wave of leaders. Business has been rightfully criticized for mounting 'just-in-time' lobby efforts. We now need a sustained effort to promote trade, and to do that we need to help the next wave of trade leaders to succeed."

Lane said that Leslie Griffin, one of the co-chairmen who is vice president for international government affairs at the New York Life Insurance Company, is part of the next generation of free-trade leaders.

"Ideally there should be no lapse," Griffin said of TPA. "But we'll be part of the dialogue as long as we need to be. There is an understanding that we have a positive story to tell on trade. We also recognize that we need to have an honest appraisal of the trade agenda. We've got to expand the circle of winners."

Over last week's recess, coalition members, including Nicole Venable, a Democratic trade lobbyist at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, met with the staffers for Members including Democratic Reps. Artur Davis (Ala.), Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), Baron Hill (Ind.) and Michael Arcuri (N.Y.).

"It would be easy if the business community just took the TPA papers from 2001" and recycled that effort, Venable said. "But we recognize we need to speak fresh and find things that are more responsive to Members' concerns."

Yet, three Democratic lobbyists who are pushing for fast-track renewal said the coalition got off to a bad start with Congressional Democrats when it kicked off earlier this month.

DOJ_NMG_0136428

"I'd say that fell pretty flat," said a former House aide who is now a lobbyist. "It was viewed as business as usual, at a time when we don't need business as usual. It was probably not the best way to kick off trade in the new Congress."

Added another lobbyist who came from the Senate: "It was noticed that there were no Democrats."

While a full renewal of trade promotion authority remains difficult, several lobbyists said they support the idea of extending it temporarily, say for six months, or extending it just long enough to finish a deal with South Korea, which has not yet been signed.

Not everyone is gloomy about the prospects. A House Democratic Ways and Means aide said, "I think everybody is hopeful that we can find a common ground."

And Trade for America's Griffin agreed that she sees "genuine commitment" from Members.

One industry sector that could help the effort is high tech, which is viewed as having strong ties with many Democrats.

Ralph Hellmann, chief lobbyist for the Information Technology Industry Council, said his sector is willing to see some compromises when it comes to labor and environmental standards in trade deals.

"We are trying to build bridges between sides that may not agree — Republicans who want TPA extended as is to Democrats who want expansion of labor and environmental standards," he said. His colleague, Democrat Josh Ackil, added that it's important for the tech industry to "continue to tell Democratic leaders in the House and Senate that trade is important to us, while at the same time telling the White House they need to make sure that they work with Congress and are accommodating to their needs in order to get things across the finish line."

The techies' message of moderation has put members of the Michaud group on defense. "No doubt a certain luster attaches to the high tech firms," said Tonelson of the USBIC. "But they too are actively outsourcing and of course when they look at their U.S. workers, they're thinking 'Gee, why do we pay these folks so much?'"

One Year After Cafta (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

As the Central American Free Trade Agreement marks its one-year anniversary Friday, it's a good time to remind Capitol Hill protectionists how wrong they were when they tried to kill the deal in 2005. Every country that entered into Cafta is enjoying new benefits, including the U.S.

The U.S. and El Salvador were the first two countries to begin trading under Cafta last March. In the months that followed, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Honduras made it official. The Dominican Republic and Costa Rica have yet to join. Both have signed onto the negotiated agreement, but without implementing legislation before Feb. 29, 2008, they could end up shut out of the free-trade area. Costa Rica hasn't even ratified the deal yet.

The early results from Cafta's first year are promising. Central Americans are importing more than ever from the U.S. and the region is also attracting new capital. Both developments are helping participants grow more competitive and improving the quality of life for consumers.

To appreciate Cafta's potential for the region, some historical perspective is in order. Much of Central America's misery can be traced to extreme protectionism in the 20th century. The U.S. imposition of the Smoot-Hawley tariffs in 1930 was one important catalyst in closing Latin American markets to imports since most countries slapped on retaliatory tariffs. World War II provided another excuse for protectionism in an economic zone heavily dependent on northern markets for its commodities. Then along came Raúl Prebisch, an economist at the United Nations Economic Commission on Latin America and the Caribbean, who famously argued in 1950 that for the region to develop it had to close its markets and let infant industries develop free of foreign competition. "Import-substitution industrialization" became a religion. By 1985 Central America had the world's highest level of import protection. Quality, choice and competitiveness had plummeted.

After the Soviet- and Cuban-inspired civil wars of the 1980s, a slow transformation began. Today, dollarized El Salvador is the most economically liberal Cafta country and may be in a position to benefit the most from the trade accord. Its total exports to the U.S. actually went down in the past year but that seems to be explained largely by the end of the WTO multifiber agreement. Without Cafta, the contraction could have been worse.

Offsetting the pain is an increase in imports, which are helping diversify the economy. According to the Economy Ministry, 60% of non-maquiladora imports from the U.S. last year were in six sectors and accounted for 88% of the growth in imports over 2005. Most were intermediate and capital goods for manufacturing and services. This includes yellow corn and wheat for the agroindustry, polyethylene for plastics, electronic equipment such as telephones and computers, fuels, and paper and cardboard for packaging.

El Salvador is also shifting away from traditional low-wage, garment-assembly operations toward the delivery of value-added, high-end apparel that includes all services bundled in the production process. According to Ricardo Sagrera, president of the textile group Hilasal, enhanced two-way trade is helping El Salvador capitalize on its comparative advantages -- notably its legendary work force and its proximity to the U.S. -- and compete with China.

Imports of electronics are critical components in El Salvador's growing service sector. Call centers now support an estimated 5,000 jobs. Another profitable new service industry handles foreign shipping to the region from Asia and Europe, cutting out a stop in the U.S.

Investment levels would probably be higher if El Salvador had a better record on personal security. It is one of the most dangerous countries in Latin America, which surely discourages investors. Nevertheless, investments such as Citibank's $1.5 billion purchase of Central America's second-largest financial group, Grupo Cuscatlán, suggest confidence.

In Guatemala, which joined Cafta in July, the government says total trade grew by 17% in the second half of last year, compared with 5% in the first half. It also says that foreign direct investment tripled last year. A Guatemalan official I talked to said that the agreement has been good for his country because it has made doing business easier. For example, customs and photosanitary regulations have to be standardized and streamlined in order to comply with Cafta. This is leading to more efficient trading within the region.

That's important for companies like Wal-Mart, which has a substantial presence in Central America and is driving competitiveness in the retail sector. The retail giant taps suppliers in Central America for the perishables it sells. Greens come from Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras, meat and pork from El Salvador. With Cafta, the distribution process has become more efficient.

Wal-Mart's need for perishables has also helped small and medium-sized farms in the region because the company has a program to develop suppliers. "They get a reliable marketplace and we get reliable suppliers," says a company representative. Wal-Mart's requirement that suppliers must be part of the formal economy could partly explain why business startups jumped by 20% last year. The company says that Cafta has been important also because the region is its largest supplier of apparel for its Western Hemisphere operations.

Nicaragua also is enjoying Cafta benefits. Total trade with the U.S. between last April, when it joined Cafta, and December was up by more than 20% over the same period in 2005.

We agree with free traders who criticized Cafta as inferior to unilateral market opening. Guatemala already had some of the lowest tariffs in the region, but in order to reach consensus with protectionist strongholds such as Costa Rica, it had to agree to tariff increases on some products. Cafta also unfortunately carves out protections for a small but important number of sectors -- sugar is one -- in the U.S. and in Central America for a decade or more. Nicaragua, one of the poorest countries in the region, gets a quota for apparel made from fabric originating in non-Cafta countries. This has diverted investment in the assembly business away from its neighbors. Yet in the absence of unilateral trade liberalization, Cafta may be the best alternative.

On its first anniversary, El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Honduras and the U.S. are already reaping the benefits of Cafta. If Costa Rica and the DR -- which have already lost thousands of textile jobs -- reject the deal, they will be approving a model of economic isolation that could cost their people dearly.

A Japanese Lesson For China (LAT)

By Lawrence H. Summers

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

A RISING Asian power is an export juggernaut and enjoys prodigious growth fueled by high savings and investment rates. Its rapidly modernizing industries threaten an ever greater swath of industry in Europe and the United States. Its formidable central bank reserves and burgeoning account surplus lead to claims that its exchange rate is being unfairly manipulated. Its financial system is bank-centric, heavily regulated in favor of domestic institutions and closely tied to government and industry. Rapid productivity growth holds down prices, but its asset values rise sharply.

Key congressional leaders in Washington demand radical action to contain the economic threat. Diplomats warn that public bashing is unproductive but make clear that economic issues are a crucial part of the bilateral relationship. Delegations of senior U.S. officials engage in "dialogue" with their counterparts about the many aspects of their economic policies that promote imbalances, warning of the congressional demons who stand ready to act if "results" are not achieved quickly.

All of this describes what is happening in China, and with our relationship with Beijing, today. It also describes the Japanese economy in the late 1980s and early 1990s, before its lost decade of deflation and considerable deterioration in global prestige. Although there are obvious differences, notably China's much lower level of development, the similarities are striking enough to invite an effort to draw some lessons from the Japanese experience.

The definitive history of Japan's dismal decade has yet to be written. But most observers would agree that key elements included the bursting of stock market and land bubbles, the resulting problems in the financial system, the collapse of aggregate demand as banks stopped extending credit and the difficulty of moving from export-led growth to domestic-led growth once consumer and business confidence was lost.

In retrospect, Japanese officials made several important policy errors. In order to avoid further yen appreciation in the late 1980s, they followed easy monetary and financial policies that gave rise to huge asset price bubbles and expansions in credit, which set the stage for the downturn. At the same time, they failed to encourage a shift to domestic demand-led growth at a moment when consumers were enjoying record increases in wealth. And they allowed problems in the banking system to fester. The result was that Japan was not well positioned to prevent or address the serious problems of the 1990s.

This suggests that if China is to sustain rapid growth and not repeat Japan's mistakes, it must fix the policy roof now, when the sun is shining. Allowing inevitable currency appreciation and spurring domestic demand by encouraging consumption is much easier now when the economy is at the edge of overheating than it is likely to be in the future when it cools off. It has been estimated that seeking to maintain the current exchange rate could require as much as $400 billion in reserve accumulation in 2007, which would almost certainly lead to rapid asset price inflation as renminbi are printed to buy dollars. And there will not be a better moment to fix problems in the banking system.

These lessons for Chinese economic policy contrast sharply with those drawn by observers in and out of China who attribute Japan's deflation and consequent poor performance to its willingness to accede to American pressure for currency appreciation. This alternative view offers no explanation for Japan's asset bubble and collapse, and no theory about what measures would have spurred domestic-led growth.

Another lesson of the Japanese experience is the need for modesty regarding economic diplomacy. Events and national and political decisions, not international communiques, shape economic outcomes. The effect of events beyond the control of governments — the collapse of Japan's asset markets, information technology's spur to U.S. productivity, the Asian financial crisis — dwarfed the diplomatic debate.

Even in areas in which government policies might have had significant effects, such as housing, finance, social security or retail regulation, there is no evidence that Japan in the 1980s and 1990s made any changes in response to U.S. pressure. If heavy-handed pressure makes it easier for special interests to invoke nationalism as they resist change, high-profile negotiations can be counterproductive. And in a world in which goodwill capital is scarce, heavy-handed pressure engenders resentments that spill into other spheres.

It was a cliche in the late 1980s and early '90s that the U.S.-Japan relationship was the world's most important bilateral relationship. Given China's scale, rapid growth and the greater level of imbalances in today's global economy, Chinese economic policy and its international economic relations are even more important. By learning from a rather unfortunate history, policymakers on both sides of the Pacific can avoid repeating its mistakes.

Why Our Enemies -- And Friends -- Hate Us (LAT)

By Niall Ferguson

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

BEING HATED IS NO FUN. And few people hate being hated more than Americans. I wish I had a dollar for every time I've been asked, "Why do they hate us?" — and another for each of the different answers I've heard. It's because of our foreign policy. It's because of their extremism. It's because of our arrogance. It's because of their inferiority complex. Americans really hate not knowing why they're hated.

The best explanation is the simplest. Being hated is what happens to dominant empires. George Orwell knew the feeling. As a young man he served as an assistant police superintendent in British-run Burma, an experience he memorably described in his essay, "Shooting an Elephant." Called upon to kill a pachyderm that had run amok, Orwell was suddenly aware "of the watchful yellow faces behind" him: "The sole thought in my mind was that if anything went wrong those two thousand Burmans would see me pursued, caught, trampled on and reduced to a grinning corpse like that Indian up the hill. And if that happened it was quite probable that some of them would laugh."

Eric Blair — as Orwell was known then — could scarcely have been better prepared for his role as a colonial official. Born in Bengal, the son of a colonial civil servant, he had been educated at Eton, where boys learn not to worry about being hated. Yet even he found the resentment of the natives hard to bear: "In the end the sneering … faces of young men that met me everywhere, the insults hooted after me when I was at a safe distance, got badly on my nerves….[It] was perplexing and upsetting."

That's a feeling American soldiers in Baghdad must know pretty well.

But who hates Americans the most? You might assume that it's people in countries that the United States has recently attacked or threatened to attack. Americans themselves are clear about who their principal enemies are. Asked by Gallup to name the "greatest enemy" of the U.S. today, 26% of those recently polled named Iran, 21% named Iraq and 18% named North Korea.

Are those feelings reciprocated? Up to a point. The Gallup Center for Muslim Studies' latest poll found 52% of Iranians view the U.S. unfavorably. But that is down from 63% in 2001. And it's significantly lower than the antipathy felt in Jordan, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia. Two-thirds of Jordanians and Pakistanis have a negative view of the U.S., as do a staggering 79% of Saudis.

These figures suggest a paradox in the Muslim world. It's not the United States' enemies that hate it most. It's people in countries that are supposed to be friendly, if not allies.

The paradox of unfriendly allies is not confined to the Middle East. Last week was not a good week for Americanophiles in Europe. Tony Blair announced British troop withdrawals from Iraq, an unfortunate signal on the eve of the U.S. "surge." In Rome, his counterpart Romano Prodi had to resign because his coalition partners would not agree to keep Italian troops in Afghanistan or to enlarge a U.S. military base in Italy. Anti-Americanism is nothing new in European politics, but there is something new going on here, which extends to traditionally pro-American constituencies.

Back in 1999, 83% of British people surveyed by the U.S. State Department's Office of Research said they had a favorable opinion of the U.S. But by 2006, according to the Pew Global Attitudes Project, only 56% did. British respondents to the Pew surveys now give higher ratings to Germany (75%) and Japan (69%) than to the U.S. — a remarkable transformation in attitudes, given the notorious British tendency to look back nostalgically and unforgivingly to World War II. Britons recently polled by Pew regard the U.S. presence in Iraq as a bigger threat to world peace than Iran or North Korea.

Nor is Britain the only disillusioned ally. Only 38% of Germans and 19% of Canadians believe that U.S. foreign policy considers the interests of others. The poignant fact is that when Americans are asked to rate foreign countries, their most favorable views are of none other than Britain, Germany and Canada.

In the 1990s, Madeleine Albright pompously called the United States "the indispensable nation." Today it seems to have become the indefensible nation, even in the eyes of its supposed friends.

Orwell would have understood. Just as it was the educated beneficiaries of British rule in Asia who were the most strident anti-imperialists in Orwell's day, so the British empire's most natural allies — France and the United States — were anything but Anglophile. For it turns out that power not only corrupts. It also tends to isolate.

There is, after all, a reason why they say it's lonely at the top.

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Holding Muslim Terror Suspects At New Indiana Facility. The Washington Post (2/25, A7, Eggen, 690K) reports the Justice Department "has quietly opened a new prison unit in Indiana that houses a hodgepodge of second-tier terrorism inmates, most of them Arab Muslims, whose ability to communicate with the outside world has been tightly restricted. At the Communications Management Unit, or CMU, in Terre Haute, Ind., all telephone calls and mail are monitored, the number of phone calls limited and visits are restricted to a total of four hours per month, according to special rules enforced by the Justice Department's U.S. Bureau of Prisons. All inmate conversations must be conducted in English unless otherwise negotiated. … The Indiana unit…is part of a medium-security facility and includes inmates set to be released in as little as two years. Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said the unit's population will not be limited to inmates convicted of terrorism-related cases, though all of the prisoners fit that definition."

Holy Land Foundation Lawyers Say Anti-Semitic Comments Fabricated. Under the headline "Evidence Against Muslim Charity Appears Fabricated," the Los Angeles Times (2/25, Krikorian) reported, "When the Bush administration shut down the nation's largest Muslim charity five years ago, officials of the Dallas-based foundation denied allegations it was linked to terrorists and insisted that a number of accusations were fabricated by the government. Now, attorneys for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development say the government's own documents provide evidence of that claim.

In recent court filings, defense lawyers disclosed striking discrepancies between an official summary and the verbatim transcripts of an FBI-wiretapped conversation in 1996 involving Holy Land officials." The summaries contained anti-Semitic comments by Holy Land officials, but "none of those quotes was contained in a 13-page transcript of the conversation, defense lawyers said in their motion to expand access to classified evidence." The Times noted, "How the summary and transcript could be so different was unclear, though experts…theorized that its top-secret nature may have led some analysts to believe that the work product would never be publicly disclosed, much less entered into evidence in a trial."

Al Jazeera Cameraman Has Been Held At Guantanamo Since 2002. The Washington Times/AP (2/25, Fox) reports Sami al-Hajj, a cameraman for the Al Jazeera TV network, "was stopped at the Afghanistan border by Pakistani authorities in December 2001, turned over to U.S. forces and hauled in chains six months later to Guantanamo, where about 390 men are held on suspicion of links to al Qaeda or the Taliban. Mr. al-Hajj, a 38-year-old native of Sudan, has been held in this U.S. military prison ever since. He is believed to be the only journalist from a major international news organization held at Guantanamo."

Canadian Muslim Who Exposed Terror Cell Faces Ostracism. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Farley, 850K) profiles Mubin Shaikh, a 31-year-old Canadian-born Muslim "who disavowed the mosque to fit in with his neighborhood friends, then rejected that life to practice traditional Islam. Later, he used his stature in the Muslim community to infiltrate a suspected terrorist cell, and then helped expose it — an act that alienated him from many in his own circles. … The suspected cell's plan, prosecutors said in June, was to explode three truck bombs in front of Toronto police and intelligence headquarters and Parliament Hill, then take politicians hostage and behead them one by one. The group of 18 had acquired 3 tons of what it thought was explosive material when police moved in, authorities say." The Times adds, "Now he faces death threats, which he doesn't take seriously, and glares and cold shoulders in the mosque, which he does."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House Drill Imagines Simultaneous IED Attacks On US Cities. ABC World News (2/24, story 4, 2:25, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "At the White House today, a high level terror drill laid out a chilling scenario: Iraq-style IEDs exploding in cities around this country. About 90 officials studied how the federal government would respond if attackers used improvised explosive devices in several cities at once."

The Washington Post/AP (2/25, A9, Loven) reports, "Dozens of high-level officials joined in a White House drill yesterday to see how the government would respond if several cities were attacked simultaneously with bombs similar to those used against U.S. troops in Iraq. White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend and the Homeland Security Council that she heads mapped out in advance a massive disaster involving improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. The attack targeted 10 U.S. cities, both large and small, at the same time, said a senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity. … All Cabinet agencies were represented by their secretaries or other high-ranking officials, with about 90 participants in all, White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said. Stanzel said the drill revealed gaps in the government's ability to respond, but also showed that there have been many improvements since Hurricane Katrina." The Post adds that President Bush "went on a bike ride yesterday morning and did not take part in the test."

Real ID Proposal Expected To Encounter Bipartisan Opposition. The Washington Post (2/25, A8, Hsu, Fears, 690K) reports that "a sweeping federal law to tighten security requirements for driver's licenses is in jeopardy of unraveling after missteps by Congress and the Homeland Security Department, analysts and lawmakers said. While Washington has delayed implementing it, a rebellion against the program has grown. Privacy advocates say the effort could create a de facto national ID card. Meanwhile, state officials charge that complying with federal requirements will cost $11 billion and potentially double fees and waiting times for 245 million Americans whose licenses would have to be reissued starting next year." The White House "expects to release its driver's license plan, Real ID, this week and has warned congressional critics not to thwart or further delay a program that was recommended by the Sept. 11 commission." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, chairman of the homeland security panel, said Real ID "may not provide real security and that it is opposed by states 'because it is overly burdensome, possibly unworkable, and may actually increase a terrorist's ability to commit identity theft.'" Sen. Susan Collins, ranking Republican on the homeland security panel, and Rep. Tom Allen "are seeking to delay or repeal Real ID and let security experts, privacy advocates and the states renegotiate the rules."

Backscanner X-Ray Device Profiled. NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 5, 2:50, Costello, 9.87M) ran a feature on the Backscanner X-ray device being implemented at Phoenix's airport, concluding a profile of the new technology by saying, "Still on the drawing board: people portals that scan every passenger before they board a plane. Still no effective way to detect chemical weapons." The report is very similar to Friday's ABC World News report.

WAR NEWS:

Murtha Stumbles In Effort To Limit War Spending. Coverage of Rep. John Murtha's efforts to challenge funding for the Iraq war emphasized the bipartisan perception that he had blundered and undercut the Democrats' cause. The Washington Post (2/25, A5, Weisman, Layton, 690K) reports, "The plan was bold: By tying President Bush's $100 billion war request to strict standards of troop safety and readiness, Democrats believed they could grab hold of Iraq war policy ... But a botched launch" by Murtha "has united Republicans and divided Democrats, sending the latter back to the drawing board just a week before scheduled legislative action, a score of House Democratic lawmakers said last week. … The story of Murtha's star-crossed plan illustrates the Democratic Party's deep divisions over the Iraq war and how the new House majority has yet to establish firm control over Congress." When he "chose to roll out the details on a liberal, antiwar Web site on Feb. 15, he caught even Pelosi by surprise while infuriating Democrats from conservative districts. ... Republicans relentlessly attacked a plan they called a strategy to slowly bleed the war of troops and funds. By the end of the recess, Murtha's once promising strategy was in tatters."

The New York Times (2/25, A25, Toner, 1.16M) says Murtha "faces an extraordinary political challenge over the next month, and some Democrats are already worried about his handling of it."

Democrats Vow To Keep Pressure On Bush. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Simon, 850K) reports, "Senate Democrats are moving to modify the 2002 resolution that authorized the war to place new limits on the role of U.S. forces in Iraq. But it is uncertain whether they will fare any better in this effort than in their last try — an unsuccessful attempt to pass a symbolic resolution opposing the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq. ... Although the new Democratic efforts are aimed at turning up the political heat on Republicans, they could also make some Democrats uncomfortable. Those from conservative districts or states are fearful of taking a step that Republicans could portray as cutting funding to troops in harm's way or tying the commander in chief's hands in wartime."

Governors Warn Of Surge's Impact On National Guard. ABC World News (2/24, story 4, 2:25, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "The governors are meeting in Washington this weekend and have growing concerns about their own ability to respond to emergencies as their National Guard troops keep getting called back to Iraq." ABC (Crawford): "National Guard and reserve troops like these in Indiana are heading back to Iraq this weekend ... Their families will miss them. But so will their governors." Gov. Mike Easley: "National guard is hurting. And as a result of that, people are not as safe in the United States today as they were before this poorly planned operation started in Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Republican and Democratic governors meeting here Saturday warned that President Bush's 'surge' of additional troops to Iraq would put added pressure on National Guard units already stretched to their limits."

Army's 2-16 Battalion Prepares To Head Off To War. The Washington Post (2/25, A1, Finkel, 690K) reports from Fort Riley, Kansas, "Inside, as the bleachers filled and the doors swung closed against the cold, a 41-year-old soldier near the middle of the floor began clapping his hands in anticipation. ... This was Lt. Col. Ralph Kauzlarich, the commander of an Army battalion called the 2-16 -- the 2nd Battalion, 16th Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Brigade Combat Team, 1st Infantry Division. The unit has 800 soldiers, most in their late teens and deploying to Iraq for the first time under the command of a man who, in this gymnasium filled with believers, was among the biggest believers of all. ... So fiercely does Kauzlarich believe this -- that the war can be won and that it will be won -- it can seem as if he is the one grabbing onto something, in this case the idea that victory is a matter not only of strategy and tactics, but of sheer willpower as well."

More Commentary On Iraq. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/25, B3, 690K), former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Sarah Sewall writes that many of Gen. David Petraeus' "strongest supporters fear that his new assignment is a no-win mission, one that could not only stain his professional reputation but also, ironically, discredit the new counterinsurgency doctrine he spent the past year creating. … Placed in charge this late in the game, Petraeus should not have to carry the burden of Iraq's probable failure. Yet there is a silver lining in his appointment. Petraeus has the expertise to identify shortfalls and the likelihood of failure, and he has the credibility to force a political response."

In a pessimistic op-ed for the Washington Post (2/25, B1, 690K), British political scientist Toby Dodge writes that after crushing a 1920 Iraqi revolt, "it took Britain 10 more years to jettison its financial and military commitments to Iraq. … Here is what Britain's history of failure at building a democratic state in Iraq in the 1920s and '30s tells George W. Bush and his successors: If…they fail to deliver on the promises of a better future for the Iraqi people, then Iraq will continue as a font of violent instability long after those who made the promises have been buried."

In his Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) column, Gregory Rodriguez writes in favor of admitting Iraqi refugees, "Two weeks ago, the White House announced that the U.S. would accept up to 7,000 Iraqi refugees by the end of this year. It's an initial trickle; we should be receiving more. Not just because it's the humane thing to do but because it serves our interests. ... We know now that as U.S. influence expands throughout the world, the world's influence expands here at home. And accepting refugees can improve the nation's image overseas."

Suicide Bombing At Habbaniya Mosque Kills At Least 39. ABC World News (2/24, story 2, 2:50, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "At least 39 people were killed when a truck blew up outside a mosque in the heart of Sunni territory" in Iraq, and "suspicions are falling on other Sunnis. This attack may be a disturbing sign of a growing internal battle." ABC (Marquez): "What makes this bombing unique, it happened in Sunni territory, al Anbar province, where Sunnis are supposed to be safe and Al Qaeda is powerful. Residents say the mosque imam had recently been critical of Al Qaeda."

The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 4, 2:30, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "A fuel tanker rigged with bombs exploded near a Sunni mosque in western Anbar Providence today, killing at least 39 people." NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 2, 2:05, Arraf, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight west of the capital in the town of Habbaniyah, a huge truck exploded killing 37 people and wounding at least 60. Although Baghdad has been relatively calm, at least nine Iraqis were killed in bombings today."

The New York Times (2/25, A6, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, "The blast, which struck during a prayer service in Habbaniya, a town between Falluja and Ramadi in one of the most dangerous areas of Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, was unusual in that such bombings are a staple of Sunni insurgents." The Washington Post (2/25, A18, Londono, 690K) reports, "Witnesses said that unlike other large attacks, this one did not appear to have been driven by sectarian rivalries -- Shiite militias are not known to be active in the area -- but rather was probably carried out as a warning from Sunni extremists to Sunnis who support the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

The Washington Times/AP (2/25, A1, Murphy) reports, "U.S. military envoys and pro-government leaders have worked hard to sway clan chiefs and other influential Anbar figures to turn against the militants, who include foreign jihadists fighting under the banner of al Qaeda in Iraq. The extremists have fought back with targeted killings and bombings against fellow Sunnis." The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Berthelsen, Daragahi, 850K) calls the bombing "highly unusual," since "police and residents in the Sunni Muslim-dominated area said the people had largely aligned against Al Qaeda militants operating in the region."

War Continues To Simmer Beyond Baghdad. The New York Times (2/25, WK4, Santora, 1.16M) reports from Samarra, "Events in Baghdad have dominated the news as American troops move aggressively to quell the sectarian violence that has set Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods at war with each other. But a visit to this restive city is a reminder not only of the many fronts of the war, but also of its many complexities. While sectarian warfare dominates Baghdad…a different dynamic is at work" in Sunni cities, where militants "continue to wage war on Americans and terrorize the civilian population into submission."

Hakim Says Arrest Calls US Authority Into Question. ABC World News (2/24, story 2, 2:50, Marquez, 8.78M) reported, "Demonstrations erupted in Shiite towns throughout Iraq after US troops" arrested Ammar Hakim, who "tells ABC News his arrest calls into question US authority here." The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 3, 2:40, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "About 8,000 Shiites demonstrated in their holy city of Najaf after yesterday's detention by US troops, of the son of Iraq's most influential Shiite leader." NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 2, 2:05, Arraf, 9.87M) said the detention "was particularly unfortunate because his father is a key US ally. He visited the White House last year."

The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Berthelsen, 850K) reports Ammar Hakim "lashed out at the United States in an incendiary televised appearance Saturday. … The incident has the potential to undermine relations between Iraq's majority Shiites and the U.S. forces that toppled their Sunni oppressors." The New York Times (2/25, A6, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, "President Jalal Talabani, whose Kurdish political coalition is the primary governing partner of the dominant Shiite coalition headed by the elder Mr. Hakim, released a statement sharply criticizing the detention and demanding that American commanders hold accountable soldiers who he said had mistreated Mr. Hakim."

The Washington Post (2/25, A18, Londono, 690K) reports, "Talabani said Hakim had 'received uncivil and inappropriate treatment' during his hours-long detention," while the Washington Times/AP (2/25, A1, Murphy) reports that Shiite-US "cooperation suddenly has been strained after U.S. military border guards stopped and searched the heir-apparent of the largest Shi'ite political group." CNN.com (2/24) reports, "The U.S. military on Saturday defended Ammar al-Hakim's arrest and detention, a day after the U.S. ambassador to Iraq apologized for it. The military's statement on Saturday did not include an apology."

Sadr's Motives For Reigning In Militia Questioned. The New York Times (2/25, Cave, 1.16M) analyzes Moqtada al-Sadr's decision to "reign in" his Mahdi Militia. "But did he do so as part of his cooperation with the new security plan for Baghdad, which aims to quell the sectarian violence tormenting the city? Because his men had been disloyal, taking orders from Iran, whose support he values but whose control he fights? Or was it just for show — the act of an image-conscious leader who grasped the risk of graphic videos and wanted to stave off direct American action against him?" The Times calls Sadr "the great destabilizer in Iraq since 2003," saying he is "wielding power on the streets and in the ruling Shiite bloc, thwarting the Americans and playing out at least a temporary alliance with Iran." Sadr "now finds himself under pressure from several sources," including "his popular Shiite base," Iran, "renegade factions of his own militia that resent his move into the political mainstream," and US forces.

Iraqi Kurdish Leaders Approve Oil Law. The Washington Post (2/25, A18, Londono, 690K) reports, "Leaders of Iraq's oil-rich Kurdish region have apparently approved a draft oil law that will be presented to Iraqi lawmakers in coming weeks, an eagerly awaited breakthrough that is expected to professionalize and expand drilling in the country." The Post cites AP reporting that President Jalal Talabani and US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad attended the announcement ceremony in Sulaymaniyah. The Post says "Iraqi officials in recent weeks have been struggling to reach an agreement on legislation that would govern the exploitation of the country's vast oil reserves and who should control the revenue."

Iraqi Firefighters Show Heroism. The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 4, 2:30, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "When bombs explode in Baghdad -- and they do almost every day -- the city's bravest risk their own lives to be first on the scene." CBS (Palmer): "A new set of heroes has been forged inside Baghdad's desperation -- 24/7 calls flood into the emergency center which coordinates the city's firefighters, striving to be 100 percent reliable in a city where little else is. … There's no room here for ethnic tension. In fact, it's tolerance, and even a morning workout, that make Baghdad's bravest a close-knit team."

Hometown Rallies Around Soldier Accused Of Murdering Iraqis. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Zucchino, 850K) reports that the "conservative community" of Sweetwater, Tennessee, "where American flags fly on porches and many residents are veterans, now finds itself at odds with the military." Staff Sgt. Raymond Girouard, a native, has been charged by the Army "with ordering the slayings of three Iraqi detainees in May, then orchestrating a coverup. ... Many here say the Army has betrayed a young patriot who volunteered to fight for his country."

Administrative Problems Seen At Walter Reed. NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 3, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "One week after we reported on the appalling conditions for Army outpatients at the Walter Reed Medical Center, tonight another story of bureaucratic delays that are preventing some wounded veterans home from Iraq and Afghanistan from getting the disability benefits they deserve." NBC (Yang): "Army Sgt. David Yancy was a gunner on a Humvee that hit a bomb south of Baghdad in March of 2005." He has been at Walter Reed for two years, and "now he is fighting a new battle for disability benefits." Yancy: "This is something I wasn't expecting, fighting through the system. I'm not giving up."

NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 4, 2:45, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) followed up by reporting that "it has been a week of hurried repair work, painting and damage control. Even the Defense Secretary showed up for a firsthand look. … Have they fixed all the problems in Building 18?" Washington Post reporter Dana Priest: "Not all of them. They've done the easy fixes." Seigenthaler: "What do you make of government's quick response here?" Priest: "The Army and the Administration really faced an uproar from the public. ... There was a revolt ongoing within their own ranks of retired generals and veterans groups; traditional supporters were clamoring for action. So on Thursday, you saw the vice chief of the Army send out a worldwide message to all generals." The Washington Post (2/25, A9, Vogel, 690K) says the "preliminary findings of a nine-month Army investigation confirm problems in the administrative procedures" at Walter Reed "and other hospitals, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey has ordered the service to begin fixing them, a spokesman said yesterday."

Injured Veteran Fights For Favorable Disability Rating. The Washington Post Magazine (2/25, Span) reports in a highly critical cover article nearing 8,000 words, "Since he was thrown from a moving armored vehicle in Baghdad in May 2003, and landed on his head," ex-Army Cpl. Richard Twohig "says he has suffered from near-constant headaches." While few subjects animate him now, "One subject prompts a more animated response, though, rousing him to noticeable anger: the U.S. Army. ... Twohig has been grappling with a complicated disability system that determines whether he merits military retirement. Thousands of other soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines are dealing with the same process. With U.S. troops still in Afghanistan and the war in Iraq entering its fourth year, the annual caseload of troops injured severely enough to be considered for retirement has climbed nearly 53 percent since 2001, to about 23,000 a year. The great majority don't get it, which has made the disability system the object of confusion, apprehension and suspicion among injured veterans and their advocates."

Servicemen "Entwined By War" Strive To Recover From Injuries. The New York Times (2/25, A16, Chivers, 1.16M) reports that "Petty Officer Third Class Dustin E. Kirby, a Navy corpsman whose efforts to save a wounded marine in Iraq and his own wounding by a sniper on Christmas were covered by The New York Times, has returned home to Georgia and expects a nearly full recovery, he and his family said. ... In early November he was the subject of an article that described his work and prayers to save the life of his friend, Lance Cpl. Colin Smith, a machine gunner in the vehicle's turret who was shot through the skull by a sniper in Karma in late October." Kirby "said he intended to return to active duty when his doctors allow," while Smith was more severely injured: "It was not clear how fully Lance Corporal Smith would recover his ability to converse. Similarly, he has extremely limited movement on the right side of his body."

Military Could Lack Needed Resources As Global Challenges Increase. The New York Times (2/25, WK1, Shanker, 1.16M) writes about US deployments of F-22s and an aircraft carrier against North Korea and Iran, "These moves seemed like perfectly logical geopolitical responses to heightened dangers. But they also helped mask another reality. Because the military today does not have enough available ground troops to use for intimidation, the moves were pretty much the only options rather than choices among several. ... Senior military planners do not deny that last week's deployments reflect a deep concern in the Pentagon that the United States simply may not have enough ready and available resources to go around."

NYTimes Blames Iraq War For Resurgence Of Al Qaeda. The New York Times (2/25, WK13, 1.16M), inan editorial, writes, "At a crucial moment, the Bush administration diverted America's military strength, political attention and foreign aid dollars from a necessary, winnable war in Afghanistan to an unnecessary, and by now unwinnable, war in Iraq. Al Qaeda took full advantage of these blunders to survive and rebuild. Now it seems to be back in business. … Al Qaeda's comeback didn't have to happen. And it must not be allowed to continue. The new Qaeda sanctuaries in Pakistan do not operate with the blessing of the Pakistani government. But Pakistan's military dictator, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has not tried very hard to drive them out. In recent months he has virtually conceded the tribal areas to local leaders sympathetic to Al Qaeda. President Bush needs to warn him that continued American backing depends on his doing more to rid his country of people being trained to kill Americans."

Rich Looks Back At Warnings From 2001. The New York Times' Frank Rich (2/25, WK14) writes that in the summer of 2001, "intelligence and counterterrorism officials…were privately sounding urgent warnings like those in last week's Times, culminating in the President's Daily Brief titled 'Bin Laden Determined to Strike in U.S.' The system 'was blinking red,' as the C.I.A. chief George Tenet would later tell the 9/11 commission. But no one, from the White House on down, wanted to hear it. The White House doesn't want to hear it now, either. That's why terrorism experts are trying to get its attention by going public, and not just through The Times. Michael Scheuer, the former head of the C.I.A. bin Laden unit, told MSNBC's Keith Olbermann last week that the Taliban and Al Qaeda, having regrouped in Afghanistan and Pakistan, 'are going to detonate a nuclear device inside the United States.'"

Cockburn Denounces Rumsfeld's Job Performance. In the Washington Post (2/25, B2, 690K), Alexander Cockburn, author of the forthcoming "Rumsfeld: His Rise, Fall and Catastrophic Legacy," writes that even many of Donald Rumsfeld's detractors "tend to assume that he was an effective manager" at the Pentagon, but an "examination of his record reveals that, in fact, Rumsfeld was a very poor manager. Despite his gruff theatrics, he shirked the task of leadership at the Defense Department, failing to restrain the services in their pursuit of parochial agendas. Though he spewed ideas and injunctions daily, he routinely neglected to follow them up. Pledged to the 'transformation' of the cold war military establishment in 2001, he left it six years later almost entirely untransformed, save for the wreckage wrought by the Iraqi adventure. Even in concept, his program for 'transformation' amounted to little more than notions articulated as bumper stickers, and poorly thought out ones at that."

Evaluations Show Dismissed US Attorneys Were Highly Praised. The New York Times (2/25, Johnston) reports, "Internal Justice Department performance reports for six of the eight United States attorneys who have been dismissed in recent months rated them 'well regarded,' 'capable' or 'very competent,' a review of the evaluations shows." The Times continues, "The performance reviews, known as Evaluations and Review Staff Reports, show that the ousted prosecutors were routinely praised for playing a leadership role with other law enforcement agencies in their jurisdictions. … The reviews, each of them 6 to 12 pages long, were carried out by Justice Department officials from 2003 to 2006. Each report was based on extensive interviews, conducted over several days with judges, other federal law enforcement agencies and staff members in each office. … It had been known that the reports were mostly favorable, but the reports themselves had not been made public." The Times adds, "Over all, the evaluations, which were obtained from officials authorized to have them, appear to raise new questions about the rationale for the dismissals provided by senior Justice Department officials. The officials have repeatedly cited poor job performance to explain their decisions to oust the eight prosecutors, all of them Republicans appointed by President Bush in his first term. … On Saturday, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who has led a Congressional investigation into the dismissals and has been briefed on the evaluations, said the reports showed that new legislation was needed to keep the Justice Department from politically motivated firings. … 'As we feared, the comprehensive evaluations show these U.S. attorneys did not deserve to be fired,' Mr. Schumer said. 'To the contrary, they reveal they were effective, respected and set appropriate priorities.'" The Times notes, "In response, a senior Justice Department official said the reviews, which focused on management practices within each United States attorney's office, did not provide a broad or complete picture of the prosecutors' performance. … The official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the confidential nature of personnel information, said, 'The reviews don't take into account whether the U.S. attorneys carried out departmental priorities.' … Referring to the 94 United States attorney's districts, the official said, 'You can't have 94 different sets of priorities,' suggesting that the dismissed prosecutors had failed to follow priorities set by the Justice Department in Washington. … However, each case report included a statement that each of the ousted prosecutors had established strategic goals set by the Justice Department in high priority areas like counterterrorism, narcotics and gun violence."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Human Resources Officials Increasingly Ensnared In Options Probes. The AP (2/25, Gordon) reports, "As lawsuits and federal prosecutions mount over suspect timing of stock option awards at American public companies, corporate human resources executives are increasingly being caught in the gears of cases." The AP continues, "With stock options widely used as perks to attract talent, personnel staff regularly were brought into executives' machinations on options awards - often signing the relevant paperwork, such as memos to employees or letters making job offers. That means their fingerprints are on documents that can enter into the paper trails that prosecutors are using to build options-dating cases. … 'HR people have to be careful,' said John Gamble, a lawyer at Fisher & Phillips, an Atlanta firm specializing in labor and employment law. 'Sometimes they get assignments that they need to think twice about.'" The AP adds, "Among the handful of executives who have been charged with fraud by federal prosecutors in the wave of options investigations is Stephanie Jensen, the former vice president for human resources at Brocade Communications Systems Inc. Jensen and Gregory L. Reyes, who was Brocade's chief executive, pleaded not guilty in August. … The Justice Department prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission allege that Reyes and Jensen regularly backdated minutes of board of directors' meetings so it appeared that the stock-options committee granted options on dates when Brocade's share price was relatively low. The two executives also are accused of having letters of job offers backdated so employees would receive options that were dated at low points in the company's share price that predated their first day of work." The AP notes, "E-mails uncovered in court records in the case of Mercury Interactive Corp., one of the first Silicon Valley companies to acknowledge stock options manipulation, show exchanges between a payroll manager named Susie Fregoso and company executives concerning dating of options. At one point in August 2000, according to an account of the e-mails in Tuesday's Wall Street Journal, Mercury's assistant controller told Fregoso the company will use the 'magic backdating ink' of Sharlene Abrams, a former chief financial officer."

Nacchio Attorney Laid Out Defense Strategy In Series Of Books. The Denver Post (2/25, Vuong, Griffin) reports, "Herbert Stern, Joe Nacchio's lead attorney, will come out firing in the criminal insider-trading trial of the former Qwest chief executive." The Post continues, "Stern will lay out his case early in his opening statement. He will move through his points quickly but will make sure the jury hears his most important material more than once. He'll 'hitchhike' - or extract helpful information from the prosecution's witnesses during cross-examination. … And during closing arguments, he'll try to teach his 'friends' - jurors who believe Nacchio is not guilty - how to argue against others in the jury room. … Stern offers those tips, and many others, in an eight-volume set of books titled 'Trying Cases to Win.' The first was published in 1991, the last in 2004." The Post adds, "Stephen A. Saltzburg, co-author of three of the books, said Stern will follow the framework outlined in his books. … 'He's going to do exactly what he writes that you should do,' said Saltzburg, a professor at George Washington University School of Law in Washington, D.C., who has known Stern for more than 25 years." The Post adds, "Nacchio's trial is set to begin March 19 in U.S. District Court in Denver. If convicted, he faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine on each of the 42 counts of illegal insider trading. … Saltzburg said prosecutors would gain an advantage by reading Stern's books before the trial. … 'It's always a good idea to read what your adversary has written,' he said. 'It's kind of like having tried a case against somebody who you've known before. You have an idea how they approach litigation.'" The Post notes, "Department of Justice spokesman Jeff Dorschner declined comment when asked whether any of the attorneys on the Nacchio case has read Stern's books."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Iowa Prison Ruling May Decide Future Of Faith-Based Initiatives. The Washington Post (2/25, A13, Slevin, 690K) reports on a faith-based prison program in Iowa "rooted in evangelical Christianity and supported by more than $1.5 million in public funds. … A key question is its constitutionality. A trio of appellate judges, including former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, is reviewing a lower court's decision that the program violates the separation of church and state. People on both sides of the dispute say the outcome could influence the future of President Bush's faith-based initiative, which links government and religious institutions in efforts to solve social problems. 'This puts into jeopardy not just faith-based nonprofits in a prison setting,' said Mark Earley, president of Virginia-based Prison Fellowship Ministries, whose affiliate, the InnerChange Freedom Initiative, runs the Iowa program. 'I think you'd see a precipitous drop in the number of faith-based organizations willing to provide services to governments.'"

Faith-Based Initiative Faces First SCOTUS Challenge Next Week. The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 8, 2:50, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "One of President Bush's earliest initiatives faces a challenge next week in the US Supreme Court. At issue is federal support for faith-based social programs. … In 2006, a lower court said the Freedom From Religion Foundation… had legal standing as taxpayers to challenge the White House practice of spending money" on faith-based conferences, arguing that "the funding of the conferences is unconstitutional, violating the separation between church and state. The President has insisted the programs are on the correct side of that wall and that that they work. … This is the first Supreme Court case directly related to the President's faith-based initiative. It's scheduled to be heard this Wednesday."

New York Inmate Willing To Lose Fingers To Secure Evidence. The New York Times (2/25, Barry) reports, "On a September afternoon in 2005, with a prison guard standing beside the operating table and another outside the door, a surgeon cut into the left hand of inmate No. 99A2254." The Times continues, "The doctor was trying to find fragments of a bullet among the tiny veins and ligaments of Napoleon Cardenas's middle finger. Mr. Cardenas had been warned that removing them could cause nerve damage. Another surgeon had balked at performing the operation, saying it could violate the Hippocratic oath. … But Mr. Cardenas did not care. He was convinced that under the pale scars lay evidence that would topple two convictions in a 1994 jewel heist: his and his younger brother's. Between them, they had already served 14 years in prison for the crime. Cut off my fingers if you need to, he said." The Times adds, "Mr. Cardenas's lawyers waited anxiously outside as the surgeon, using forceps, removed two pieces of metal. The results would not, in themselves, convince the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, that the brothers were innocent. But Mr. Brown's investigator was impressed by Mr. Cardenas's eagerness to have the operation. That and a growing pile of new evidence were enough to prompt the district attorney's office to start its own yearlong investigation. … On Jan. 18, Mr. Brown asked a judge to vacate the convictions of Napoleon Cardenas and his brother Carlos in the jewel heist. In a statement, Mr. Brown said his prosecutors were 'always prepared to take a hard look at a case — even post-conviction — to make certain that justice has been done.' … Steven Silberblatt, one of half a dozen Legal Aid Society lawyers who worked to overturn the Cardenas brothers' convictions, put it this way: 'Sometimes circumstances provide their own lie-detector test. When someone is willing to lose the use of his hand, you get the feeling they're probably telling the truth.'"

CIVIL LAW:

Judge To Hear Closing Arguments In Wrongful Imprisonment Suit Tuesday. The Boston Globe (2/25, Murphy) reported "life changed dramatically" for the families of Edward Greco, Joseph Salvati, Peter J. Limone and Henry Tameleo, who were convicted of murder "in state court while FBI documents that might have helped prove their innocence remained buried in the bureau's files. … On Tuesday, a federal judge will hear final arguments in a civil suit seeking more than $100 million in damages from the government." US District Judge Nancy Gertner "is expected to rule next month on whether the FBI is liable for failing to disclose documents during the 1968 trial that indicate the men were framed, and if so, how much the government should pay the men and their families." The Globe notes, "The civil case is being closely watched in Boston. … The case caps a decade of investigation into the FBI's mishandling of informants in Boston while zealously pursuing the Mafia."

DOJ Religious Freedom Initiative Sparks Debate. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (2/25, Banks) reports,

"The Department of Justice has launched a "First Freedom Project" to draw more attention to protecting the religious liberties of Americans. … 'Why should it be permissible for an employee standing around the water cooler to declare that "Tiger Woods is God," but a firing offense for him to say, "Jesus is Lord,"?" Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday at a meeting of the executive committee of the Southern Baptist Convention in Nashville, Tenn. … 'These are the kinds of contradictions we are trying to address.'" The Plain Dealer continues, "The initiative includes a new Web site (www.firstfreedom.gov), an education program and a task force that will review religious freedom policies and cases. … Leaders of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, Family Research Council and Southern Baptist Ethics & Religious Liberty Commission applauded the initiative. … The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said it was a hypocritical action by an administration that he said has tried to merge church and state." The Plain Dealer notes, "The Rev. Bob Edgar, general secretary of the National Council of Churches, welcomed the renewed focus on religious freedom but questioned why it was announced at a gathering of a single denomination. He invited Gonzales to present the project to the March meeting of the council's Committee on Religious Liberty, and suggested it also should be presented to Muslim groups. … A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to respond specifically to Edgar's criticism, but said, 'I believe he [Gonzales] intends to talk about this to other groups.'"

Bias Claims Emerge From DePauw University Sorority Evictions. The New York Times (2/25, Dillon) reports from Greencastle, IN, "When a psychology professor at DePauw University here surveyed students, they described one sorority as a group of 'daddy's little princesses' and another as 'offbeat hippies.' The sisters of Delta Zeta were seen as 'socially awkward.' … Worried that a negative stereotype of the sorority was contributing to a decline in membership that had left its Greek-columned house here half empty, Delta Zeta's national officers interviewed 35 DePauw members in November, quizzing them about their dedication to recruitment. They judged 23 of the women insufficiently committed and later told them to vacate the sorority house." The Times continues, "The 23 members included every woman who was overweight. They also included the only black, Korean and Vietnamese members. The dozen students allowed to stay were slender and popular with fraternity men — conventionally pretty women the sorority hoped could attract new recruits. Six of the 12 were so infuriated they quit. … 'Virtually everyone who didn't fit a certain sorority member archetype was told to leave,' said Kate Holloway, a senior who withdrew from the chapter during its reorganization. … 'I sensed the disrespect with which this was to be carried out and got fed up,' Ms. Holloway added. 'I didn't have room in my life for these women to come in and tell my sisters of three years that they weren't needed.'" The Times notes, "Ms. Holloway is not the only angry one. The reorganization has left a messy aftermath of recrimination and tears on this rural campus of 2,400 students, 50 miles southwest of Indianapolis. … The mass eviction battered the self-esteem of many of the former sorority members, and some withdrew from classes in depression. There have been student protests, outraged letters from alumni and parents, and a faculty petition calling the sorority's action unethical. … DePauw's president, Robert G. Bottoms, issued a two-page letter of reprimand to the sorority. In an interview in his office, Dr. Bottoms said he had been stunned by the sorority's insensitivity."

New York Fire Department Sees Increase In Minority Applications. The New York Daily News (2/25, Lemire) reports, "More than 4,500 more minority applicants took the FDNY written entrance exam this year than in 2002, giving fire officials hope that a multimillion-dollar campaign to start diversifying the department will end in success." The News continues, "Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta believes the jump from 3,730 to 8,297 minority candidates proves the department is making progress. … 'All the hard work we put into this campaign has paid off,' said Scoppetta. 'We hope once we begin hiring from this list next year, we'll have the most diverse group of candidates joining the world's greatest fire department.' …. But critics warned the promising numbers would be rendered meaningless if the minority applicants weren't hired." The News adds, "The FDNY recruits new members only once every four years and the department's hiring process has been closely scrutinized by Justice Department investigators. Currently, the department is 91% white. … The written test was offered at several sites across the five boroughs on Jan. 20 and 21,549 applicants sat down to take the several-hour exam, officials told the Daily News. … Of those candidates, 38.5% identified themselves as being black, Hispanic, Asian or Native American, officials said. This marks a significant increase from 2002, when 21.5% of the 17,348 applicants deemed themselves persons of color. … Though the number of white candidates dropped slightly from 13,618 in 2002 to 13,252 in January, applications from minority groups rose across the board, officials said. … Most strikingly, the number of Hispanics jumped from 2,088 to 4,026 while the number of blacks rose from 1,357 to 3,776, the statistics show. The number of women who took the test also increased, rising to 814 from 549."

Pelosi Reportedly Vowed To Oppose California State Redistricting Reform. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Vogel, 850K) reports, "The new dynamic in Washington, with Californian Nancy Pelosi as House speaker, threatens to thwart an effort by state political leaders to overhaul the way voting districts are drawn. Fresh from their victories in the November election, Democrats in Congress don't want to risk their fragile majority. Many Republicans don't want their relatively safe seats threatened either. Their opposition promises to crimp an effort" by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez, and others to "change how California draws political boundaries every 10 years to accommodate population shifts. Nuñez said he thinks he will have to exempt Congress from legislation he is crafting to have California's political boundaries drawn by a nonpartisan panel, rather than by politically driven state lawmakers." Nuñez "said Pelosi didn't tell him directly that she would fight a redistricting initiative if it included Congress. He said he 'heard it from many other people' that she and other members of Congress would campaign to kill it."

ANTITRUST:

TXU To Abandon Plans For New Coal Plants. The New York Times (2/25, Barringer, Sorkin) reports, "Under a proposed $45 billion buyout by a team of private equity firms, the TXU Corporation, a Texas utility that has long been the bane of environmental groups, will abandon plans to build 8 of 11 coal plants and commit to a broad menu of environmental measures, according to people involved in the negotiations." The Times continues, "The roster of commitments came through an unusual process in which the equity firms asked two prominent environmental groups what measures could be taken to win their support. The result is an about-face from the company's earlier approach to climate-change issues, and includes a goal of returning the carbon-dioxide emissions by TXU to 1990 levels by 2020. … Environmental groups said yesterday that they had never known of a financial deal with such an ambitious built-in environmental component." The Times adds, "Two private equity firms, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group, have proposed to buy TXU in what would become the largest leveraged buyout ever. … The transaction will be put to the TXU board for a vote on Sunday." The Times notes, "People involved in the negotiations said that Goldman Sachs, an adviser and lender to the buyers, helped broker peace with environmental groups and sought their support for the transaction. Goldman Sachs has been one of the most aggressive firms on Wall Street about taking action on climate change; the company sends its bankers home at night in hybrid limousines. … For the investor groups, the effort was as much about making a sound business decision to ensure the deal's completion as it was about any environmental concerns. … By bringing the environmental groups into the process, the buyers may have helped avert years of costly litigation over emissions from their plants. But they may also have raised new questions about how they will meet the energy needs that TXU intended to address by building all 11 plants; the company is said to be examining ways to expand in cleaner forms of energy. None of the parties interviewed was able to provide details."

BAR/BRI Class Action Settlement Rankles Some. The New York Times (2/25, Glater) reports, "Competitors say that a leading company ripped down their posters and used deceptive marketing tactics; former customers say that the same company paid business rivals to close their doors. And one competitor says he fears that he was the victim of outright theft." The Times continues, "This is how the business of training aspiring lawyers to pass the bar exam is conducted, according to documents and testimony that have surfaced as a result of a federal lawsuit in Los Angeles. It is a business dominated by a single company that expanded, depending on whom you believe, either by squashing its competitors or by simply offering a superior product. … That company is BAR/BRI. And students who took its courses filed a class-action lawsuit two years ago contending that the company operated an illegal monopoly and overcharged them by about $1,000 each. The students, seeking hundreds of millions of dollars in damages, also said that BAR/BRI cut illegal deals with potential competitors to protect its market. But earlier this month, lawyers in the case reached a tentative settlement agreement for $49 million, which could net each student in the class about $125." The Times adds, "The deal, which still requires court approval, has infuriated some of the original plaintiffs in the case, who harbored such anger against BAR/BRI that they wanted to see the company broken up. BAR/BRI is a unit of the Thomson Corporation, the large information services concern, and Thomson says the accusations in the lawsuit against BAR/BRI involve activities that occurred before it bought the company in 2001. BAR/BRI's lawyers say the company has done nothing wrong and that the students' claims are meritless." The Times notes, "It is hard to gauge the strength of the case against BAR/BRI, because many of the filings are sealed — at the request of the defendants, the plaintiffs' lawyers say. But depositions and other court documents that have become publicly available during the course of the litigation have been laced with accusations that BAR/BRI engaged in unsavory conduct. Other claims that have emerged in the case also suggest just how petty and cutthroat the entire bar review market can be. … In a deposition for the Los Angeles case, one former competitor, Hugh Reed, contended that BAR/BRI representatives tore his company's posters off of law school walls; both he and James J. Rigos, a current competitor, contended that the company exaggerated its students' success rate on the bar exam. And Mr. Rigos said in court filings that he believed that his offices might have been repeatedly burglarized because he was a potential witness in the Los Angeles antitrust litigation. … Lawyers for BAR/BRI have denied Mr. Rigos's accusations."

Merging Ohio Hospitals Downplay Antitrust Concerns. The Cincinnati Enquirer (2/25, O'farrell) reports, "The president and CEO of St. Elizabeth Medical Center doesn't see much potential for anti-trust concerns to block a proposed merger with St. Luke Hospital." The Enquirer continues, "While the proposed merger, announced Thursday, would consolidate Northern Kentucky's hospitals - one each in Covington, Edgewood and Grant County under the St. Elizabeth flag, plus two in Florence and Fort Thomas under St. Luke - consumers and insurers would still have plenty of providers to choose from, said Joseph Gross. … 'There's an awful lot of competition here,' Gross said. 'It's a very large market.'" The Enquirer adds, "Administrators for the hospital groups have already taken a look at potential anti-trust issues, he said, and so far, the signs are positive. … 'We, and St. Luke's, are part of a larger Cincinnati health-care market, and many of the Cincinnati hospitals, the bigger ones, compete aggressively for Northern Kentucky patients,' Gross said. 'In the past three weeks, mailings from two Cincinnati hospitals competing for patients over here have been received throughout Northern Kentucky.' … Rick Laib, chairman of St. Luke's board of trustees, pointed out that 20 percent of consumers in Northern Kentucky already go outside the region - either to Greater Cincinnati or other Kentucky providers - for health." The Enquirer notes, "In announcing their intention to merge, officials from the two hospitals pledged to keep all five facilities open and continue all current services. … The announcement is just the latest in an ongoing shake-up in health care in the region."

House Antitrust Task Force To Look At Satellite Radio Merger This Week. The New York Times (2/25, Austen) reports, "If the plan to merge XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio is approved, one result may be less music and less talk radio beamed into cars around the country. … The reasons for that, however, will have nothing to do with regulators." The Times continues, "Washington will take its first look at the proposed merger on Wednesday when the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed antitrust task force meets. Besides the scrutiny of the proposed combination, the satellite radio business is facing huge changes. … The first phase of the business — beaming dedicated music, sports and talk-radio stars like Howard Stern and Opie and Anthony directly to consumers — has not proved to have a clear advantage over old technology like free radio and newer ones like the iPod. So now satellite companies are looking into what other services they can offer to make them appealing to motorists. … 'The question they have to ask now is: what problems haven't been solved in the car?' said Michael Urlocker, a former wireless analyst with UBS Securities who is now the chief executive of The Disruption Group, a Toronto-based consulting company. 'The lack of customer sign-ups on a profitable basis should be a sign that trying to create a better iPod than Apple is a losing proposition.'" The Times adds, "Although XM and Sirius offer radio, in theory, the systems could be adapted to distribute any kind of data. And, indeed, both companies have made limited steps in that direction. Subscribers can already choose to have selected stock quotes, as well as news and sports headlines, beamed to the tiny screens on their receivers. … Both companies beam weather data to aviators and boaters through services that cost upwards of $50 a month. Later this year, XM will extend that by beaming weather information to a hand-held unit for hikers and hunters. … But Sirius has also made tentative steps toward offering video. At trade shows, Sirius has displayed prototype systems for sending video to back-seat displays like those now used by in-car DVD players. And the company recently, if vaguely, outlined plans to deliver some form of video programming aimed at children later this year."

Mexican Authorities Give Conditional Approval To Cable TV Deal. The AP (2/25) reports, "Mexico's antitrust agency said Sunday it has placed a series of conditions on media conglomerate Grupo Televisa in order for it to acquire a stake in Monterrey cable TV operator Television Internacional, or TVI." The AP continues, "The Federal Competition Commission, or CFC, said in a news release that among the conditions, Televisa would have to offer its broadcast channels on all pay TV systems in the country, and carry the broadcast signals of others on its pay TV systems." The AP adds, "Televisa sought antitrust clearance last year to acquire a 50 percent stake in TVI as the country's telecommunications companies repare for the implementation of 'triple play,' or the bundling of phone, Internet and television service on the same network."

Bloomberg (2/25, Arai) reports, "Televisa will be allowed to buy 50 percent of Television Internacional de Monterrey on the condition that it offers its free channels to all pay-TV providers nationwide, Mexico's Federal Competition Commission said in an e-mail today. Televisa, based in Mexico City, also must carry free channels from other companies, the commission said. … 'With this decision, Televisa cannot use its content as a mechanism to displace competitors,' said Eduardo Perez Motta, president of the Federal Competition Commission, on a conference call. 'This will create competition in this industry.'" Bloomberg adds, "The conditions are 'too tough' and Televisa will study what measures it can take, the company said in an e-mail today. A spokesman for Televisa in Mexico City declined to comment beyond the statement."

EU Antitrust Watchdog Gets Tough On Cartels, Microsoft. AFP (2/25) reports, "Shortly after taking office as Europe's top competition watchdog in November 2004, Neelie Kroes vowed in the face of detractors that she would not be the 'pussy cat' of big business. … Nearly half way through her five-year term, Kroes has silenced early criticism that she was too cuddly with the corporate world by not hesitating to bite business titans that squash their rivals." AFP continues, "Last Wednesday, the Dutch competition commissioner once again bared her teeth when she imposed the biggest fine ever in a EU cartel case by bringing an illegal club of lift makers crashing down with a penalty of 992 million euros (1.3 billion dollars). … In a typically hard-worded statement, she said the consumers would suffer from the effects of the 'outrageous' cartel for years and vowed that the 'the memory of this fine should last just as long' in the members' boardrooms." AFP adds, "The crushing fine was the latest move in a 'no-tolerance' crackdown on cartels that Kroes has made a top priority of her tenure during which she has built up a team of 60 regulators devoted to trustbusting. … It also came less than a month after she hit 10 companies with a fine of 750 million euros --- the third biggest ever imposed in a cartel case -- for fixing prices and carving up the market in power generating equipment. … After busting the power equipment club, Kroes stormed that she 'will not tolerate cartels in Europe and the damage that they do in any area of business.' … But Kroes has not only been busy fighting cartels as she has also repeatedly taken a hardline in the European Commission's long-standing battle against Microsoft."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Carter's Support For Energy Conservation Considered Far-Sighted. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/25, Chapman, 379K) reports thats president, Jimmy Carter "installed solar panels atop the White House. He championed coal and nuclear power. He taxed oil company profits. He created the U.S. Department of Energy. He introduced America to ethanol. Oil imports plummeted during the Carter administration. Renewable energy research skyrocketed. Cars got more miles per gallon of gas. Thermostats were lowered to 55 degrees at night. … The Bush administration has given 'no consideration that I've ever detected for taking any sort of substantive action that would correct our growing crisis of energy,' Carter said in an interview last week at his home in Plains. 'Even in Iraq, there's no indication of this administration's willingness to call for sacrifice, except among the families who have servicemen and women in Iraq.' Carter spoke an hour before groundbreaking in Plains for an alternative fuel factory that will turn soybean oil into biodiesel to help lessen America's dependence on imports and, in the process, clean the environment. He feels vindicated that energy policies he pushed 30 years before are now accepted as mainstream."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Restrict Coal-Fired Plants. The New York Times (2/25, WK13, 1.16M) editorializes, "Much of corporate America now appears to be out in front of the Bush administration in facing up to global warming. Some big players like Pacific Gas and Electric and DuPont seem seriously committed to mandatory controls on carbon dioxide emissions — in sharp contrast to the administration's voluntary approach. Others, notably big investment banks, are still doing what comes naturally: seizing opportunities, whether or not those opportunities fit their green posturing. … Barbara Boxer and Jeff Bingaman, the two senators who will have the most to say about climate change legislation, warned in a recent op-ed piece in The Dallas Morning News that companies like TXU that are racing to complete conventional coal-fired plants (nearly 150 are on the drawing board) will not be grandfathered under any new emissions law. Like any other company, they will be forced to meet their assigned carbon targets — which could be an expensive proposition."

Sea Creatures To Patrol Puget Sound For Navy. The Washington Post (2/25, A3, Harden, 690K) reports about Navy plans to deploy dolphins and sea lions around "Naval Base Kitsap-Bangor" in Puget Sound: "To bring its technology north, however, the Navy must finesse its way around climatological, legal and political obstacles. ... One judge ordered the Navy not to move the dolphins until it studied the health consequences. And public attitudes in the area toward the use of marine mammals for military purposes are downright icy."

Indian Reservations Worried About "Culture Of Violence." The Lompoc (CA) Record (2/25, Curtis) reports from Manchester-Point Arena Rancheria, CA, "Marcos Escareno's neighbors say he was raised amid a culture of violence on this tiny American Indian reservation. And residents say the disportionate number of shootings, stabbings and other incidents often go unreported because of a mistrust of law enforcement and a fear of retribution. … At 14, Escareno is the youngest person ever charged as an adult with murder in Mendocino County after he allegedly pointed a hunting rifle into a van window on Feb. 6 and shot Enoc Cruz Salgado, his sister's 21-year-old boyfriend. He has not entered a plea and is being held on $550,000 bail." The Record continues, "Some of the roughly 250 people who make up the Manchester-Point Arena band of Pomo Indians say it was merely an extreme example of the violence that has plagued their tribe. Tribal Chairman Nelson Pinola blames drug and alcohol abuse, combined with a lack of social services on the rugged North Coast where the rancheria is located. … 'How do you fix that?' said Pinola, a sheriff's lieutenant in neighboring Sonoma County. 'If we could fix it on a reservation, I'd sure like to copyright it.'" The Record adds, "Although the shooting death of Cruz Salgado was the first homicide at Manchester-Point Arena since 1992, the earliest year for which records were available, violent crimes such as assault, battery, child abuse and shootings occurred here at a higher rate than in the surrounding county. … On the rancheria, the rate of violent crime was about 26 per 100 residents between 2001 and 2006 _ 2 1/2 times that of the surrounding county, where the violent crime rate was 10.3 per 100 people, according to records from the Mendocino sheriff's office, whose jurisdiction excludes the county seat of Ukiah." The Record notes, "Nationally, American Indians experienced a per capita rate of violent crime twice that of the U.S. population as a whole, according to a 2004 report from the U.S. Department of Justice. … Despite the high crime rate, residents insist violence on the reservation is underreported because of suspicion of outsiders, fear of reprisal attacks and concerns about alienating themselves in the community."

All On Air Force Two "Fine" After Problem. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) reports Vice President Dick Cheney's "plane from Sydney headed for Singapore today, with the White House saying it was a scheduled refueling stop and that Air Force Two had not been diverted." Australian Prime Minister John Howard earlier said "the plane was being diverted to Singapore because of unspecified problems. White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said there was a problem with a generator but it posed no safety threats and the aircraft and everyone on board were fine."

Cheney Says His Job Is To Help Bush "Be The Best President He Can Be." AFP (2/25) notes the conclusion of Cheney's trip to Japan and Australia. ABC

World News (2/24, story 3, 2:20, Muir, 8.78M) also reported on the conclusion of Cheney's Australia trip, running more of Jonathan Karl's interview with the Vice President. Cheney said, "I'm not running for office. I'm not worried about what the folks in Iowa are going to say in January of next year. I'm there to do a job, that's to call them as I see them, to help the President the best of my ability, be the best president he can be to address the issues of the day."

Governors Urge Bush, Congress To Address CHIP Shortfalls. The New York Times (2/25, A19, Pear, 1.16M) reports that at the National Governors Association began its winter meeting, 13 governors "expressed alarm…that they were about to run out of federal money for" the "popular" State Children's Health Insurance Program. The governors, including seven Republicans, "appealed to Congress and the Bush administration for swift action to protect hundreds of thousands of children who could lose benefits. The full association is poised to endorse that appeal. In a letter to the Democratic and Republican leaders of Congress, the 13 governors said that 'health insurance for some of our states' most vulnerable citizens is in jeopardy.' 'Without quick Congressional action,' the letter said, 'our states, all facing federal shortfalls, will be forced to make harsh decisions affecting the lives of thousands of families.' Such decisions could include freezing enrollment, restricting eligibility, increasing premiums charged to low-income families or reducing benefits like dental and vision care."

Citizenship Application Spike Attributed To Congressional Debate. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, A1, Gorman, Delson, 850K) reports, "Citizenship applications are skyrocketing in Southern California and across the nation, as green card holders rush to avoid a proposed fee increase, a revised civics test and possible changes in immigration law. Applications filed in Los Angeles and six surrounding counties shot up to 18,024 in January from 7,334 in the same month last year, a 146% increase, according to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. Nationwide, the number hit 95,622, up from 53,390, a 79% increase. … The filings are expected to continue as Congress prepares to restart the debate on immigration reform. 'Every time we have this much talk of immigration in the news and on the Hill, we get a lot more interest,' said CIS spokeswoman Marie Sebrechts. 'We tend to see a surge in applications.' After last year's marches, immigrant rights advocates launched a campaign to produce 1 million new citizens and registered voters. They fell far short of their goal by the November election, but advocates said they were pleased with the number of immigrants who are applying for naturalization."

Bill Gates Says Congress Ought To Increase H-1B Visa Availability. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/25, B7, 690K), Microsoft's Bill Gates writes that if the US is "to remain competitive, we need a workforce that consists of the world's brightest minds. … We must also make it easier for foreign-born scientists and engineers to work for U.S. companies. … This issue has reached a crisis point. Computer science employment is growing by nearly 100,000 jobs annually. But at the same time studies show that there is a dramatic decline in the number of students graduating with computer science degrees. The United States provides 65,000 temporary H-1B visas each year to make up this shortfall -- not nearly enough to fill open technical positions. Permanent residency regulations compound this problem. … Last year, reform on this issue stalled as Congress struggled to address border security and undocumented immigration. As lawmakers grapple with those important issues once again, I urge them to support changes to the H-1B visa program that allow American businesses to hire foreign-born scientists and engineers when they can't find the homegrown talent they need."

"Great Anxiety" Among Christian Conservatives Over 2008 GOP Field. On its front page, the New York Times (2/25, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports that a "group of influential Christian conservatives and their allies emerged from a private meeting at a Florida resort this month dissatisfied with the Republican presidential field and uncertain where to turn." The Council for National Policy, "a secretive club whose few hundred members" include James Dobson, Jerry Falwell, and Grover Norquist, "risks relegation to the margins" with the end of the George W. Bush presidency, and "many of the conservatives who attended the event…said they were dismayed at the absence of a champion to carry their banner in the next election." While Sen. Sam Brownback, Mike Huckabee, and Rep. Duncan Hunter each had supporters at the meeting, "many conservatives expressed concerns about whether any of the candidates could unify their movement or raise enough money to overtake the front-runners, several participants in the meetings said." Paul Weyrich of the Free Congress Foundation said, "There is great anxiety. There is no outstanding conservative, and they are all looking for that."

Romney Acknowledges Misstating Bush's Past Stance On Abortion. The Politico (2/24, Allen) reports Mitt Romney "said this week that President Bush 'was pro-choice before he became pro-life,' an assertion the Romney campaign now acknowledges was inaccurate. The remark was based on a magazine article Romney had read, his campaign said." The White House said Bush "has always been 'pro-life.' During the presidential race of 2000, Dan Bartlett -- then a spokesman for the Bush campaign, now the White House counselor -- was asked about a quotation from a Texas newspaper in 1978 suggesting Bush's position had been unclear. Bartlett told The Washington Post: 'The governor was pro-life before he ran for Congress, during his run for Congress and after he ran for Congress.' A White House official said Friday that Bartlett's quote is still accurate today."

Polygamy A Part Of Romney Family's Past. The AP (2/24, Dobner, Johnson) writes that while Romney "condemns polygamy and its prior practice by his Mormon church, the Republican presidential candidate's great-grandfather had five wives and at least one of his great-great grandfathers had 12. Polygamy was not just a historical footnote, but a prominent element" in the Romney family tree.

McCain Campaigns In San Diego. ABC World News (2/24, story 5, :15, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "On the campaign trail today, Arizona Sen. John McCain was in San Diego, courting California Republicans."

Clinton Camp Warns Democrats Against Raising Ex-President's Impeachment. The Washington Post (2/25, A4, Kornblut, 690K) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "has a new commandment for the 2008 presidential field: Thou shalt not mention anything related to the impeachment of her husband. With a swift response to attacks from a former supporter last week," the Clinton team "offered a glimpse of their strategy for handling one of the most awkward chapters of her biography. They declared her husband's impeachment in 1998 -- or, more accurately, the embarrassing personal behavior that led to it -- taboo, putting her rivals on notice and all but daring other Democrats to mention the ordeal again. 'In the end, voters will decide what's off-limits, but I can't imagine that the public will reward the politics of personal destruction,' senior Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Friday, when asked whether the impeachment is fair game for Clinton's opponents. Earlier in the week, Wolfson dismissed references to President Bill Clinton's conduct as 'under the belt.' But the reality, of course, is that the impeachment was conducted very much in public." While Sen. Clinton "has spent the past seven years establishing her own identity as a public servant, Clinton has been embracing the more popular aspects of her husband's presidency more widely as she mounts her own campaign, with frequent references to their time together in the White House and their joint legacy. And as she has invoked the good Bill Clinton, she has risked invoking the bad, several Democratic strategists said."

Chait Says Conservatives "Spooked By The Clintons." In his Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes, "It is an odd article of faith among conservatives that Hillary Clinton is a sure-fire lock to win" the Democratic nomination. This belief "says more about them than it does about her. The belief in her invincibility is a product of their deepest fears. After all, it's not as though conservatives think that Clinton is a brilliant, natural politician. Nobody does. … When they try to talk about why Clinton inevitably will roll over her primary competition, they usually invoke the dreaded 'Clinton machine.' … Is the idea that Clinton's team is so battle-tested from her husband's presidency that it knows how to play the game far better than the competition? It's a plausible theory, but so far it doesn't seem to be working out that way. … Clinton looks extremely vulnerable. Why do so many conservatives insist that she's a lock to get the nomination? A few of them have a strong vested interest in the Hillary Clinton boogeyman." But the "bigger factor, I think, is that conservatives are spooked by the Clintons."

WPost Says Clinton Should Release Names Of Bundlers. The Washington Post (2/25, B6, 690K) editorializes that with John Edwards and Rudy Giuliani joining the list of presidential candidates vowing to "release voluntarily the identities of their big bundlers and, within some range, the amounts they raised," one "prominent figure" remains "absent from this picture: Hillary Rodham Clinton. … To ask for this information is not to suggest malfeasance or corruption on the part of Ms. Clinton's campaign or any other. It is simply to reassert the fundamental premise of campaign finance disclosure: that it is essential to a healthy, transparent system to know the identities of those underwriting political candidates."

Edwards Talks Health Care In New Hampshire. ABC World News (2/24, story 5, :15, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "In New Hampshire, former vice presidential nominee John Edwards talked to fellow Democrats about health care." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/25, Devine) reports "more than a hundred supporters packed the home and living room" of a house in Salem to hear Edwards discuss his plan for universal health care. Edwards said, "Universal health care is not cheap. I'm not saying it isn't. But I think it's critical for America to remain strong in the long run." The Nashua Telegraph (2/25, Landrigan) says Edwards "is the only major candidate to present a comprehensive plan that requires employers to offer coverage or pay into an insurance fund."

"Rock Star" Gore Could Take Home Oscar Tonight. The Washington Post (2/25, Booth, 690K) runs a front-page feature headlined "Al Gore, Rock Star," with the sub-headline "Oscar Hopeful May Be America's Coolest Ex-Vice President Ever." The Post writes, "In the annals of vice presidential history, tonight will be something different. In his black tux, the man known to his most fervent fans as 'The Goracle' will arrive by hybrid eco-limo and, surrounded by fellow Hollywood greenies Cameron Diaz and Leonardo DiCaprio, will stroll down the red carpet at the Academy Awards to answer the immortal question: 'Al, who are you wearing?'" Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth," the "100-minute movie that is essentially Gore giving a slide show about global warming, is the third-highest-grossing documentary ever," and is "also the hot pick tonight for Best Documentary, and if its director, Davis Guggenheim, wins an Oscar, he plans to bring Gore along with him to the stage to accept the golden statuette and perhaps say a few words. … Incredible as it may seem," Gore is "geek-chic cool. No velvet rope can stop him."

Helena Andrews writes in The Politico (2/24) that if Gore wins, "that means an acceptance speech – and let's face it, Gore's no Billy Crystal. So before Al uncrumples and reads from a dinner napkin outlining a dissertation on climate change, a few of Washington's funniest phrase-turners offer this prudent advice: Keep it short, keep it light and keep 'em laughing. Given the enormous spotlight, Gore could have more at stake than just bombing before the crowd of Prius-driving, energy-saving-bulb-using, Versace-swathed starlets in Hollywood. After all, he hasn't completely ruled out a 2008 presidential run." The New York Times (2/25, WK1, Zernike, 1.16M) takes a look at Hollywood's past and present role in raising money for candidates.

Most Experienced Candidates Lag Near Bottom Of Democratic Field. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Neuman, 850K) writes that "experience -- and how to measure it --- has become one of the first big debating points of the 2008 presidential race. In one of the curiosities of the Democratic primary, some of the candidates with the most experience in national politics are at the bottom of the early popularity surveys," while Sen. Barack Obama, "with a mere three years on the national stage, is this year's campaign-trail sensation." Sen. Christopher Dodd, "with 33 years in the House and Senate," has been "trying to heighten the importance of Washington knowledge," while Gov. Bill Richardson, "15 years in the House, two years as U.N. ambassador, three years as energy secretary," highlights "his 'unparalleled experience,'" and Sen. Joseph Biden, "35 years in the Senate," has said, "It's not so much whether I can compete with their money, but whether they can compete with my ideas and my experience."

Governors Nearly Absent From Crowded Field. The Washington Post (2/25, A4, Balz, 690K) looks at the near-absence of governors from the race, with only Richardson currently serving as a state's chief executive. And at the opening of the winter meeting of the National Governors Association, "few attendees expressed any desire to get involved on behalf of a presidential candidate." Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell "said that because of the heavily front-loaded nomination calendar, he and others may have more to lose than gain by picking a candidate now. 'Why risk ticking off the eventual nominee when there's no value to it?' Rendell asked."

Dodd, Richardson Could Benefit From Vilsack Exit. The Washington Post (2/25, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) looks at the "winners and losers" resulting from Tom Vilsack's departure from the presidential race. With Vilsack out, the Iowa caucuses are a winner, while Nevada is a loser, since "second-tier candidates looking to make the big leap will probably devote most of their limited resources to making a move in Iowa. The Nevada caucuses, set for five days later, will be an afterthought." Richardson, "the only candidate left on the Democratic side with executive experience," and Dodd, "is slowly but surely positioning himself to take advantage of a stumble by the front-runners," are winners. Vilsack himself is a loser, as his "decision to get out so quickly does little to enhance his chances at being picked for the national ticket."

Vilsack's Exit Linked To High Cost Of Campaigning. ABC and CBS both ran reports on campaign financing and the presidential campaign, tied to Vilsack's exit. ABC World News (2/24, story 6, 2:05, Hendren, 8.78M) reported that Tom Vilsack "had a key home state and a popular antiwar message. … What he lacked was cash. … He had raised more than $1 million last year -- an amount Barack Obama raised in a single day in Hollywood last week. Republican Mitt Romney brought in $6.5 million in a single day last month. … In 1952, the last time there was no incumbent in the race, Dwight Eisenhower won after spending $6.6 million in the general election. Political analysts estimate that by the time it's over, the republican and democratic nominees this time will have spent $500 million apiece." The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 2, 2:35, Assuras, 7.66M) said, "A political deep freeze is in store for any White House hopeful who is not able to raise tension of millions of dollars in campaign money. Total spending on presidential campaigns increased tenfold between 1976 and 2004; and could hit $1 billion during campaign '08. The high price of admission has already inflicted one casualty" in Vilsack.

Luntz Says GOP Must Reach Out To "Fed-Ups." In a Washington Post (2/25, B1, 690K) op-ed, corporate communications adviser and former Republican pollster Frank Luntz writes that Republicans in Congress "cannot regain their majority merely by relying on a coalition of traditional conservatives and evangelicals. They must reach out to what I call 'the fed-ups' -- a large and growing constituency of independent voters who have held the balance of power in every election since 1992, and will hold it again in 2008. … There are some hopeful signs. Both the early front-runners for the GOP presidential nomination," Rudy Giuliani and Sen. John McCain, "have appeal beyond the party's base of conservative supporters."

Broder Sees Much Work Ahead For Unity08 Effort. In a June 2006 column, David Broder took a look at the "Unity08" effort to recruit and nominate a bipartisan third-party presidential ticket via the Internet, and in his Washington Post (2/25, B7, 690K) column today, he returns to the subject, writing that 35,000 people have signed up so far to participate in the effort, according to Doug Bailey, one of the project's founders. Broder says, "They obviously have a long way to go before they can claim to be a viable political force, but they are making slow, steady progress." But after the "extremely cumbersome" process of setting up nomination rules and voting procedures, and getting their nascent party on state ballots, "then comes the challenge of recruiting a candidate or candidates for Unity08 to back. If its organizers had a compelling person already lined up, their task would be much easier, but they do not."

Perry's Attempt To Strengthen Texas Governorship Falters. The Houston Chronicle (2/25, Ratcliffe, 530K) reports Gov. Rick Perry's "five-year drive to add some muscle to Texas' weak governor system hit a brick wall last week. First, a state district judge ruled that Perry lacked the power to tell state administrative law judges by executive order to speed up hearings in TXU Corp.'s request for coal-fired electric plant permits. The next day, a House committee approved a bill to overturn Perry's executive mandate that all sixth-grade girls be vaccinated against a sexually transmitted virus that causes most cervical cancers. 'On the vaccine, the Legislature was relatively insulted about that,' said House Appropriations Chairman Warren Chisum, a Republican who has been allied with Perry in the past. 'They just felt it was important to exercise their authority as a Legislature.'"

NYTimes Blames States For Undermining NCLB. The New York Times (2/25, WK13, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes that in the case of the No Child Left Behind Act, "things have not worked as Congress planned. … Many states opted for dumbed-down tests and deliberate sleight of hand to create the fraudulent appearance of progress. As a result, states that perform well with their own watered-down exams do shockingly poorly when their students take the far more rigorous federal test known as the National Assessment of Educational Progress. A report this month by the bipartisan Commission on No Child Left Behind highlights this problem and calls for the development of more rigorous tests and national standards in reading, language arts, math and science."

WPost Urges Maryland To Adopt Public Campaign Financing. The Washington Post (2/25, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Last year, Maryland candidates for public office at the state level raised $93.6 million for their campaigns, up 69 percent from 2002. … So why isn't public financing of elections a hotter issue in Annapolis? … A bill before the General Assembly is modeled on rules already working well in Maine and Arizona. And public funding's advocates make the not implausible argument that the scheme would pay for itself soon enough as lawmakers, less beholden to special interests and corporate contributors, trimmed pork-barrel spending and tax breaks for the favored few."

Iran Says US "In No Position" For Military Confrontation. Under the headline, "Iran Urges Talks On Nukes, Not War," the Washington Times/AP (2/25, A1, Dareini) notes Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki "said yesterday the United States was in no position for another war and maintained that negotiations -- not threats -- were the only way to resolve the standoff over its nuclear activities." He "was responding to Vice President Dick Cheney, who renewed Washington's warning to Iran earlier yesterday that 'all options' were on the table if Tehran continues to defy U.N. demands to halt uranium enrichment." Mottaki "said the U.S. could not afford to settle its differences with Iran by starting a third war after Afghanistan and Iraq," and "urged the U.S. and its allies to return to dialogue when they are scheduled to meet in London next week."

Doubts Raised About US Intelligence On Iran. On its front page today, the Los Angeles Times (2/25, A1, Drogin, Murphy, 850K) reports, "Despite growing international concern about Iran's nuclear program and its regional ambitions, most U.S. intelligence shared with the [IAEA] has proved inaccurate and none has led to significant discoveries inside Iran." IAEA sources "said the CIA and other Western spy services have provided sensitive information to [them] at least since 2002, when Iran's long-secret nuclear program was exposed. But none of the tips about supposed secret weapons sites provided clear evidence that the Islamic Republic is developing illicit weapons." The Times adds that "the reliability of U.S. information and assessments on Iran is increasingly at issue as the Bush administration confronts the emerging regional power on multiple fronts: its expanding nuclear effort, its alleged support for insurgents inside Iraq and its backing of Middle East militant groups." Administration "officials privately acknowledge that much of their evidence on Iran's nuclear plans and programs remains ambiguous, fragmented and difficult to prove."

Hoagland Counsels "Strategic Patience" To Disarm Iran. In his Washington Post (2/25, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland says the "bravado of the first Bush term has been replaced by a sadder and quieter way of doing business abroad as Iraq has sapped U.S. capabilities and political cohesion." Noting recent steps with North Korea and Iran, he says the "sense of a U-turn is reinforced by Bush's reliance this time on the negotiating skills of his diplomatic corps and on European and Asian partners to reach, enforce and pay for the projected deals, which would serve as twin tombstones for a brief era of U.S. unilateralism." Citing "divisions in Iran's leadership," Hoagland says "U.S. and European policy should play on those divisions." He concludes, "Bush seems to have decided to employ strategic patience in seeking a verifiable nuclear deal with North Korea and to have taken a long-range view of regional stability. He should do no less with Iran, however much manufactured outrage or contrived mockery it provokes, in Tehran or in Washington."

El-Baradei To Lead IAEA Talks In North Korea Next Month. In continuing reporting on North Korea's willingness to allow IAEA inspections of its nuclear facilities, Bloomberg (2/25, Kim) reports IAEA Director-General Mohammed El-Baradei "accepted an invitation from North Korea to visit the country in March for talks on its nuclear program." El-Baradei said in a statement that he views "this as a step toward the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula," and said "we will discuss issues of mutual concern and how we can implement the agreement," including the "shut-down and eventual abandonment of the Yongbyon nuclear facility, including the reprocessing facility."

LATimes Welcomes IAEA's Return To North Korea. In an editorial today, the Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) says the "invitation" conveyed to El-Baradei was one "he couldn't refuse." The IAEA is "imperfect yet indispensable," the Times adds, and, "as a keeper of the international nuclear order, it is better than the alternatives — a conclusion even the Bush administration appears to have accepted." The invitation is "encouraging," but "the key test will be whether it discloses anything meaningful about its nuclear operations." Elsewhere, El-Baradei and President Bush "disagree on Tehran," but "these are policy disputes.

The IAEA's strength is more practical. It is powerless to force nations to allow its inspectors to go where they are not wanted, nor can it catch determined cheats. But it has earned credibility for honestly reporting what its inspectors find and where they are not permitted to look. For this alone, its return to North Korea will be useful."

Nunn's Reassessment Of Nuclear Weapons Strategy Analyzed. The New York Times Magazine (2/25, Crowley) in a profile of former Sen. Sam Nunn running more than 5,000 words, writes that a decade after leaving the Senate, "where he spent years as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Nunn posed one, overriding question about his list of things we'll wish we had done if a doomsday should ever come: 'Why aren't we doing them now?' In a sense, his own answer has been to help found and run the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a Washington-based foundation largely bankrolled by Nunn's friends Ted Turner and Warren Buffett. In what may be the most ambitious example of private dollars subsidizing national security, the N.T.I. is trying to fill in the gaps where government is failing to reduce nuclear threats. In other words, to do the things now that we would otherwise wish we had done. … As he sees it, the trouble is, in a defense establishment that once war-gamed the end of the world a thousand different ways, there has been a shortage of thinking about what the right direction looks like or how to take it."

Putin, Having "Transformed" Russian Politics, Could Hand-Pick Successor. A nearly 5,000-word piece in today's New York Times Magazine (2/25, Myers) details the politics and challenges of succession in Moscow as Vladimir Putin begins his presumed last year in office." Sergei Ivanov "has never expressed the desire to be president — neither in public nor, as far as anyone who knows will tell, in private. Neither has Dmitri A. Medvedev, the other first deputy prime minister and the other presumed-to-be-leading candidate. Nor have Valentina I. Matviyenko, the energetic governor of St. Petersburg; Vladimir I. Yakunin, another former K.G.B. agent who heads the state-owned Russian Railways; Sergei S. Sobyanin, a former governor and the president's chief of staff; Dmitri N. Kozak, the presidential envoy to the turbulent Caucasus; Boris V. Gryzlov, the speaker of the lower house of Parliament; Sergei M. Mironov, the chairman of the upper house; or Sergei V. Chemizov, director of the state arms-marketing monopoly who served as an intelligence officer with Putin in East Germany." The Times clarifies, "No one knows for sure who might emerge as a candidate, because Putin himself will decide, and he has given no indication yet of his final choice. What is certain is that whomever he selects will become the next president of Russia." Noting that "it has become impossible to imagine anyone else in charge," the Times adds that Putin's "genuine popularity, nourished by the czarlike aura cultivated around him, has smothered any chance for an alternative national leader to emerge, even one of his own choosing."

Lavrov Says Russian Assertiveness Need Not Augur New Cold War. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (2/25, B7, 690K), Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov says, "At a time when Russia is ready and eager to play a positive role in world affairs and integrate into the global economy, it does far more harm than good to treat Russia as a hostile nation whenever Moscow and Washington disagree." Of Putin's recent Munich speech, Lavrov says Putin "was neither attacking the United States nor proposing Russia as a counterbalance to U.S. unilateralism. Instead, he called for a world with many centers of influence where different interests work together, multilaterally, to shape a common denominator on global issues." Lavrov continues, "It only makes sense that we would hold our own views and expect them to be taken seriously," and "we will not compromise the right of the Russian people to decide things for themselves and be heard on international issues." He calls it "a grave error" to view "the honest and open airing of concerns as some sort of casus belli."

WPost Chides Bush Administration, Russia For Missile Defense Posturing. In an editorial entitled "Missile Fantasies," the Washington Post (2/25, B6, 690K) says the "emerging debate over the deployment of U.S missile defenses in Central Europe is based on a series of false pretenses" by both the Bush Administration and the Czech and Polish governments. But "the prize for cynical posturing, nevertheless, goes to Russia, which in the past few days has suddenly advanced a claim that it knows to be false: that the deployment of the antimissile system would weaken the Russian nuclear deterrent." For its part, the Post says, the US is merely "determined to create a program so literally set in concrete that it can't be stopped or reversed by future presidents… Whether the technology actually works or a threat exists that justifies the rush never seems to matter much." Calling Moscow's "gamesmanship" "worrisome," the Post concludes the Kremlin "may use the U.S. defense program as an excuse to revive a major piece of the Soviet nuclear arsenal with which to threaten NATO members in Europe. It's hard to think of a quicker way to revive the Cold War."

Chinese Human Rights Lawyers Spar Over Tactics For Change. A 3,000-word piece on the front page of the New York Times (2/25, Kahn, 1.16M) front page details two Chinese human rights lawyers' tactics for expanding freedom and democracy. But like "many who devote themselves to expanding freedoms and the rule of law in China, the two spend as much time clashing over tactics and principles as they do challenging the ruling Communist Party." They "are part of a momentous struggle over the rule of law in China. Young, well educated and idealistic, they and other members of the so-called weiquan, or rights defense, movement, aim to use the laws and courts that the Communist Party has put in place as part of its modernization drive to constrain the party's power."

Scholar Sees Chinese One-Party Rule Enduring. In the Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K), professor James Mann says of China's future, "It is possible to envision three scenarios for China. One can be called the Soothing Scenario: that China's authoritarian political system is bound to open up, or even that it is already evolving toward political liberalization." There is also an "Upheaval Scenario," and "then there is what I call the Third Scenario: that China's one-party political system will not change in any fundamental way. This view holds that China will remain an authoritarian regime over the long term." Mann says the latter "is perhaps the most likely. … The best time to see whether China will really open up or remain authoritarian will be in the year or two after the [2008 Olympics] visitors go home. I believe that China's current one-party system will endure far into the future."

Taiwanese Premier Will Seek Presidency. AFP (2/25) carries the announcement that Taiwanese Prime Minister Su Tseng-chang "will seek the ruling Democratic Progressive Party's nomination for the 2008 presidential race." The "60-year-old, a former human rights lawyer and popular co-founder of the pro-independence [DPP], emphasized Taiwan's sovereignty." AFP says "Su became the third DPP heavyweight to make public his presidential bid, following former premier Frank Hsieh, who stood down as premier a year ago, and DPP chairman Yu Shyi-kun." Vice President Annette Lu may also seek the DPP nomination.

Europeans Decline To Promise Aid Resumption To Palestinians. The AP (2/24, Charlton) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "ended his European tour Saturday without persuading any country to end crippling economic sanctions based on his power-sharing deal with" Hamas. French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy's offer to work with that unity government is called "the bright spot" of Abbas' mission. However, even Douste-Blazy "made no commitments on resuming aid… Europe's governments remained firm: Any new Palestinian government must recognize Israel's right to exist before direct international aid can resume."

IDF Enters Nablus, Imposes Curfew. The AP (2/25) reports, "Dozens of Israeli jeeps and armored vehicles raided the West Bank city of Nablus [today] and placed tens of thousands of Palestinians under curfew." IDF sources said that troops "uncovered an explosives laboratory in the city and that soldiers had been shot at in several places and returned fire. No injuries were reported on either side." Israeli "bulldozers pushed rubble into piles on main roads to make them impassable," while "troops placed about 50,000 people under curfew in the center of Nablus and closed the main entrance to the city."

Violence Could End Hamas-Fatah Calm. The New York Times (2/25, A8, Kershner, 1.16M) reports, "Five Palestinians were killed and more than 40 wounded in fighting between clans on Friday and early Saturday in Khan Yunis, a town in the southern Gaza Strip." The fighting "took on a factional hue, since one of the families is identified with Hamas and the other with" Fatah. The violence "raised fears of a possible round of revenge killings and renewed factional fighting between Hamas and Fatah after two weeks of relative calm."

Italian President Asks Prodi To Lead Government, Seek Confidence Vote. Under the headline, "Prodi Gets A Second Chance To Lead Italy," the New York Times (2/25, Fisher, 1.16M) reports Prime Minister Romano Prodi "was given a second chance to lead Italy's government on Saturday, though allies and enemies worried that his still-fragile coalition would remain divided and vulnerable to another collapse." Since his resignation into a caretaker role on Wednesday, Prodi "has forced party leaders into line, even though the underlying ideological splits remain in place, as does his razor-thin majority in the Senate." Yesterday, President Giorgio Napolitano "concluded that there was 'no concrete alternative' and asked Mr. Prodi to try again." While Prodi "is expected to have little trouble in the lower chamber, the House of Deputies, where he enjoys a wide majority," the Times says he "would make no firm predictions about the Senate."

Chavez Arms Purchases Raise Alarm, Criticism. The New York Times (2/25, Romero, 1.16M) reports, "Venezuela's arms spending has climbed to more than $4 billion in the past two years, transforming the nation into Latin America's largest weapons buyer and placing it ahead of other major purchasers in international arms markets like Pakistan and Iran." Officials in Caracas "say the arms acquisitions, which include dozens of fighter jets and attack helicopters and 100,000 Kalashnikov assault rifles, are needed to circumvent a ban by the United States on sales of American weapons to the country. They also argue that Venezuela must strengthen its defenses to counter potential military aggression from the United States." The Times says the "retooling of Venezuela's military strategy, which includes creation of a large civilian reserve force and military assistance to regional allies like Bolivia, has been part of a steadily deteriorating political relationship with" Washington, which has had "harsh criticism" for Caracas' "escalation of arms spending."

Chavez Says Bush's Latin America Trip Will Be "Failure." The AP (2/24) carries comments by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez "that he saw U.S. President George W. Bush's upcoming tour to Latin America as a diplomatic offensive aimed at isolating his leftist government." He "said that Bush's planned trip was 'without a doubt' aimed at dividing the region and containing Venezuela's influence." He is quoted predicting the trip is "destined to the abyss of failure." The White House "has said Bush's trip is aimed at underlining the U.S. government's commitment to the region and advancing democracy and its benefits, including health, education and economic opportunities."

Somali Violence Kills 10, Sparks Exodus From Mogadishu. The Washington Times/AFP (2/25, Abdinur) reports, "Thousands of terrified civilians poured out of the Somali capital yesterday after heavy fighting between Ethiopian troops and gunmen overnight left at least 10 persons dead." Many Somalis "left on foot for the relative calm of the surrounding countryside." The past "week saw some of the heaviest fighting in the capital since late December," and Somali and Ethiopian officials "blame remnants of the Islamist movement for stoking the violence."

High Unemployment Could Be Key To Senegal Election. The Washington Post/AP (2/25, A19, Callimachi) examines the "top election issue" in Senegal – employment. The public works projects of President Abdoulaye Wade, who is seeking reelection, "include the new sea-hugging highway, a second major airport and a pan-African university. Yet in a country where half the population of 12 million is unemployed, some Senegalese say they would settle for a decent job and three meals a day." Wade "said his critics are missing the larger picture," and he "points to an annual growth rate of almost 5 percent … and to job-creating initiatives such as raising crops whose oil can be used for biofuels."

Mbeki Said To Foster Gradual, Structural Improvements In South Africa. The Washington Post (2/25, A18, Timberg, 690K) examines the "change" seen in South Africa during Thabo Mbeki's presidency. "Inequality remains extreme in South Africa, with sharp divisions along lines of race and class. But Mbeki … has already crafted a legacy of fiscal stability and modest racial progress that, advisers say, he is working furiously to protect as rivals vie to replace him." He is "competing for a third term as party leader, a move that would help him handpick the next president. But analysts say the outcome is far from certain in a year they call the most politically tumultuous since apartheid." The Post says the "slow pace of change" could become "Mbeki's most glaring weakness." However, the Post adds, while "the racial order has proved dauntingly resilient, a strong economy has provided benefits to all levels of society." While Mbeki's "cerebral approach to the presidency will never generate the enthusiasm many South Africans felt for Nelson Mandela," Mbeki "was the intellectual force behind policies that have allowed the country to become fiscally sound while gradually providing homes, water, electrical connections and grants to millions of the poorest South Africans."

Kristof says the Bush Administration should consider the impact of proposed budget cuts in global maternal and child health programs. "For every woman who dies in childbirth worldwide, another 20 are injured. But because the victims are born with three strikes against them — they are poor, rural and female — they are invisible and voiceless, receiving almost no help either from poor countries or from the developed world." While domestically "neither Democrats nor Republicans have ever shown great interest in maternal health," Sri Lanka and Honduras "have both shown how poor countries can drastically cut rates of death and injury." Kristof says the US and other nations should support those who are "showing the world how to turn the tide of maternal mortality and morbidity" and "offering comfort to some of the most forlorn people in the world."

Researcher Says Kennan's "Containment" Remains Powerful Concept Today. Headlining his Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) op-ed, "Containment Makes A Comeback," professor Ian Shapiro writes, "Containment is a Cold War idea, articulated by historian and diplomat George Kennan." Kennan "argued that as long as the Soviet Union did not attack us, we should not attack it," and "history proved him right." While the Administration believes "containment in fact obsolete," Shapiro says "numerous parallels suggest that it is not." Saying "Libya should be" the "model for Iran," Shapiro believes the Administration views "it differently and are pushing the modern equivalent of rollback, suggesting that we should attack Iran to stop its nuclear weapons program." Citing Kennan's opposition to NATO and the UN, Shapiro notes, "It is ironic that the two areas in which Kennan's views are most outdated and wrongheaded — working with regional allies and international institutions — are the two areas in which the Bush administration follows his lead." He concludes, "Containment is not obsolete. The Bush doctrine is."

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 22

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Holding Muslim Terror Suspects At New Indiana Facility. The Washington Post (2/25, A7, Eggen, 690K) reports the Justice Department "has quietly opened a new prison unit in Indiana that houses a hodgepodge of second-tier terrorism inmates, most of them Arab Muslims, whose ability to communicate with the outside world has been tightly restricted. At the Communications Management Unit, or CMU, in Terre Haute, Ind., all telephone calls and mail are monitored, the number of phone calls limited and visits are restricted to a total of four hours per month, according to special rules enforced by the Justice Department's U.S. Bureau of Prisons. All inmate conversations must be conducted in English unless otherwise negotiated. … The Indiana unit…is part of a medium-security facility and includes inmates set to be released in as little as two years. Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said the unit's population will not be limited to inmates convicted of terrorism-related cases, though all of the prisoners fit that definition."

Holy Land Foundation Lawyers Say Anti-Semitic Comments Fabricated. Under the headline "Evidence Against Muslim Charity Appears Fabricated," the Los Angeles Times (2/25, Krikorian) reported, "When the Bush administration shut down the nation's largest Muslim charity five years ago, officials of the Dallas-based foundation denied allegations it was linked to terrorists and insisted that a number of accusations were fabricated by the government. Now, attorneys for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development say the government's own documents provide evidence of that claim. In recent court filings, defense lawyers disclosed striking discrepancies between an official summary and the verbatim transcripts of an FBI-wiretapped conversation in 1996 involving Holy Land officials." The summaries contained anti-Semitic comments by Holy Land officials, but "none of those quotes was contained in a 13-page transcript of the conversation, defense lawyers said in their motion to expand access to classified evidence." The Times noted, "How the summary and transcript could be so different was unclear, though experts…theorized that its top-secret nature may have led some analysts to believe that the work product would never be publicly disclosed, much less entered into evidence in a trial."

Al Jazeera Cameraman Has Been Held At Guantanamo Since 2002. The Washington Times/AP (2/25, Fox) reports Sami al-Hajj, a cameraman for the Al Jazeera TV network, "was stopped at the Afghanistan border by Pakistani authorities in December 2001, turned over to U.S. forces and hauled in chains six months later to Guantanamo, where about 390 men are held on suspicion of links to al Qaeda or the Taliban. Mr. al-Hajj, a 38-year-old native of Sudan, has been held in this U.S. military prison ever since. He is believed to be the only journalist from a major international news organization held at Guantanamo."

Canadian Muslim Who Exposed Terror Cell Faces Ostracism. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Farley, 850K) profiles Mubin Shaikh, a 31-year-old Canadian-born Muslim "who disavowed the mosque to fit in with his neighborhood friends, then rejected that life to practice traditional Islam. Later, he used his stature in the Muslim community to infiltrate a suspected terrorist cell, and then helped expose it — an act that alienated him from many in his own circles. … The suspected cell's plan, prosecutors said in June, was to explode three truck bombs in front of Toronto police and intelligence headquarters and Parliament Hill, then take politicians hostage and behead them one by one. The group of 18 had acquired 3 tons of what it thought was explosive material when police moved in, authorities say." The Times adds, "Now he faces death threats, which he doesn't take seriously, and glares and cold shoulders in the mosque, which he does."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House Drill Imagines Simultaneous IED Attacks On US Cities. ABC World News (2/24, story 4, 2:25, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "At the White House today, a high level terror drill laid out a chilling scenario: Iraq-style IEDs exploding in cities around this country. About 90 officials studied how the federal government would respond if attackers used improvised explosive devices in several cities at once."

The Washington Post/AP (2/25, A9, Loven) reports, "Dozens of high-level officials joined in a White House drill yesterday to see how the government would respond if several cities were attacked simultaneously with bombs similar to those used against U.S. troops in Iraq. White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend and the Homeland Security Council that she heads mapped out in advance a massive disaster involving improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. The attack targeted 10 U.S. cities, both large and small, at the same time, said a senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity. … All Cabinet agencies were represented by their secretaries or other high-ranking officials, with about 90 participants in all, White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said. Stanzel said the drill revealed gaps in the government's ability to respond, but also showed that there have been many improvements since Hurricane Katrina." The Post adds that President Bush "went on a bike ride yesterday morning and did not take part in the test."

Real ID Proposal Expected To Encounter Bipartisan Opposition. The Washington Post (2/25, A8, Hsu, Fears, 690K) reports that "a sweeping federal law to tighten security requirements for driver's licenses is in jeopardy of unraveling after missteps by Congress and the Homeland Security Department, analysts and lawmakers said. While Washington has delayed implementing it, a rebellion against the program has grown. Privacy advocates say the effort could create a de facto national ID card. Meanwhile, state officials charge that complying with federal requirements will cost $11 billion and potentially double fees and waiting times for 245 million Americans whose licenses would have to be reissued starting next year." The White House "expects to release its driver's license plan, Real ID, this week and has warned congressional critics not to thwart or further delay a program that was recommended by the Sept. 11 commission." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, chairman of the homeland security panel, said Real ID "may not provide real security and that it is opposed by states 'because it is overly burdensome, possibly unworkable, and may actually increase a terrorist's ability to commit identity theft.'" Sen. Susan Collins, ranking Republican on the homeland security panel, and Rep. Tom Allen "are seeking to delay or repeal Real ID and let security experts, privacy advocates and the states renegotiate the rules."

Backscanner X-Ray Device Profiled. NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 5, 2:50, Costello, 9.87M) ran a feature on the Backscanner X-ray device being implemented at Phoenix's airport, concluding a profile of the new technology by saying, "Still on the drawing board: people portals that scan every passenger before they board a plane. Still no effective way to detect chemical weapons." The report is very similar to Friday's ABC World News report.

WAR NEWS:

Murtha Stumbles In Effort To Limit War Spending. Coverage of Rep. John Murtha's efforts to challenge funding for the Iraq war emphasized the bipartisan perception that he had blundered and undercut the Democrats' cause. The Washington Post (2/25, A5, Weisman, Layton, 690K) reports, "The plan was bold: By tying President Bush's $100 billion war request to strict standards of troop safety and readiness, Democrats believed they could grab hold of Iraq war policy ... But a botched launch" by Murtha "has united Republicans and divided Democrats, sending the latter back to the drawing board just a week before scheduled legislative action, a score of House Democratic lawmakers said last week. … The story of Murtha's star-crossed plan illustrates the Democratic Party's deep divisions over the Iraq war and how the new House majority has yet to establish firm control over Congress." When he "chose to roll out the details on a liberal, antiwar Web site on Feb. 15, he caught even Pelosi by surprise while infuriating Democrats from conservative districts. ... Republicans relentlessly attacked a plan they called a strategy to slowly bleed the war of troops and funds. By the end of the recess, Murtha's once promising strategy was in tatters."

The New York Times (2/25, A25, Toner, 1.16M) says Murtha "faces an extraordinary political challenge over the next month, and some Democrats are already worried about his handling of it."

Democrats Vow To Keep Pressure On Bush. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Simon, 850K) reports, "Senate Democrats are moving to modify the 2002 resolution that authorized the war to place new limits on the role of U.S. forces in Iraq. But it is uncertain whether they will fare any better in this effort than in their last try — an unsuccessful attempt to pass a symbolic resolution opposing the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq. ... Although the new Democratic efforts are aimed at turning up the political heat on Republicans, they could also make some Democrats uncomfortable. Those from conservative districts or states are fearful of taking a step that Republicans could portray as cutting funding to troops in harm's way or tying the commander in chief's hands in wartime."

Governors Warn Of Surge's Impact On National Guard. ABC World News (2/24, story 4, 2:25, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "The governors are meeting in Washington this weekend and have growing concerns about their own ability to respond to emergencies as their National Guard troops keep getting called back to Iraq." ABC (Crawford): "National Guard and reserve troops like these in Indiana are heading back to Iraq this weekend ... Their families will miss them. But so will their governors." Gov. Mike Easley: "National guard is hurting. And as a result of that, people are not as safe in the United States today as they were before this poorly planned operation started in Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Republican and Democratic governors meeting here Saturday warned that President Bush's 'surge' of additional troops to Iraq would put added pressure on National Guard units already stretched to their limits."

Army's 2-16 Battalion Prepares To Head Off To War. The Washington Post (2/25, A1, Finkel, 690K) reports from Fort Riley, Kansas, "Inside, as the bleachers filled and the doors swung closed against the cold, a 41-year-old soldier near the middle of the floor began clapping his hands in anticipation. ... This was Lt. Col. Ralph Kauzlarich, the commander of an Army battalion called the 2-16 -- the 2nd Battalion, 16th Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Brigade Combat Team, 1st Infantry Division. The unit has 800 soldiers, most in their late teens and deploying to Iraq for the first time under the command of a man who, in this gymnasium filled with believers, was among the biggest believers of all. ... So fiercely does Kauzlarich believe this -- that the war can be won and that it will be won -- it can seem as if he is the one grabbing onto something, in this case the idea that victory is a matter not only of strategy and tactics, but of sheer willpower as well."

More Commentary On Iraq. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/25, B3, 690K), former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Sarah Sewall writes that many of Gen. David Petraeus' "strongest supporters fear that his new assignment is a no-win mission, one that could not only stain his professional reputation but also, ironically, discredit the new counterinsurgency doctrine he spent the past year creating. … Placed in charge this late in the game, Petraeus should not have to carry the burden of Iraq's probable failure. Yet there is a silver lining in his appointment. Petraeus has the expertise to identify shortfalls and the likelihood of failure, and he has the credibility to force a political response."

In a pessimistic op-ed for the Washington Post (2/25, B1, 690K), British political scientist Toby Dodge writes that after crushing a 1920 Iraqi revolt, "it took Britain 10 more years to jettison its financial and military commitments to Iraq. … Here is what Britain's history of failure at building a democratic state in Iraq in the 1920s and '30s tells George W. Bush and his successors: If…they fail to deliver on the promises of a better future for the Iraqi people, then Iraq will continue as a font of violent instability long after those who made the promises have been buried."

In his Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) column, Gregory Rodriguez writes in favor of admitting Iraqi refugees, "Two weeks ago, the White House announced that the U.S. would accept up to 7,000 Iraqi refugees by the end of this year. It's an initial trickle; we should be receiving more. Not just because it's the humane thing to do but because it serves our interests. ... We know now that as U.S. influence expands throughout the world, the world's influence expands here at home. And accepting refugees can improve the nation's image overseas."

Suicide Bombing At Habbaniya Mosque Kills At Least 39. ABC World News (2/24, story 2, 2:50, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "At least 39 people were killed when a truck blew up outside a mosque in the heart of Sunni territory" in Iraq, and "suspicions are falling on other Sunnis. This attack may be a disturbing sign of a growing internal battle." ABC (Marquez): "What makes this bombing unique, it happened in Sunni territory, al Anbar province, where Sunnis are supposed to be safe and Al Qaeda is powerful. Residents say the mosque imam had recently been critical of Al Qaeda."

The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 4, 2:30, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "A fuel tanker rigged with bombs exploded near a Sunni mosque in western Anbar Providence today, killing at least 39 people." NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 2, 2:05, Arraf, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight west of the capital in the town of Habbaniyah, a huge truck exploded killing 37 people and wounding at least 60. Although Baghdad has been relatively calm, at least nine Iraqis were killed in bombings today."

The New York Times (2/25, A6, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, "The blast, which struck during a prayer service in Habbaniya, a town between Falluja and Ramadi in one of the most dangerous areas of Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, was unusual in that such bombings are a staple of Sunni insurgents." The Washington Post (2/25, A18, Londono, 690K) reports, "Witnesses said that unlike other large attacks, this one did not appear to have been driven by sectarian rivalries -- Shiite militias are not known to be active in the area -- but rather was probably carried out as a warning from Sunni extremists to Sunnis who support the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

The Washington Times/AP (2/25, A1, Murphy) reports, "U.S. military envoys and pro-government leaders have worked hard to sway clan chiefs and other influential Anbar figures to turn against the militants, who include foreign jihadists fighting under the banner of al Qaeda in Iraq. The extremists have fought back with targeted killings and bombings against fellow Sunnis." The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Berthelsen, Daragahi, 850K) calls the bombing "highly unusual," since "police and residents in the Sunni Muslim-dominated area said the people had largely aligned against Al Qaeda militants operating in the region."

War Continues To Simmer Beyond Baghdad. The New York Times (2/25, WK4, Santora, 1.16M) reports from Samarra, "Events in Baghdad have dominated the news as American troops move aggressively to quell the sectarian violence that has set Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods at war with each other. But a visit to this restive city is a reminder not only of the many fronts of the war, but also of its many complexities. While sectarian warfare dominates Baghdad…a different dynamic is at work" in Sunni cities, where militants "continue to wage war on Americans and terrorize the civilian population into submission."

Hakim Says Arrest Calls US Authority Into Question. ABC World News (2/24, story 2, 2:50, Marquez, 8.78M) reported, "Demonstrations erupted in Shiite towns throughout Iraq after US troops" arrested Ammar Hakim, who "tells ABC News his arrest calls into question US authority here." The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 3, 2:40, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "About 8,000 Shiites demonstrated in their holy city of Najaf after yesterday's detention by US troops, of the son of Iraq's most influential Shiite leader." NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 2, 2:05, Arraf, 9.87M) said the detention "was particularly unfortunate because his father is a key US ally. He visited the White House last year."

The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Berthelsen, 850K) reports Ammar Hakim "lashed out at the United States in an incendiary televised appearance Saturday. … The incident has the potential to undermine relations between Iraq's majority Shiites and the U.S. forces that toppled their Sunni oppressors." The New York Times (2/25, A6, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, "President Jalal Talabani, whose Kurdish political coalition is the primary governing partner of the dominant Shiite coalition headed by the elder Mr. Hakim, released a statement sharply criticizing the detention and demanding that American commanders hold accountable soldiers who he said had mistreated Mr. Hakim."

The Washington Post (2/25, A18, Londono, 690K) reports, "Talabani said Hakim had 'received uncivil and inappropriate treatment' during his hours-long detention," while the Washington Times/AP (2/25, A1, Murphy) reports that Shiite-US "cooperation suddenly has been strained after U.S. military border guards stopped and searched the heir-apparent of the largest Shi'ite political group." CNN.com (2/24) reports, "The U.S. military on Saturday defended Ammar al-Hakim's arrest and detention, a day after the U.S. ambassador to Iraq apologized for it. The military's statement on Saturday did not include an apology."

Sadr's Motives For Reigning In Militia Questioned. The New York Times (2/25, Cave, 1.16M) analyzes Moqtada al-Sadr's decision to "reign in" his Mahdi Militia. "But did he do so as part of his cooperation with the new security plan for Baghdad, which aims to quell the sectarian violence tormenting the city? Because his men had been disloyal, taking orders from Iran, whose support he values but whose control he fights? Or was it just for show — the act of an image-conscious leader who grasped the risk of graphic videos and wanted to stave off direct American action against him?" The Times calls Sadr "the great destabilizer in Iraq since 2003," saying he is "wielding power on the streets and in the ruling Shiite bloc, thwarting the Americans and playing out at least a temporary alliance with Iran." Sadr "now finds himself under pressure from several sources," including "his popular Shiite base," Iran, "renegade factions of his own militia that resent his move into the political mainstream," and US forces.

Iraqi Kurdish Leaders Approve Oil Law. The Washington Post (2/25, A18, Londono, 690K) reports, "Leaders of Iraq's oil-rich Kurdish region have apparently approved a draft oil law that will be presented to Iraqi lawmakers in coming weeks, an eagerly awaited breakthrough that is expected to professionalize and expand drilling in the country." The Post cites AP reporting that President Jalal Talabani and US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad attended the announcement ceremony in Sulaymaniyah. The Post says "Iraqi officials in recent weeks have been struggling to reach an agreement on legislation that would govern the exploitation of the country's vast oil reserves and who should control the revenue."

Iraqi Firefighters Show Heroism. The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 4, 2:30, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "When bombs explode in Baghdad -- and they do almost every day -- the city's bravest risk their own lives to be first on the scene." CBS (Palmer): "A new set of heroes has been forged inside Baghdad's desperation -- 24/7 calls flood into the emergency center which coordinates the city's firefighters, striving to be 100 percent reliable in a city where little else is.

… There's no room here for ethnic tension. In fact, it's tolerance, and even a morning workout, that make Baghdad's bravest a close-knit team."

Hometown Rallies Around Soldier Accused Of Murdering Iraqis. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Zucchino, 850K) reports that the "conservative community" of Sweetwater, Tennessee, "where American flags fly on porches and many residents are veterans, now finds itself at odds with the military." Staff Sgt. Raymond Girouard, a native, has been charged by the Army "with ordering the slayings of three Iraqi detainees in May, then orchestrating a coverup. ... Many here say the Army has betrayed a young patriot who volunteered to fight for his country."

Administrative Problems Seen At Walter Reed. NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 3, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "One week after we reported on the appalling conditions for Army outpatients at the Walter Reed Medical Center, tonight another story of bureaucratic delays that are preventing some wounded veterans home from Iraq and Afghanistan from getting the disability benefits they deserve." NBC (Yang): "Army Sgt. David Yancy was a gunner on a Humvee that hit a bomb south of Baghdad in March of 2005." He has been at Walter Reed for two years, and "now he is fighting a new battle for disability benefits." Yancy: "This is something I wasn't expecting, fighting through the system. I'm not giving up."

NBC Nightly News (2/24, story 4, 2:45, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) followed up by reporting that "it has been a week of hurried repair work, painting and damage control. Even the Defense Secretary showed up for a firsthand look. … Have they fixed all the problems in Building 18?" Washington Post reporter Dana Priest: "Not all of them. They've done the easy fixes." Seigenthaler: "What do you make of government's quick response here?" Priest: "The Army and the Administration really faced an uproar from the public. ... There was a revolt ongoing within their own ranks of retired generals and veterans groups; traditional supporters were clamoring for action. So on Thursday, you saw the vice chief of the Army send out a worldwide message to all generals." The Washington Post (2/25, A9, Vogel, 690K) says the "preliminary findings of a nine-month Army investigation confirm problems in the administrative procedures" at Walter Reed "and other hospitals, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey has ordered the service to begin fixing them, a spokesman said yesterday."

Injured Veteran Fights For Favorable Disability Rating. The Washington Post Magazine (2/25, Span) reports in a highly critical cover article nearing 8,000 words, "Since he was thrown from a moving armored vehicle in Baghdad in May 2003, and landed on his head," ex-Army Cpl. Richard Twohig "says he has suffered from near-constant headaches." While few subjects animate him now, "One subject prompts a more animated response, though, rousing him to noticeable anger: the U.S. Army. ... Twohig has been grappling with a complicated disability system that determines whether he merits military retirement. Thousands of other soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines are dealing with the same process. With U.S. troops still in Afghanistan and the war in Iraq entering its fourth year, the annual caseload of troops injured severely enough to be considered for retirement has climbed nearly 53 percent since 2001, to about 23,000 a year. The great majority don't get it, which has made the disability system the object of confusion, apprehension and suspicion among injured veterans and their advocates."

Servicemen "Entwined By War" Strive To Recover From Injuries. The New York Times (2/25, A16, Chivers, 1.16M) reports that "Petty Officer Third Class Dustin E. Kirby, a Navy corpsman whose efforts to save a wounded marine in Iraq and his own wounding by a sniper on Christmas were covered by The New York Times, has returned home to Georgia and expects a nearly full recovery, he and his family said. ... In early November he was the subject of an article that described his work and prayers to save the life of his friend, Lance Cpl. Colin Smith, a machine gunner in the vehicle's turret who was shot through the skull by a sniper in Karma in late October." Kirby "said he intended to return to active duty when his doctors allow," while Smith was more severely injured: "It was not clear how fully Lance Corporal Smith would recover his ability to converse. Similarly, he has extremely limited movement on the right side of his body."

Military Could Lack Needed Resources As Global Challenges Increase. The New York Times (2/25, WK1, Shanker, 1.16M) writes about US deployments of F-22s and an aircraft carrier against North Korea and Iran, "These moves seemed like perfectly logical geopolitical responses to heightened dangers. But they also helped mask another reality. Because the military today does not have enough available ground troops to use for intimidation, the moves were pretty much the only options rather than choices among several. ... Senior military planners do not deny that last week's deployments reflect a deep concern in the Pentagon that the United States simply may not have enough ready and available resources to go around."

NYTimes Blames Iraq War For Resurgence Of Al Qaeda. The New York Times (2/25, WK13, 1.16M), inan editorial, writes, "At a crucial moment, the Bush administration diverted America's military strength, political attention and foreign aid dollars from a necessary, winnable war in Afghanistan to an unnecessary, and by now unwinnable, war in Iraq. Al Qaeda took full advantage of these blunders to survive and rebuild. Now it seems to be back in business. … Al Qaeda's comeback didn't have to happen. And it must not be allowed to continue. The new Qaeda sanctuaries in Pakistan do not operate with the blessing of the Pakistani government. But Pakistan's military dictator, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has not tried very hard to drive them out. In recent months he has virtually conceded the tribal areas to local leaders sympathetic to Al Qaeda. President Bush needs to warn him that continued American backing depends on his doing more to rid his country of people being trained to kill Americans."

Rich Looks Back At Warnings From 2001. The New York Times' Frank Rich (2/25, WK14) writes that in the summer of 2001, "intelligence and counterterrorism officials…were privately sounding urgent warnings like those in last week's Times, culminating in the President's Daily Brief titled 'Bin Laden Determined to Strike in U.S.' The system 'was blinking red,' as the C.I.A. chief George Tenet would later tell the 9/11 commission. But no one, from the White House on down, wanted to hear it. The White House doesn't want to hear it now, either. That's why terrorism experts are trying to get its attention by going public, and not just through The Times. Michael Scheuer, the former head of the C.I.A. bin Laden unit, told MSNBC's Keith Olbermann last week that the Taliban and Al Qaeda, having regrouped in Afghanistan and Pakistan, 'are going to detonate a nuclear device inside the United States.'"

Cockburn Denounces Rumsfeld's Job Performance. In the Washington Post (2/25, B2, 690K), Alexander Cockburn, author of the forthcoming "Rumsfeld: His Rise, Fall and Catastrophic Legacy," writes that even many of Donald Rumsfeld's detractors "tend to assume that he was an effective manager" at the Pentagon, but an "examination of his record reveals that, in fact, Rumsfeld was a very poor manager. Despite his gruff theatrics, he shirked the task of leadership at the Defense Department, failing to restrain the services in their pursuit of parochial agendas. Though he spewed ideas and injunctions daily, he routinely neglected to follow them up. Pledged to the 'transformation' of the cold war military establishment in 2001, he left it six years later almost entirely untransformed, save for the wreckage wrought by the Iraqi adventure. Even in concept, his program for 'transformation' amounted to little more than notions articulated as bumper stickers, and poorly thought out ones at that."

Evaluations Show Dismissed US Attorneys Were Highly Praised. The New York Times (2/25, Johnston) reports, "Internal Justice Department performance reports for six of the eight United States attorneys who have been dismissed in recent months rated them 'well regarded,' 'capable' or 'very competent,' a review of the evaluations shows." The Times continues, "The performance reviews, known as Evaluations and Review Staff Reports, show that the ousted prosecutors were routinely praised for playing a leadership role with other law enforcement agencies in their jurisdictions. … The reviews, each of them 6 to 12 pages long, were carried out by Justice Department officials from 2003 to 2006. Each report was based on extensive interviews, conducted over several days with judges, other federal law enforcement agencies and staff members in each office. … It had been known that the reports were mostly favorable, but the reports themselves had not been made public." The Times adds, "Over all, the evaluations, which were obtained from officials authorized to have them, appear to raise new questions about the rationale for the dismissals provided by senior Justice Department officials. The officials have repeatedly cited poor job performance to explain their decisions to oust the eight prosecutors, all of them Republicans appointed by President Bush in his first term. … On Saturday, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who has led a Congressional investigation into the dismissals and has been briefed on the evaluations, said the reports showed that new legislation was needed to keep the Justice Department from politically motivated firings. … 'As we feared, the comprehensive evaluations show these U.S. attorneys did not deserve to be fired,' Mr. Schumer said. 'To the contrary, they reveal they were effective, respected and set appropriate priorities.'" The Times notes, "In response, a senior Justice Department official said the reviews, which focused on management practices within each United States attorney's office, did not provide a broad or complete picture of the prosecutors' performance. … The official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the confidential nature of personnel information, said, 'The reviews don't take into account whether the U.S. attorneys carried out departmental priorities.' … Referring to the 94 United States attorney's districts, the official said, 'You can't have 94 different sets of priorities,' suggesting that the dismissed prosecutors had failed to follow priorities set by the Justice Department in Washington. … However, each case report included a statement that each of the ousted prosecutors had established strategic goals set by the Justice Department in high priority areas like counterterrorism, narcotics and gun violence."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

suspect timing of stock option awards at American public companies, corporate human resources executives are increasingly being caught in the gears of cases." The AP continues, "With stock options widely used as perks to attract talent, personnel staff regularly were brought into executives' machinations on options awards - often signing the relevant paperwork, such as memos to employees or letters making job offers. That means their fingerprints are on documents that can enter into the paper trails that prosecutors are using to build options-dating cases. … 'HR people have to be careful,' said John Gamble, a lawyer at Fisher & Phillips, an Atlanta firm specializing in labor and employment law. 'Sometimes they get assignments that they need to think twice about.'" The AP adds, "Among the handful of executives who have been charged with fraud by federal prosecutors in the wave of options investigations is Stephanie Jensen, the former vice president for human resources at Brocade Communications Systems Inc. Jensen and Gregory L. Reyes, who was Brocade's chief executive, pleaded not guilty in August. … The Justice Department prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission allege that Reyes and Jensen regularly backdated minutes of board of directors' meetings so it appeared that the stock-options committee granted options on dates when Brocade's share price was relatively low. The two executives also are accused of having letters of job offers backdated so employees would receive options that were dated at low points in the company's share price that predated their first day of work." The AP notes, "E-mails uncovered in court records in the case of Mercury Interactive Corp., one of the first Silicon Valley companies to acknowledge stock options manipulation, show exchanges between a payroll manager named Susie Fregoso and company executives concerning dating of options. At one point in August 2000, according to an account of the e-mails in Tuesday's Wall Street Journal, Mercury's assistant controller told Fregoso the company will use the 'magic backdating ink' of Sharlene Abrams, a former chief financial officer."

Nacchio Attorney Laid Out Defense Strategy In Series Of Books. The Denver Post (2/25, Vuong, Griffin) reports, "Herbert Stern, Joe Nacchio's lead attorney, will come out firing in the criminal insider-trading trial of the former Qwest chief executive." The Post continues, "Stern will lay out his case early in his opening statement. He will move through his points quickly but will make sure the jury hears his most important material more than once. He'll 'hitchhike' - or extract helpful information from the prosecution's witnesses during cross-examination. … And during closing arguments, he'll try to teach his 'friends' - jurors who believe Nacchio is not guilty - how to argue against others in the jury room. … Stern offers those tips, and many others, in an eight-volume set of books titled 'Trying Cases to Win.' The first was published in 1991, the last in 2004." The Post adds, "Stephen A. Saltzburg, co-author of three of the books, said Stern will follow the framework outlined in his books. … 'He's going to do exactly what he writes that you should do,' said Saltzburg, a professor at George Washington University School of Law in Washington, D.C., who has known Stern for more than 25 years." The Post adds, "Nacchio's trial is set to begin March 19 in U.S. District Court in Denver. If convicted, he faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine on each of the 42 counts of illegal insider trading. … Saltzburg said prosecutors would gain an advantage by reading Stern's books before the trial. … 'It's always a good idea to read what your adversary has written,' he said. 'It's kind of like having tried a case against somebody who you've known before. You have an idea how they approach litigation.'" The Post notes, "Department of Justice spokesman Jeff Dorschner declined comment when asked whether any of the attorneys on the Nacchio case has read Stern's books."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Iowa Prison Ruling May Decide Future Of Faith-Based Initiatives. The Washington Post (2/25, A13, Slevin, 690K) reports on a faith-based prison program in Iowa "rooted in evangelical Christianity and supported by more than $1.5 million in public funds. … A key question is its constitutionality. A trio of appellate judges, including former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, is reviewing a lower court's decision that the program violates the separation of church and state. People on both sides of the dispute say the outcome could influence the future of President Bush's faith-based initiative, which links government and religious institutions in efforts to solve social problems. 'This puts into jeopardy not just faith-based nonprofits in a prison setting,' said Mark Earley, president of Virginia-based Prison Fellowship Ministries, whose affiliate, the InnerChange Freedom Initiative, runs the Iowa program. 'I think you'd see a precipitous drop in the number of faith-based organizations willing to provide services to governments.'"

Faith-Based Initiative Faces First SCOTUS Challenge Next Week. The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 8, 2:50, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "One of President Bush's earliest initiatives faces a challenge next week in the US Supreme Court. At issue is federal support for faith-based social programs. … In 2006, a lower court said the Freedom From Religion Foundation… had legal standing as taxpayers to challenge the White House practice of spending money" on faith-based conferences, arguing that "the funding of the conferences is unconstitutional, violating the separation between church and state. The President has insisted the programs are on the correct side of that wall and that that they work. … This is the first Supreme Court case directly related to the President's faith-based initiative. It's scheduled to be heard this Wednesday."

New York Inmate Willing To Lose Fingers To Secure Evidence. The New York Times (2/25, Barry) reports, "On a September afternoon in 2005, with a prison guard standing beside the operating table and another outside the door, a surgeon cut into the left hand of inmate No. 99A2254." The Times continues, "The doctor was trying to find fragments of a bullet among the tiny veins and ligaments of Napoleon Cardenas's middle finger. Mr. Cardenas had been warned that removing them could cause nerve damage. Another surgeon had balked at performing the operation, saying it could violate the Hippocratic oath. … But Mr. Cardenas did not care. He was convinced that under the pale scars lay evidence that would topple two convictions in a 1994 jewel heist: his and his younger brother's. Between them, they had already served 14 years in prison for the crime. Cut off my fingers if you need to, he said." The Times adds, "Mr. Cardenas's lawyers waited anxiously outside as the surgeon, using forceps, removed two pieces of metal. The results would not, in themselves, convince the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, that the brothers were innocent. But Mr. Brown's investigator was impressed by Mr. Cardenas's eagerness to have the operation. That and a growing pile of new evidence were enough to prompt the district attorney's office to start its own yearlong investigation. … On Jan. 18, Mr. Brown asked a judge to vacate the convictions of Napoleon Cardenas and his brother Carlos in the jewel heist. In a statement, Mr. Brown said his prosecutors were 'always prepared to take a hard look at a case — even post-conviction — to make certain that justice has been done.' … Steven Silberblatt, one of half a dozen Legal Aid Society lawyers who worked to overturn the Cardenas brothers' convictions, put it this way: 'Sometimes circumstances provide their own lie-detector test. When someone is willing to lose the use of his hand, you get the feeling they're probably telling the truth.'"

CIVIL LAW:

Judge To Hear Closing Arguments In Wrongful Imprisonment Suit Tuesday. The Boston Globe (2/25, Murphy) reported "life changed dramatically" for the families of Edward Greco, Joseph Salvati, Peter J. Limone and Henry Tameleo, who were convicted of murder "in state court while FBI documents that might have helped prove their innocence remained buried in the bureau's files. … On Tuesday, a federal judge will hear final arguments in a civil suit seeking more than $100 million in damages from the government." US District Judge Nancy Gertner "is expected to rule next month on whether the FBI is liable for failing to disclose documents during the 1968 trial that indicate the men were framed, and if so, how much the government should pay the men and their families." The Globe notes, "The civil case is being closely watched in Boston. … The case caps a decade of investigation into the FBI's mishandling of informants in Boston while zealously pursuing the Mafia."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Religious Freedom Initiative Sparks Debate. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (2/25, Banks) reports, "The Department of Justice has launched a "First Freedom Project" to draw more attention to protecting the religious liberties of Americans. … 'Why should it be permissible for an employee standing around the water cooler to declare that "Tiger Woods is God," but a firing offense for him to say, "Jesus is Lord,"?" Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday at a meeting of the executive committee of the Southern Baptist Convention in Nashville, Tenn. … 'These are the kinds of contradictions we are trying to address.'" The Plain Dealer continues, "The initiative includes a new Web site (www.firstfreedom.gov), an education program and a task force that will review religious freedom policies and cases. … Leaders of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, Family Research Council and Southern Baptist Ethics & Religious Liberty Commission applauded the initiative. … The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said it was a hypocritical action by an administration that he said has tried to merge church and state." The Plain Dealer notes, "The Rev. Bob Edgar, general secretary of the National Council of Churches, welcomed the renewed focus on religious freedom but questioned why it was announced at a gathering of a single denomination. He invited Gonzales to present the project to the March meeting of the council's Committee on Religious Liberty, and suggested it also should be presented to Muslim groups. … A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to respond specifically to Edgar's criticism, but said, 'I believe he [Gonzales] intends to talk about this to other groups.'"

Bias Claims Emerge From DePauw University Sorority Evictions. The New York Times (2/25, Dillon) reports from Greencastle, IN, "When a psychology professor at DePauw University here surveyed students, they described one sorority as a group of 'daddy's little princesses' and another as 'offbeat hippies.' The sisters of Delta Zeta were seen as 'socially awkward.' … Worried that a negative stereotype of the sorority was contributing to a decline in membership that had left its Greek-columned house here half empty, Delta Zeta's national officers interviewed 35 DePauw members in November, quizzing them about their dedication to recruitment. They judged 23 of the women insufficiently committed and later told them to vacate the sorority house." The Times continues, "The 23 members included every woman who was overweight. They also included the only black, Korean and Vietnamese members. The dozen students allowed to stay were slender and popular with fraternity men — conventionally pretty women the sorority hoped could attract new recruits. Six of the 12 were so infuriated they quit. … 'Virtually everyone who didn't fit a certain sorority member archetype was told to leave,' said Kate Holloway, a senior who withdrew from the chapter during its reorganization. … 'I sensed the disrespect with which this was to be carried out and got fed up,' Ms. Holloway added. 'I didn't have room in my life for these women to come in and tell my sisters of three years that they weren't needed.'" The Times notes, "Ms. Holloway is not the only angry one. The reorganization has left a messy aftermath of recrimination and tears on this rural campus of 2,400 students, 50 miles southwest of Indianapolis. … The mass eviction battered the self-esteem of many of the former sorority members, and some withdrew from classes in depression. There have been student protests, outraged letters from alumni and parents, and a faculty petition calling the sorority's action unethical. … DePauw's president, Robert G. Bottoms, issued a two-page letter of reprimand to the sorority. In an interview in his office, Dr. Bottoms said he had been stunned by the sorority's insensitivity."

New York Fire Department Sees Increase In Minority Applications. The New York Daily News (2/25, Lemire) reports, "More than 4,500 more minority applicants took the FDNY written entrance exam this year than in 2002, giving fire officials hope that a multimillion-dollar campaign to start diversifying the department will end in success." The News continues, "Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta believes the jump from 3,730 to 8,297 minority candidates proves the department is making progress. … 'All the hard work we put into this campaign has paid off,' said Scoppetta. 'We hope once we begin hiring from this list next year, we'll have the most diverse group of candidates joining the world's greatest fire department.' …. But critics warned the promising numbers would be rendered meaningless if the minority applicants weren't hired." The News adds, "The FDNY recruits new members only once every four years and the department's hiring process has been closely scrutinized by Justice Department investigators. Currently, the department is 91% white. … The written test was offered at several sites across the five boroughs on Jan. 20 and 21,549 applicants sat down to take the several-hour exam, officials told the Daily News. … Of those candidates, 38.5% identified themselves as being black, Hispanic, Asian or Native American, officials said. This marks a significant increase from 2002, when 21.5% of the 17,348 applicants deemed themselves persons of color. … Though the number of white candidates dropped slightly from 13,618 in 2002 to 13,252 in January, applications from minority groups rose across the board, officials said. … Most strikingly, the number of Hispanics jumped from 2,088 to 4,026 while the number of blacks rose from 1,357 to 3,776, the statistics show. The number of women who took the test also increased, rising to 814 from 549."

Pelosi Reportedly Vowed To Oppose California State Redistricting Reform. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Vogel, 850K) reports, "The new dynamic in Washington, with Californian Nancy Pelosi as House speaker, threatens to thwart an effort by state political leaders to overhaul the way voting districts are drawn. Fresh from their victories in the November election, Democrats in Congress don't want to risk their fragile majority. Many Republicans don't want their relatively safe seats threatened either. Their opposition promises to crimp an effort" by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez, and others to "change how California draws political boundaries every 10 years to accommodate population shifts. Nuñez said he thinks he will have to exempt Congress from legislation he is crafting to have California's political boundaries drawn by a nonpartisan panel, rather than by politically driven state lawmakers." Nuñez "said Pelosi didn't tell him directly that she would fight a redistricting initiative if it included Congress. He said he 'heard it from many other people' that she and other members of Congress would campaign to kill it."

TXU To Abandon Plans For New Coal Plants. The New York Times (2/25, Barringer, Sorkin) reports, "Under a proposed $45 billion buyout by a team of private equity firms, the TXU Corporation, a Texas utility that has long been the bane of environmental groups, will abandon plans to build 8 of 11 coal plants and commit to a broad menu of environmental measures, according to people involved in the negotiations." The Times continues, "The roster of commitments came through an unusual process in which the equity firms asked two prominent environmental groups what measures could be taken to win their support. The result is an about-face from the company's earlier approach to climate-change issues, and includes a goal of returning the carbon-dioxide emissions by TXU to 1990 levels by 2020. …

Environmental groups said yesterday that they had never known of a financial deal with such an ambitious built-in environmental component." The Times adds, "Two private equity firms, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group, have proposed to buy TXU in what would become the largest leveraged buyout ever. … The transaction will be put to the TXU board for a vote on Sunday." The Times notes, "People involved in the negotiations said that Goldman Sachs, an adviser and lender to the buyers, helped broker peace with environmental groups and sought their support for the transaction. Goldman Sachs has been one of the most aggressive firms on Wall Street about taking action on climate change; the company sends its bankers home at night in hybrid limousines. … For the investor groups, the effort was as much about making a sound business decision to ensure the deal's completion as it was about any environmental concerns. … By bringing the environmental groups into the process, the buyers may have helped avert years of costly litigation over emissions from their plants. But they may also have raised new questions about how they will meet the energy needs that TXU intended to address by building all 11 plants; the company is said to be examining ways to expand in cleaner forms of energy. None of the parties interviewed was able to provide details."

BAR/BRI Class Action Settlement Rankles Some. The New York Times (2/25, Glater) reports, "Competitors say that a leading company ripped down their posters and used deceptive marketing tactics; former customers say that the same company paid business rivals to close their doors. And one competitor says he fears that he was the victim of outright theft." The Times continues, "This is how the business of training aspiring lawyers to pass the bar exam is conducted, according to documents and testimony that have surfaced as a result of a federal lawsuit in Los Angeles. It is a business dominated by a single company that expanded, depending on whom you believe, either by squashing its competitors or by simply offering a superior product. … That company is BAR/BRI. And students who took its courses filed a class-action lawsuit two years ago contending that the company operated an illegal monopoly and overcharged them by about $1,000 each. The students, seeking hundreds of millions of dollars in damages, also said that BAR/BRI cut illegal deals with potential competitors to protect its market. But earlier this month, lawyers in the case reached a tentative settlement agreement for $49 million, which could net each student in the class about $125." The Times adds, "The deal, which still requires court approval, has infuriated some of the original plaintiffs in the case, who harbored such anger against BAR/BRI that they wanted to see the company broken up. BAR/BRI is a unit of the Thomson Corporation, the large information services concern, and Thomson says the accusations in the lawsuit against BAR/BRI involve activities that occurred before it bought the company in 2001. BAR/BRI's lawyers say the company has done nothing wrong and that the students' claims are meritless." The Times notes, "It is hard to gauge the strength of the case against BAR/BRI, because many of the filings are sealed — at the request of the defendants, the plaintiffs' lawyers say. But depositions and other court documents that have become publicly available during the course of the litigation have been laced with accusations that BAR/BRI engaged in unsavory conduct. Other claims that have emerged in the case also suggest just how petty and cutthroat the entire bar review market can be. … In a deposition for the Los Angeles case, one former competitor, Hugh Reed, contended that BAR/BRI representatives tore his company's posters off of law school walls; both he and James J. Rigos, a current competitor, contended that the company exaggerated its students' success rate on the bar exam. And Mr. Rigos said in court filings that he believed that his offices might have been repeatedly burglarized because he was a potential witness in the Los Angeles antitrust litigation. … Lawyers for BAR/BRI have denied Mr. Rigos's accusations."

Merging Ohio Hospitals Downplay Antitrust Concerns. The Cincinnati Enquirer (2/25, O'farrell) reports, "The president and CEO of St. Elizabeth Medical Center doesn't see much potential for anti-trust concerns to block a proposed merger with St. Luke Hospital." The Enquirer continues, "While the proposed merger, announced Thursday, would consolidate Northern Kentucky's hospitals - one each in Covington, Edgewood and Grant County under the St. Elizabeth flag, plus two in Florence and Fort Thomas under St. Luke - consumers and insurers would still have plenty of providers to choose from, said Joseph Gross. … 'There's an awful lot of competition here,' Gross said. 'It's a very large market.'" The Enquirer adds, "Administrators for the hospital groups have already taken a look at potential anti-trust issues, he said, and so far, the signs are positive. … 'We, and St. Luke's, are part of a larger Cincinnati health-care market, and many of the Cincinnati hospitals, the bigger ones, compete aggressively for Northern Kentucky patients,' Gross said. 'In the past three weeks, mailings from two Cincinnati hospitals competing for patients over here have been received throughout Northern Kentucky.' … Rick Laib, chairman of St. Luke's board of trustees, pointed out that 20 percent of consumers in Northern Kentucky already go outside the region - either to Greater Cincinnati or other Kentucky providers - for health." The Enquirer notes, "In announcing their intention to merge, officials from the two hospitals pledged to keep all five facilities open and continue all current services. … The announcement is just the latest in an ongoing shake-up in health care in the region."

House Antitrust Task Force To Look At Satellite Radio Merger This Week. The New York Times (2/25, Austen) reports, "If the plan to merge XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio is approved, one result may be less music and less talk radio beamed into cars around the country. … The reasons for that, however, will have nothing to do with regulators." The Times continues, "Washington will take its first look at the proposed merger on Wednesday when the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed antitrust task force meets. Besides the scrutiny of the proposed combination, the satellite radio business is facing huge changes. … The first phase of the business — beaming dedicated music, sports and talk-radio stars like Howard Stern and Opie and Anthony directly to consumers — has not proved to have a clear advantage over old technology like free radio and newer ones like the iPod. So now satellite companies are looking into what other services they can offer to make them appealing to motorists. … 'The question they have to ask now is: what problems haven't been solved in the car?' said Michael Urlocker, a former wireless analyst with UBS Securities who is now the chief executive of The Disruption Group, a Toronto-based consulting company. 'The lack of customer sign-ups on a profitable basis should be a sign that trying to create a better iPod than Apple is a losing proposition.'" The Times adds, "Although XM and Sirius offer radio, in theory, the systems could be adapted to distribute any kind of data. And, indeed, both companies have made limited steps in that direction. Subscribers can already choose to have selected stock quotes, as well as news and sports headlines, beamed to the tiny screens on their receivers. … Both companies beam weather data to aviators and boaters through services that cost upwards of $50 a month. Later this year, XM will extend that by beaming weather information to a hand-held unit for hikers and hunters. … But Sirius has also made tentative steps toward offering video. At trade shows, Sirius has displayed prototype systems for sending video to back-seat displays like those now used by in-car DVD players. And the company recently, if vaguely, outlined plans to deliver some form of video programming aimed at children later this year."

Mexican Authorities Give Conditional Approval To Cable TV Deal. The AP (2/25) reports, "Mexico's antitrust agency said Sunday it has placed a series of conditions on media conglomerate Grupo Televisa in order for it to acquire a stake in Monterrey cable TV operator Television Internacional, or TVI." The AP continues, "The Federal Competition Commission, or CFC, said in a news release that among the conditions, Televisa would have to offer its broadcast channels on all pay TV systems in the country, and carry the broadcast signals of others on its pay TV systems." The AP adds, "Televisa sought antitrust clearance last year to acquire a 50 percent stake in TVI as the country's telecommunications companies repare for the implementation of 'triple play,' or the bundling of phone, Internet and television service on the same network."

Bloomberg (2/25, Arai) reports, "Televisa will be allowed to buy 50 percent of Television Internacional de Monterrey on the condition that it offers its free channels to all pay-TV providers nationwide, Mexico's Federal Competition Commission said in an e-mail today. Televisa, based in Mexico City, also must carry free channels from other companies, the commission said. … 'With this decision, Televisa cannot use its content as a mechanism to displace competitors,' said Eduardo Perez Motta, president of the Federal Competition Commission, on a conference call. 'This will create competition in this industry.'" Bloomberg adds, "The conditions are 'too tough' and Televisa will study what measures it can take, the company said in an e-mail today. A spokesman for Televisa in Mexico City declined to comment beyond the statement."

EU Antitrust Watchdog Gets Tough On Cartels, Microsoft. AFP (2/25) reports, "Shortly after taking office as Europe's top competition watchdog in November 2004, Neelie Kroes vowed in the face of detractors that she would not be the 'pussy cat' of big business. … Nearly half way through her five-year term, Kroes has silenced early criticism that she was too cuddly with the corporate world by not hesitating to bite business titans that squash their rivals." AFP continues, "Last Wednesday, the Dutch competition commissioner once again bared her teeth when she imposed the biggest fine ever in a EU cartel case by bringing an illegal club of lift makers crashing down with a penalty of 992 million euros (1.3 billion dollars). … In a typically hard-worded statement, she said the consumers would suffer from the effects of the 'outrageous' cartel for years and vowed that the 'the memory of this fine should last just as long' in the members' boardrooms." AFP adds, "The crushing fine was the latest move in a 'no-tolerance' crackdown on cartels that Kroes has made a top priority of her tenure during which she has built up a team of 60 regulators devoted to trustbusting. … It also came less than a month after she hit 10 companies with a fine of 750 million euros --- the third biggest ever imposed in a cartel case -- for fixing prices and carving up the market in power generating equipment. … After busting the power equipment club, Kroes stormed that she 'will not tolerate cartels in Europe and the damage that they do in any area of business.' … But Kroes has not only been busy fighting cartels as she has also repeatedly taken a hardline in the European Commission's long-standing battle against Microsoft."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Carter's Support For Energy Conservation Considered Far-Sighted. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/25, Chapman, 379K) reports thats president, Jimmy Carter "installed solar panels atop the White House. He championed coal and nuclear power. He taxed oil company profits. He created the U.S. Department of Energy. He introduced America to ethanol. Oil imports plummeted during the Carter administration. Renewable energy research skyrocketed. Cars got more miles per gallon of gas. Thermostats were lowered to 55 degrees at night. … The Bush administration has given 'no consideration that I've ever detected for taking any sort of substantive action that would correct our growing crisis of energy,' Carter said in an interview last week at his home in Plains. 'Even in Iraq, there's no indication of this administration's willingness to call for sacrifice, except among the families who have servicemen and women in Iraq.' Carter spoke an hour before groundbreaking in Plains for an alternative fuel factory that will turn soybean oil into biodiesel to help lessen America's dependence on imports and, in the process, clean the environment. He feels vindicated that energy policies he pushed 30 years before are now accepted as mainstream."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Restrict Coal-Fired Plants. The New York Times (2/25, WK13, 1.16M) editorializes, "Much of corporate America now appears to be out in front of the Bush administration in facing up to global warming. Some big players like Pacific Gas and Electric and DuPont seem seriously committed to mandatory controls on carbon dioxide emissions — in sharp contrast to the administration's voluntary approach. Others, notably big investment banks, are still doing what comes naturally: seizing opportunities, whether or not those opportunities fit their green posturing. … Barbara Boxer and Jeff Bingaman, the two senators who will have the most to say about climate change legislation, warned in a recent op-ed piece in The Dallas Morning News that companies like TXU that are racing to complete conventional coal-fired plants (nearly 150 are on the drawing board) will not be grandfathered under any new emissions law. Like any other company, they will be forced to meet their assigned carbon targets — which could be an expensive proposition."

Sea Creatures To Patrol Puget Sound For Navy. The Washington Post (2/25, A3, Harden, 690K) reports about Navy plans to deploy dolphins and sea lions around "Naval Base Kitsap-Bangor" in Puget Sound: "To bring its technology north, however, the Navy must finesse its way around climatological, legal and political obstacles. ... One judge ordered the Navy not to move the dolphins until it studied the health consequences. And public attitudes in the area toward the use of marine mammals for military purposes are downright icy."

Indian Reservations Worried About "Culture Of Violence." The Lompoc (CA) Record (2/25, Curtis) reports from Manchester-Point Arena Rancheria, CA, "Marcos Escareno's neighbors say he was raised amid a culture of violence on this tiny American Indian reservation. And residents say the disportionate number of shootings, stabbings and other incidents often go unreported because of a mistrust of law enforcement and a fear of retribution. … At 14, Escareno is the youngest person ever charged as an adult with murder in Mendocino County after he allegedly pointed a hunting rifle into a van window on Feb. 6 and shot Enoc Cruz Salgado, his sister's 21-year-old boyfriend. He has not entered a plea and is being held on $550,000 bail." The Record continues, "Some of the roughly 250 people who make up the Manchester-Point Arena band of Pomo Indians say it was merely an extreme example of the violence that has plagued their tribe. Tribal Chairman Nelson Pinola blames drug and alcohol abuse, combined with a lack of social services on the rugged North Coast where the rancheria is located. … 'How do you fix that?' said Pinola, a sheriff's lieutenant in neighboring Sonoma County. 'If we could fix it on a reservation, I'd sure like to copyright it.'" The Record adds, "Although the shooting death of Cruz Salgado was the first homicide at Manchester-Point Arena since 1992, the earliest year for which records were available, violent crimes such as assault, battery, child abuse and shootings occurred here at a higher rate than in the surrounding county. … On the rancheria, the rate of violent crime was about 26 per 100 residents between 2001 and 2006 _ 2 1/2 times that of the surrounding county, where the violent crime rate was 10.3 per 100 people, according to records from the Mendocino sheriff's office, whose jurisdiction excludes the county seat of Ukiah." The Record notes, "Nationally, American Indians experienced a per capita rate of violent crime twice that of the U.S. population as a whole, according to a 2004 report from the U.S. Department of Justice. … Despite the high crime rate, residents insist violence on the reservation is underreported because of suspicion of outsiders, fear of reprisal attacks and concerns about alienating themselves in the community."

All On Air Force Two "Fine" After Problem. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) reports Vice President Dick Cheney's "plane from Sydney headed for Singapore today, with the White House saying it was a scheduled refueling stop and that Air Force Two had not been diverted." Australian Prime Minister John Howard earlier said "the plane was being diverted to Singapore because of unspecified problems. White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said there was a problem with a generator but it posed no safety threats and the aircraft and everyone on board were fine."

Cheney Says His Job Is To Help Bush "Be The Best President He Can Be." AFP (2/25) notes the conclusion of Cheney's trip to Japan and Australia. ABC World News (2/24, story 3, 2:20, Muir, 8.78M) also reported on the conclusion of Cheney's Australia trip, running more of Jonathan Karl's interview with the Vice President. Cheney said, "I'm not running for office. I'm not worried about what the folks in Iowa are going to say in January of next year. I'm there to do a job, that's to call them as I see them, to help the President the best of my ability, be the best president he can be to address the issues of the day."

Governors Urge Bush, Congress To Address CHIP Shortfalls. The New York Times (2/25, A19, Pear, 1.16M) reports that at the National Governors Association began its winter meeting, 13 governors "expressed alarm…that they were about to run out of federal money for" the "popular" State Children's Health Insurance Program. The governors, including seven Republicans, "appealed to Congress and the Bush administration for swift action to protect hundreds of thousands of children who could lose benefits. The full association is poised to endorse that appeal. In a letter to the Democratic and Republican leaders of Congress, the 13 governors said that 'health insurance for some of our states' most vulnerable citizens is in jeopardy.' 'Without quick Congressional action,' the letter said, 'our states, all facing federal shortfalls, will be forced to make harsh decisions affecting the lives of thousands of families.' Such decisions could include freezing enrollment, restricting eligibility, increasing premiums charged to low-income families or reducing benefits like dental and vision care."

OTHER NEWS:

Citizenship Application Spike Attributed To Congressional Debate. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, A1, Gorman, Delson, 850K) reports, "Citizenship applications are skyrocketing in Southern California and across the nation, as green card holders rush to avoid a proposed fee increase, a revised civics test and possible changes in immigration law. Applications filed in Los Angeles and six surrounding counties shot up to 18,024 in January from 7,334 in the same month last year, a 146% increase, according to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. Nationwide, the number hit 95,622, up from 53,390, a 79% increase. … The filings are expected to continue as Congress prepares to restart the debate on immigration reform. 'Every time we have this much talk of immigration in the news and on the Hill, we get a lot more interest,' said CIS spokeswoman Marie Sebrechts. 'We tend to see a surge in applications.' After last year's marches, immigrant rights advocates launched a campaign to produce 1 million new citizens and registered voters. They fell far short of their goal by the November election, but advocates said they were pleased with the number of immigrants who are applying for naturalization."

Bill Gates Says Congress Ought To Increase H-1B Visa Availability. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/25, B7, 690K), Microsoft's Bill Gates writes that if the US is "to remain competitive, we need a workforce that consists of the world's brightest minds. … We must also make it easier for foreign-born scientists and engineers to work for U.S. companies. … This issue has reached a crisis point. Computer science employment is growing by nearly 100,000 jobs annually. But at the same time studies show that there is a dramatic decline in the number of students graduating with computer science degrees. The United States provides 65,000 temporary H-1B visas each year to make up this shortfall -- not nearly enough to fill open technical positions. Permanent residency regulations compound this problem. … Last year, reform on this issue stalled as Congress struggled to address border security and undocumented immigration. As lawmakers grapple with those important issues once again, I urge them to support changes to the H-1B visa program that allow American businesses to hire foreign-born scientists and engineers when they can't find the homegrown talent they need."

"Great Anxiety" Among Christian Conservatives Over 2008 GOP Field. On its front page, the New York Times (2/25, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports that a "group of influential Christian conservatives and their allies emerged from a private meeting at a Florida resort this month dissatisfied with the Republican presidential field and uncertain where to turn." The Council for National Policy, "a secretive club whose few hundred members" include James Dobson, Jerry Falwell, and Grover Norquist, "risks relegation to the margins" with the end of the George W. Bush presidency, and "many of the conservatives who attended the event…said they were dismayed at the absence of a champion to carry their banner in the next election." While Sen. Sam Brownback, Mike Huckabee, and Rep. Duncan Hunter each had supporters at the meeting, "many conservatives expressed concerns about whether any of the candidates could unify their movement or raise enough money to overtake the front-runners, several participants in the meetings said." Paul Weyrich of the Free Congress

Foundation said, "There is great anxiety. There is no outstanding conservative, and they are all looking for that."

Romney Acknowledges Misstating Bush's Past Stance On Abortion. The Politico (2/24, Allen) reports Mitt Romney "said this week that President Bush 'was pro-choice before he became pro-life,' an assertion the Romney campaign now acknowledges was inaccurate. The remark was based on a magazine article Romney had read, his campaign said." The White House said Bush "has always been 'pro-life.' During the presidential race of 2000, Dan Bartlett -- then a spokesman for the Bush campaign, now the White House counselor -- was asked about a quotation from a Texas newspaper in 1978 suggesting Bush's position had been unclear. Bartlett told The Washington Post: 'The governor was pro-life before he ran for Congress, during his run for Congress and after he ran for Congress.' A White House official said Friday that Bartlett's quote is still accurate today."

Polygamy A Part Of Romney Family's Past. The AP (2/24, Dobner, Johnson) writes that while Romney "condemns polygamy and its prior practice by his Mormon church, the Republican presidential candidate's great-grandfather had five wives and at least one of his great-great grandfathers had 12. Polygamy was not just a historical footnote, but a prominent element" in the Romney family tree.

McCain Campaigns In San Diego. ABC World News (2/24, story 5, :15, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "On the campaign trail today, Arizona Sen. John McCain was in San Diego, courting California Republicans."

Clinton Camp Warns Democrats Against Raising Ex-President's Impeachment. The Washington Post (2/25, A4, Kornblut, 690K) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "has a new commandment for the 2008 presidential field: Thou shalt not mention anything related to the impeachment of her husband. With a swift response to attacks from a former supporter last week," the Clinton team "offered a glimpse of their strategy for handling one of the most awkward chapters of her biography. They declared her husband's impeachment in 1998 -- or, more accurately, the embarrassing personal behavior that led to it -- taboo, putting her rivals on notice and all but daring other Democrats to mention the ordeal again. 'In the end, voters will decide what's off-limits, but I can't imagine that the public will reward the politics of personal destruction,' senior Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Friday, when asked whether the impeachment is fair game for Clinton's opponents. Earlier in the week, Wolfson dismissed references to President Bill Clinton's conduct as 'under the belt.' But the reality, of course, is that the impeachment was conducted very much in public." While Sen. Clinton "has spent the past seven years establishing her own identity as a public servant, Clinton has been embracing the more popular aspects of her husband's presidency more widely as she mounts her own campaign, with frequent references to their time together in the White House and their joint legacy. And as she has invoked the good Bill Clinton, she has risked invoking the bad, several Democratic strategists said."

Chait Says Conservatives "Spooked By The Clintons." In his Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes, "It is an odd article of faith among conservatives that Hillary Clinton is a sure-fire lock to win" the Democratic nomination. This belief "says more about them than it does about her. The belief in her invincibility is a product of their deepest fears. After all, it's not as though conservatives think that Clinton is a brilliant, natural politician. Nobody does. … When they try to talk about why Clinton inevitably will roll over her primary competition, they usually invoke the dreaded 'Clinton machine.' … Is the idea that Clinton's team is so battle-tested from her husband's presidency that it knows how to play the game far better than the competition? It's a plausible theory, but so far it doesn't seem to be working out that way. … Clinton looks extremely vulnerable. Why do so many conservatives insist that she's a lock to get the nomination? A few of them have a strong vested interest in the Hillary Clinton boogeyman." But the "bigger factor, I think, is that conservatives are spooked by the Clintons."

WPost Says Clinton Should Release Names Of Bundlers. The Washington Post (2/25, B6, 690K) editorializes that with John Edwards and Rudy Giuliani joining the list of presidential candidates vowing to "release voluntarily the identities of their big bundlers and, within some range, the amounts they raised," one "prominent figure" remains "absent from this picture: Hillary Rodham Clinton. … To ask for this information is not to suggest malfeasance or corruption on the part of Ms. Clinton's campaign or any other. It is simply to reassert the fundamental premise of campaign finance disclosure: that it is essential to a healthy, transparent system to know the identities of those underwriting political candidates."

Edwards Talks Health Care In New Hampshire. ABC World News (2/24, story 5, :15, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "In New Hampshire, former vice presidential nominee John Edwards talked to fellow Democrats about health care." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/25, Devine) reports "more than a hundred supporters packed the home and living room" of a house in Salem to hear Edwards discuss his plan for universal health care. Edwards said, "Universal health care is not cheap. I'm not saying it isn't. But I think it's critical for America to remain strong in the long run." The Nashua Telegraph (2/25, Landrigan) says Edwards "is the only major candidate to present a comprehensive plan that requires employers to offer coverage or pay into an insurance fund."

"Rock Star" Gore Could Take Home Oscar Tonight. The Washington Post (2/25, Booth, 690K) runs a front-page feature headlined "Al Gore, Rock Star," with the sub-headline "Oscar Hopeful May Be America's Coolest Ex-Vice President Ever." The Post writes, "In the annals of vice presidential history, tonight will be something different. In his black tux, the man known to his most fervent fans as 'The Goracle' will arrive by hybrid eco-limo and, surrounded by fellow Hollywood greenies Cameron Diaz and Leonardo DiCaprio, will stroll down the red carpet at the Academy Awards to answer the immortal question: 'Al, who are you wearing?'" Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth," the "100-minute movie that is essentially Gore giving a slide show about global warming, is the third-highest-grossing documentary ever," and is "also the hot pick tonight for Best Documentary, and if its director, Davis Guggenheim, wins an Oscar, he plans to bring Gore along with him to the stage to accept the golden statuette and perhaps say a few words. … Incredible as it may seem," Gore is "geek-chic cool. No velvet rope can stop him."

Helena Andrews writes in The Politico (2/24) that if Gore wins, "that means an acceptance speech – and let's face it, Gore's no Billy Crystal. So before Al uncrumples and reads from a dinner napkin outlining a dissertation on climate change, a few of Washington's funniest phrase-turners offer this prudent advice: Keep it short, keep it light and keep 'em laughing. Given the enormous spotlight, Gore could have more at stake than just bombing before the crowd of Prius-driving, energy-saving-bulb-using, Versace-swathed starlets in Hollywood. After all, he hasn't completely ruled out a 2008 presidential run." The New York Times (2/25, WK1, Zernike, 1.16M) takes a look at Hollywood's past and present role in raising money for candidates.

Most Experienced Candidates Lag Near Bottom Of Democratic Field. The Los Angeles Times (2/25, Neuman, 850K) writes that "experience -- and how to measure it --- has become one of the first big debating points of the 2008 presidential race. In one of the curiosities of the Democratic primary, some of the candidates with the most experience in national politics are at the bottom of the early popularity surveys," while Sen. Barack Obama, "with a mere three years on the national stage, is this year's campaign-trail sensation." Sen. Christopher Dodd, "with 33 years in the House and Senate," has been "trying to heighten the importance of Washington knowledge," while Gov. Bill Richardson, "15 years in the House, two years as U.N. ambassador, three years as energy secretary," highlights "his 'unparalleled experience,'" and Sen. Joseph Biden, "35 years in the Senate," has said, "It's not so much whether I can compete with their money, but whether they can compete with my ideas and my experience."

Governors Nearly Absent From Crowded Field. The Washington Post (2/25, A4, Balz, 690K) looks at the near-absence of governors from the race, with only Richardson currently serving as a state's chief executive. And at the opening of the winter meeting of the National Governors Association, "few attendees expressed any desire to get involved on behalf of a presidential candidate." Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell "said that because of the heavily front-loaded nomination calendar, he and others may have more to lose than gain by picking a candidate now. 'Why risk ticking off the eventual nominee when there's no value to it?' Rendell asked."

Dodd, Richardson Could Benefit From Vilsack Exit. The Washington Post (2/25, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) looks at the "winners and losers" resulting from Tom Vilsack's departure from the presidential race. With Vilsack out, the Iowa caucuses are a winner, while Nevada is a loser, since "second-tier candidates looking to make the big leap will probably devote most of their limited resources to making a move in Iowa. The Nevada caucuses, set for five days later, will be an afterthought." Richardson, "the only candidate left on the Democratic side with executive experience," and Dodd, "is slowly but surely positioning himself to take advantage of a stumble by the front-runners," are winners. Vilsack himself is a loser, as his "decision to get out so quickly does little to enhance his chances at being picked for the national ticket."

Vilsack's Exit Linked To High Cost Of Campaigning. ABC and CBS both ran reports on campaign financing and the presidential campaign, tied to Vilsack's exit. ABC World News (2/24, story 6, 2:05, Hendren, 8.78M) reported that Tom Vilsack "had a key home state and a popular antiwar message. … What he lacked was cash. … He had raised more than $1 million last year -- an amount Barack Obama raised in a single day in Hollywood last week. Republican Mitt Romney brought in $6.5 million in a single day last month. … In 1952, the last time there was no incumbent in the race, Dwight Eisenhower won after spending $6.6 million in the general election. Political analysts estimate that by the time it's over, the republican and democratic nominees this time will have spent $500 million apiece." The CBS Evening News (2/24, story 2, 2:35, Assuras, 7.66M) said, "A political deep freeze is in store for any White House hopeful who is not able to raise tension of millions of dollars in campaign money. Total spending on presidential campaigns increased tenfold between 1976 and 2004; and could hit $1 billion during campaign '08. The high price of admission has already inflicted one casualty" in Vilsack.

Luntz Says GOP Must Reach Out To "Fed-Ups." In a Washington Post (2/25, B1, 690K) op-ed, corporate communications adviser and former Republican pollster Frank Luntz writes that Republicans in Congress "cannot regain their majority merely by relying on a coalition of traditional conservatives and evangelicals. They must reach out to what I call 'the fed-ups' -- a large and growing constituency of independent voters who have held the balance of power in every election since 1992, and will hold it again in 2008. … There are some hopeful signs. Both the early front-runners for the GOP presidential nomination," Rudy Giuliani and Sen. John McCain, "have appeal beyond the party's base of conservative supporters."

Broder Sees Much Work Ahead For Unity08 Effort. In a June 2006 column, David Broder took a look at the "Unity08" effort to recruit and nominate a bipartisan third-party presidential ticket via the Internet, and in his Washington Post (2/25, B7, 690K) column today, he returns to the subject, writing that 35,000 people have signed up so far to participate in the effort, according to Doug Bailey, one of the project's founders. Broder says, "They obviously have a long way to go before they can claim to be a viable political force, but they are making slow, steady progress." But after the "extremely cumbersome" process of setting up nomination rules and voting procedures, and getting their nascent party on state ballots, "then comes the challenge of recruiting a candidate or candidates for Unity08 to back. If its organizers had a compelling person already lined up, their task would be much easier, but they do not."

Perry's Attempt To Strengthen Texas Governorship Falters. The Houston Chronicle (2/25, Ratcliffe, 530K) reports Gov. Rick Perry's "five-year drive to add some muscle to Texas' weak governor system hit a brick wall last week. First, a state district judge ruled that Perry lacked the power to tell state administrative law judges by executive order to speed up hearings in TXU Corp.'s request for coal-fired electric plant permits. The next day, a House committee approved a bill to overturn Perry's executive mandate that all sixth-grade girls be vaccinated against a sexually transmitted virus that causes most cervical cancers. 'On the vaccine, the Legislature was relatively insulted about that,' said House Appropriations Chairman Warren Chisum, a Republican who has been allied with Perry in the past. 'They just felt it was important to exercise their authority as a Legislature.'"

NYTimes Blames States For Undermining NCLB. The New York Times (2/25, WK13, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes that in the case of the No Child Left Behind Act, "things have not worked as Congress planned. … Many states opted for dumbed-down tests and deliberate sleight of hand to create the fraudulent appearance of progress. As a result, states that perform well with their own watered-down exams do shockingly poorly when their students take the far more rigorous federal test known as the National Assessment of Educational Progress. A report this month by the bipartisan Commission on No Child Left Behind highlights this problem and calls for the development of more rigorous tests and national standards in reading, language arts, math and science."

WPost Urges Maryland To Adopt Public Campaign Financing. The Washington Post (2/25, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Last year, Maryland candidates for public office at the state level raised $93.6 million for their campaigns, up 69 percent from 2002. … So why isn't public financing of elections a hotter issue in Annapolis? … A bill before the General Assembly is modeled on rules already working well in Maine and Arizona. And public funding's advocates make the not implausible argument that the scheme would pay for itself soon enough as lawmakers, less beholden to special interests and corporate contributors, trimmed pork-barrel spending and tax breaks for the favored few."

Iran Says US "In No Position" For Military Confrontation. Under the headline, "Iran Urges Talks On Nukes, Not War," the Washington Times/AP (2/25, A1, Dareini) notes Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki "said yesterday the United States was in no position for another war and maintained that negotiations -- not threats -- were the only way to resolve the standoff over its nuclear activities." He "was responding to Vice President Dick Cheney, who renewed Washington's warning to Iran earlier yesterday that 'all options' were on the table if Tehran continues to defy U.N. demands to halt uranium enrichment." Mottaki "said the U.S. could not afford to settle its differences with Iran by starting a third war after Afghanistan and Iraq," and "urged the U.S. and its allies to return to dialogue when they are scheduled to meet in London next week."

Doubts Raised About US Intelligence On Iran. On its front page today, the Los Angeles Times (2/25, A1, Drogin, Murphy, 850K) reports, "Despite growing international concern about Iran's nuclear program and its regional ambitions, most U.S. intelligence shared with the [IAEA] has proved inaccurate and none has led to significant discoveries inside Iran." IAEA sources "said the CIA and other Western spy services have provided sensitive information to [them] at least since 2002, when Iran's long-secret nuclear program was exposed. But none of the tips about supposed secret weapons sites provided clear evidence that the Islamic Republic is developing illicit weapons." The Times adds that

"the reliability of U.S. information and assessments on Iran is increasingly at issue as the Bush administration confronts the emerging regional power on multiple fronts: its expanding nuclear effort, its alleged support for insurgents inside Iraq and its backing of Middle East militant groups." Administration "officials privately acknowledge that much of their evidence on Iran's nuclear plans and programs remains ambiguous, fragmented and difficult to prove."

Hoagland Counsels "Strategic Patience" To Disarm Iran. In his Washington Post (2/25, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland says the "bravado of the first Bush term has been replaced by a sadder and quieter way of doing business abroad as Iraq has sapped U.S. capabilities and political cohesion." Noting recent steps with North Korea and Iran, he says the "sense of a U-turn is reinforced by Bush's reliance this time on the negotiating skills of his diplomatic corps and on European and Asian partners to reach, enforce and pay for the projected deals, which would serve as twin tombstones for a brief era of U.S. unilateralism." Citing "divisions in Iran's leadership," Hoagland says "U.S. and European policy should play on those divisions." He concludes, "Bush seems to have decided to employ strategic patience in seeking a verifiable nuclear deal with North Korea and to have taken a long-range view of regional stability. He should do no less with Iran, however much manufactured outrage or contrived mockery it provokes, in Tehran or in Washington."

El-Baradei To Lead IAEA Talks In North Korea Next Month. In continuing reporting on North Korea's willingness to allow IAEA inspections of its nuclear facilities, Bloomberg (2/25, Kim) reports IAEA Director-General Mohammed El-Baradei "accepted an invitation from North Korea to visit the country in March for talks on its nuclear program." El-Baradei said in a statement that he views "this as a step toward the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula," and said "we will discuss issues of mutual concern and how we can implement the agreement," including the "shut-down and eventual abandonment of the Yongbyon nuclear facility, including the reprocessing facility."

LATimes Welcomes IAEA's Return To North Korea. In an editorial today, the Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) says the "invitation" conveyed to El-Baradei was one "he couldn't refuse." The IAEA is "imperfect yet indispensable," the Times adds, and, "as a keeper of the international nuclear order, it is better than the alternatives — a conclusion even the Bush administration appears to have accepted." The invitation is "encouraging," but "the key test will be whether it discloses anything meaningful about its nuclear operations." Elsewhere, El-Baradei and President Bush "disagree on Tehran," but "these are policy disputes. The IAEA's strength is more practical. It is powerless to force nations to allow its inspectors to go where they are not wanted, nor can it catch determined cheats. But it has earned credibility for honestly reporting what its inspectors find and where they are not permitted to look. For this alone, its return to North Korea will be useful."

Nunn's Reassessment Of Nuclear Weapons Strategy Analyzed. The New York Times Magazine (2/25, Crowley) in a profile of former Sen. Sam Nunn running more than 5,000 words, writes that a decade after leaving the Senate, "where he spent years as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Nunn posed one, overriding question about his list of things we'll wish we had done if a doomsday should ever come: 'Why aren't we doing them now?' In a sense, his own answer has been to help found and run the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a Washington-based foundation largely bankrolled by Nunn's friends Ted Turner and Warren Buffett. In what may be the most ambitious example of private dollars subsidizing national security, the N.T.I. is trying to fill in the gaps where government is failing to reduce nuclear threats. In other words, to do the things now that we would otherwise wish we had done. … As he sees it, the trouble is, in a defense establishment that once war-gamed the end of the world a thousand different ways, there has been a shortage of thinking about what the right direction looks like or how to take it."

Putin, Having "Transformed" Russian Politics, Could Hand-Pick Successor. A nearly 5,000-word piece in today's New York Times Magazine (2/25, Myers) details the politics and challenges of succession in Moscow as Vladimir Putin begins his presumed last year in office." Sergei Ivanov "has never expressed the desire to be president — neither in public nor, as far as anyone who knows will tell, in private. Neither has Dmitri A. Medvedev, the other first deputy prime minister and the other presumed-to-be-leading candidate. Nor have Valentina I. Matviyenko, the energetic governor of St. Petersburg; Vladimir I. Yakunin, another former K.G.B. agent who heads the state-owned Russian Railways; Sergei S. Sobyanin, a former governor and the president's chief of staff; Dmitri N. Kozak, the presidential envoy to the turbulent Caucasus; Boris V. Gryzlov, the speaker of the lower house of Parliament; Sergei M. Mironov, the chairman of the upper house; or Sergei V. Chemizov, director of the state arms-marketing monopoly who served as an intelligence officer with Putin in East Germany." The Times clarifies, "No one knows for sure who might emerge as a candidate, because Putin himself will decide, and he has given no indication yet of his final choice. What is certain is that whomever he selects will become the next president of Russia." Noting that "it has become impossible to imagine anyone else in charge," the Times adds that Putin's "genuine popularity, nourished by the czarlike aura cultivated around him, has smothered any chance for an alternative national leader to emerge, even one of his own choosing."

Lavrov Says Russian Assertiveness Need Not Augur New Cold War. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (2/25, B7, 690K), Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov says, "At a time when Russia is ready and eager to play a positive role in world affairs and integrate into the global economy, it does far more harm than good to treat Russia as a hostile nation whenever Moscow and Washington disagree." Of Putin's recent Munich speech, Lavrov says Putin "was neither attacking the United States nor proposing Russia as a counterbalance to U.S. unilateralism. Instead, he called for a world with many centers of influence where different interests work together, multilaterally, to shape a common denominator on global issues." Lavrov continues, "It only makes sense that we would hold our own views and expect them to be taken seriously," and "we will not compromise the right of the Russian people to decide things for themselves and be heard on international issues." He calls it "a grave error" to view "the honest and open airing of concerns as some sort of casus belli."

WPost Chides Bush Administration, Russia For Missile Defense Posturing. In an editorial entitled "Missile Fantasies," the Washington Post (2/25, B6, 690K) says the "emerging debate over the deployment of U.S missile defenses in Central Europe is based on a series of false pretenses" by both the Bush Administration and the Czech and Polish governments. But "the prize for cynical posturing, nevertheless, goes to Russia, which in the past few days has suddenly advanced a claim that it knows to be false: that the deployment of the antimissile system would weaken the Russian nuclear deterrent." For its part, the Post says, the US is merely "determined to create a program so literally set in concrete that it can't be stopped or reversed by future presidents… Whether the technology actually works or a threat exists that justifies the rush never seems to matter much." Calling Moscow's "gamesmanship" "worrisome," the Post concludes the Kremlin "may use the U.S. defense program as an excuse to revive a major piece of the Soviet nuclear arsenal with which to threaten NATO members in Europe. It's hard to think of a quicker way to revive the Cold War."

Chinese Human Rights Lawyers Spar Over Tactics For Change. A 3,000-word piece on the front page of the New York Times (2/25, Kahn, 1.16M) front page details two Chinese human rights lawyers' tactics for expanding freedom and democracy. But like "many who devote themselves to expanding freedoms and the rule of law in China, the two spend as much time clashing over tactics and principles as they do challenging the ruling Communist Party." They "are part of a momentous struggle over the rule of law in China. Young, well educated and idealistic, they and other members of the so-called weiquan, or rights defense, movement, aim to use the laws and courts that the Communist Party has put in place as part of its modernization drive to constrain the party's power."

Scholar Sees Chinese One-Party Rule Enduring. In the Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K), professor James Mann says of China's future, "It is possible to envision three scenarios for China. One can be called the Soothing Scenario: that China's authoritarian political system is bound to open up, or even that it is already evolving toward political liberalization." There is also an "Upheaval Scenario," and "then there is what I call the Third Scenario: that China's one-party political system will not change in any fundamental way. This view holds that China will remain an authoritarian regime over the long term." Mann says the latter "is perhaps the most likely. … The best time to see whether China will really open up or remain authoritarian will be in the year or two after the [2008 Olympics] visitors go home. I believe that China's current one-party system will endure far into the future."

Taiwanese Premier Will Seek Presidency. AFP (2/25) carries the announcement that Taiwanese Prime Minister Su Tseng-chang "will seek the ruling Democratic Progressive Party's nomination for the 2008 presidential race." The "60-year-old, a former human rights lawyer and popular co-founder of the pro-independence [DPP], emphasized Taiwan's sovereignty." AFP says "Su became the third DPP heavyweight to make public his presidential bid, following former premier Frank Hsieh, who stood down as premier a year ago, and DPP chairman Yu Shyi-kun." Vice President Annette Lu may also seek the DPP nomination.

Europeans Decline To Promise Aid Resumption To Palestinians. The AP (2/24, Charlton) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "ended his European tour Saturday without persuading any country to end crippling economic sanctions based on his power-sharing deal with" Hamas. French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy's offer to work with that unity government is called "the bright spot" of Abbas' mission. However, even Douste-Blazy "made no commitments on resuming aid… Europe's governments remained firm: Any new Palestinian government must recognize Israel's right to exist before direct international aid can resume."

IDF Enters Nablus, Imposes Curfew. The AP (2/25) reports, "Dozens of Israeli jeeps and armored vehicles raided the West Bank city of Nablus [today] and placed tens of thousands of Palestinians under curfew." IDF sources said that troops "uncovered an explosives laboratory in the city and that soldiers had been shot at in several places and returned fire. No injuries were reported on either side."

Israeli "bulldozers pushed rubble into piles on main roads to make them impassable," while "troops placed about 50,000 people under curfew in the center of Nablus and closed the main entrance to the city."

Violence Could End Hamas-Fatah Calm. The New York Times (2/25, A8, Kershner, 1.16M) reports, "Five Palestinians were killed and more than 40 wounded in fighting between clans on Friday and early Saturday in Khan Yunis, a town in the southern Gaza Strip." The fighting "took on a factional hue, since one of the families is identified with Hamas and the other with" Fatah. The violence "raised fears of a possible round of revenge killings and renewed factional fighting between Hamas and Fatah after two weeks of relative calm."

Italian President Asks Prodi To Lead Government, Seek Confidence Vote. Under the headline, "Prodi Gets A Second Chance To Lead Italy," the New York Times (2/25, Fisher, 1.16M) reports Prime Minister Romano Prodi "was given a second chance to lead Italy's government on Saturday, though allies and enemies worried that his still-fragile coalition would remain divided and vulnerable to another collapse." Since his resignation into a caretaker role on Wednesday, Prodi "has forced party leaders into line, even though the underlying ideological splits remain in place, as does his razor-thin majority in the Senate." Yesterday, President Giorgio Napolitano "concluded that there was 'no concrete alternative' and asked Mr. Prodi to try again." While Prodi "is expected to have little trouble in the lower chamber, the House of Deputies, where he enjoys a wide majority," the Times says he "would make no firm predictions about the Senate."

Chavez Arms Purchases Raise Alarm, Criticism. The New York Times (2/25, Romero, 1.16M) reports, "Venezuela's arms spending has climbed to more than $4 billion in the past two years, transforming the nation into Latin America's largest weapons buyer and placing it ahead of other major purchasers in international arms markets like Pakistan and Iran." Officials in Caracas "say the arms acquisitions, which include dozens of fighter jets and attack helicopters and 100,000 Kalashnikov assault rifles, are needed to circumvent a ban by the United States on sales of American weapons to the country. They also argue that Venezuela must strengthen its defenses to counter potential military aggression from the United States." The Times says the "retooling of Venezuela's military strategy, which includes creation of a large civilian reserve force and military assistance to regional allies like Bolivia, has been part of a steadily deteriorating political relationship with" Washington, which has had "harsh criticism" for Caracas' "escalation of arms spending."

Chavez Says Bush's Latin America Trip Will Be "Failure." The AP (2/24) carries comments by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez "that he saw U.S. President George W. Bush's upcoming tour to Latin America as a diplomatic offensive aimed at isolating his leftist government." He "said that Bush's planned trip was 'without a doubt' aimed at dividing the region and containing Venezuela's influence." He is quoted predicting the trip is "destined to the abyss of failure." The White House "has said Bush's trip is aimed at underlining the U.S. government's commitment to the region and advancing democracy and its benefits, including health, education and economic opportunities."

Somali Violence Kills 10, Sparks Exodus From Mogadishu. The Washington Times/AFP (2/25, Abdinur) reports, "Thousands of terrified civilians poured out of the Somali capital yesterday after heavy fighting between Ethiopian troops and gunmen overnight left at least 10 persons dead." Many Somalis "left on foot for the relative calm of the surrounding countryside." The past "week saw some of the heaviest fighting in the capital since late December," and Somali and Ethiopian officials "blame remnants of the Islamist movement for stoking the violence."

High Unemployment Could Be Key To Senegal Election. The Washington Post/AP (2/25, A19, Callimachi) examines the "top election issue" in Senegal – employment. The public works projects of President Abdoulaye Wade, who is seeking reelection, "include the new sea-hugging highway, a second major airport and a pan-African university. Yet in a country where half the population of 12 million is unemployed, some Senegalese say they would settle for a decent job and three meals a day." Wade "said his critics are missing the larger picture," and he "points to an annual growth rate of almost 5 percent … and to job-creating initiatives such as raising crops whose oil can be used for biofuels."

Mbeki Said To Foster Gradual, Structural Improvements In South Africa. The Washington Post (2/25, A18, Timberg, 690K) examines the "change" seen in South Africa during Thabo Mbeki's presidency. "Inequality remains extreme in South Africa, with sharp divisions along lines of race and class. But Mbeki … has already crafted a legacy of fiscal stability and modest racial progress that, advisers say, he is working furiously to protect as rivals vie to replace him." He is "competing for a third term as party leader, a move that would help him handpick the next president. But analysts say the outcome is far from certain in a year they call the most politically tumultuous since apartheid." The Post says the "slow pace of change" could become "Mbeki's most glaring weakness." However, the Post adds, while "the racial order has proved dauntingly resilient, a strong economy has provided benefits to all levels of society." While Mbeki's "cerebral approach to the presidency will never generate the enthusiasm many South Africans felt for Nelson Mandela," Mbeki "was the intellectual force behind policies that have allowed the country to become fiscally sound while gradually providing homes, water, electrical connections and grants to millions of the poorest South Africans."

Kristof Highlights Need For Supporting Maternal And Child Health Programs. In his New York Times (2/25, WK15, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof says the Bush Administration should consider the impact of proposed budget cuts in global maternal and child health programs. "For every woman who dies in childbirth worldwide, another 20 are injured. But because the victims are born with three strikes against them — they are poor, rural and female — they are invisible and voiceless, receiving almost no help either from poor countries or from the developed world." While domestically "neither Democrats nor Republicans have ever shown great interest in maternal health," Sri Lanka and Honduras "have both shown how poor countries can drastically cut rates of death and injury." Kristof says the US and other nations should support those who are "showing the world how to turn the tide of maternal mortality and morbidity" and "offering comfort to some of the most forlorn people in the world."

Researcher Says Kennan's "Containment" Remains Powerful Concept Today. Headlining his Los Angeles Times (2/25, 850K) op-ed, "Containment Makes A Comeback," professor Ian Shapiro writes, "Containment is a Cold War idea, articulated by historian and diplomat George Kennan." Kennan "argued that as long as the Soviet Union did not attack us, we should not attack it," and "history proved him right." While the Administration believes "containment in fact obsolete," Shapiro says "numerous parallels suggest that it is not." Saying "Libya should be" the "model for Iran," Shapiro believes the Administration views "it differently and are pushing the modern equivalent of rollback, suggesting that we should attack Iran to stop its nuclear weapons program." Citing Kennan's opposition to NATO and the UN, Shapiro notes, "It is ironic that the two areas in which Kennan's views are most outdated and wrongheaded — working with regional allies and international institutions — are the two areas in which the Bush administration follows his lead." He concludes, "Containment is not obsolete. The Bush doctrine is."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Facility Holding Terrorism Inmates Limits Communication (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer
The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

The Justice Department has quietly opened a new prison unit in Indiana that houses a hodgepodge of second-tier terrorism inmates, most of them Arab Muslims, whose ability to communicate with the outside world has been tightly restricted.

At the Communications Management Unit, or CMU, in Terre Haute, Ind., all telephone calls and mail are monitored, the number of phone calls limited and visits are restricted to a total of four hours per month, according to special rules enforced by the Justice Department's U.S. Bureau of Prisons. All inmate conversations must be conducted in English unless otherwise negotiated.

The unit appears to be a less restrictive version of the "supermax" facility in Florence, Colo., which holds some of the United States' most notorious terrorists, including al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui and Unabomber Theodore J. Kaczynski.

The Indiana unit, by contrast, is part of a medium-security facility and includes inmates set to be released in as little as two years. Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said the unit's population will not be limited to inmates convicted of terrorism-related cases, though all of the prisoners fit that definition.

Prison officials said they already seek to fully monitor the mail and other communications of all 213 "terrorist inmates" in the system. "By concentrating resources in this fashion, it will greatly enhance the agency's capabilities for language translation, content analysis and intelligence sharing," the bureau said in a summary of the CMU.

The unit, in Terre Haute's former death row, has received 17 inmates since it was launched in December and eventually will hold five times that number, officials said.

Defense lawyers and prisoner advocates complain that the unit's communication restrictions are unduly harsh for inmates not considered high security risks. They also say that the ethnic makeup of the CMU's population may indicate racial profiling. "If they really believed these people are serious terrorists, they wouldn't be in this unit," said David Fathi, staff counsel for the

National Prison Project at the American Civil Liberties Union. "They'd be in Colorado with [Atlanta Olympics bomber] Eric Rudolph and the Unabomber and the rest of the people that the Bureau of Prisons thinks are serious threats."

The prison bureau has come under sharp criticism in recent months for failing to adequately monitor terrorist inmates' communications. The Justice Department's inspector general reported in October that three terrorists imprisoned for the 1993 World Trade Center bombing had sent nearly 100 letters to alleged terrorists overseas from the maximum-security facility in Colorado.

"The inclusion of this unit is one of the many things we're doing to improve our monitoring capabilities," Billingsley said.

According to prison records, current residents at Terre Haute include five members of the so-called Lackawanna Six, a group of Yemeni natives from Upstate New York who attended an al-Qaeda training camp. The unit also houses Randall Royer, a defendant prosecuted as part of the "Virginia jihad" case in Alexandria, and Enaam M. Arnaout, an Islamic charity director who pleaded guilty to diverting money to Islamic military groups in Bosnia and Chechnya.

The only non-Muslim inmates are an unidentified Colombian militant and Zvonko Busic, 61, former leader of a Croatian extremist group that hijacked a jetliner and set off a bomb that killed a police officer in 1976, according to prison records and defense lawyers.

Another CMU resident is Rafil Dhafir, 58, an Iraqi-born physician from Syracuse, N.Y., who was sentenced to 22 years for defrauding charity donors and conspiring to violate U.S. economic sanctions against Saddam Hussein's government.

In a recent letter to supporters, Dhafir recounted his abrupt, heavily guarded transfer to Terre Haute in December and described it as part of "a nationwide operation to put Muslims/Arabs in one place so that we can be closely monitored regarding our communications."

"We are all concerned about the close intrusion on our communications," Dhafir wrote. "We knew all along that our calls, mail and visits were monitored, but with the new system we will have absolutely no privacy including our visits. This is causing a great deal of anxiety and resentment especially among those whose families speak no English."

Dhafir wrote that prison officials "are allowing us total freedom for our religious activities" and appear to be working with inmates to improve conditions.

Prisoner advocates and prisons officials generally agree that the bureau is within its rights to monitor prisoners' mail, phone calls and visits. They differ on whether the intensive use of these tactics is justified for these inmates.

Some lawyers and prison advocates said there are important problems with the CMU, including a lack of public notice about its formation and a lack of clarity about how inmates are chosen to be sent there.

Washington lawyer Carmen Hernandez, who represents Busic and is president-elect of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, noted that being sent to the unit is not considered a punitive measure by prisons officials. As a result, authorities do not have to provide hearings and other procedures that are required when punishments are to be administered.

"They claim it's not a punitive measure, but when you start restricting access, it certainly would appear to be punitive," Hernandez said. "If you're going to restrict people's liberties beyond what they already are, it ought to be for a good, particularized reason, and there does not appear to be one here."

Howard Kieffer, a Santa Ana, Calif., defense lawyer who runs a Web site focused on federal prisons, also argues that the unit "screams racial profiling."

"It's highly suspect that basically all of the people in this program are of Middle Eastern descent," Kieffer said.

Billingsley said inmates are not placed in the unit based on ethnicity or religion. She said the facility will eventually house a variety of prisoners, including sex offenders who attempt to communicate with victims and others who have abused mail or phone privileges.

"What they all have in common is a demonstrated need to more closely monitor their communications," Billingsley said.

During a tour of the Colorado prison last week, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said the monitoring problems there had been solved, although prison guards say the facility remains understaffed.

Evidence Against Muslim Charity Appears Fabricated (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

An official summary of an FBI-wiretapped conversation contains anti-Semitic slurs that do not appear in the actual transcript.

DOJ_NMG_0136486

When the Bush administration shut down the nation's largest Muslim charity five years ago, officials of the Dallas-based foundation denied allegations it was linked to terrorists and insisted that a number of accusations were fabricated by the government.

Now, attorneys for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development say the government's own documents provide evidence of that claim.

In recent court filings, defense lawyers disclosed striking discrepancies between an official summary and the verbatim transcripts of an FBI-wiretapped conversation in 1996 involving Holy Land officials.

The summary attributes inflammatory, anti-Semitic comments to Holy Land officials that are not found in a 13-page transcript of the recorded conversation. It recently was turned over to the defense by the government in an exchange of evidence.

Citing the unexplained discrepancies, defense lawyers have asked U.S. District Judge A. Joe Fish in Dallas to declassify thousands of hours of FBI surveillance recordings, so that full transcripts would replace government summaries as evidence.

The demand could force government prosecutors to either declassify evidence it has fought to keep secret or risk losing a critical portion of evidence in its case.

In December, the judge denied a defense request to declassify the documents so they could be examined by defendants in the case. Seven former foundation officials, six of them U.S. citizens, have been charged with funneling money to overseas charities controlled by Hamas, which the U.S. has designated as a foreign terrorist organization. The defendants have denied the charges.

Though defense attorneys already have government clearances that allow them to review the material, under the federal Classified Information Procedures Act they have been prohibited from sharing it with their clients. And unless the act's rules are declared unconstitutional in the case, defense attorneys argue, the defendants will have no way of proving that the statements attributed to them were misconstrued or never made.

The recently declassified summary of surveillance on April 15, 1996, asserts that during a conversation wiretapped by the FBI, Holy Land's former executive director Shukri Abu Baker told two associates there was no need to worry about the foundation being unfairly targeted because U.S. courts were not under the control of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee or its sponsor, "the government of the demons of Israel."

The summary portrays Baker as raging against "the Jews of the world" and as claiming that Jews have no allegiance to anything but "their pockets and to preserving the illegal Zionist state of Israel."

Additional anti-Semitic comments the FBI summary attributed to Baker or Ghassan Elashi, Holy Land's former board chairman, included:

• "Their [Jews'] only purpose here in the U.S. is to purchase as many politicians as possible and to warp the way the American Christians feel and think not just about the Christian religion but mainly about the Palestinian people … and to rob as much money as possible from American taxpayers for the illegitimate excuse of protecting and preserving the chosen people of God."

• "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests … the sons of snakes and scorpions."

• "I am confident that in the end justice, and not the Jews, will prevail. I believe that there is still justice in America."

None of those quotes was contained in a 13-page transcript of the conversation, defense lawyers said in their motion to expand access to classified evidence.

"Throughout the run-up to trial, the government has insisted that the defendants can learn what is contained in the [surveillance] intercepts by reading the so-called 'summaries' of those intercepts," defense attorneys said in their papers.

But the recently disclosed transcript, attorneys said, shows that "not only are the summaries so inaccurate and misleading as to be useless," but that the "author of the attached summary has cynically and maliciously attributed to the defendants racist invective and inculpatory remarks the defendants never uttered."

"It is appalling that such summaries even exist, much less that the government represented that this is all our clients need to know in order to defend themselves."

Defense lawyers declined to comment about their motion. A federal prosecutor said the government would respond with its own filings to the court.

How the summary and transcript could be so different was unclear, though experts in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act arena theorized that its top-secret nature may have led some analysts to believe that the work product would never be publicly disclosed, much less entered into evidence in a trial.

Because the court records are heavily redacted, it could not be determined who provided the summaries of the FBI wiretaps.

DOJ_NMG_0136487

Other alleged discrepancies also have dogged the case. Holy Land lawyers challenged the accuracy of an FBI memo, for example, that quoted a foundation office manager as telling Israeli authorities that charitable funds were "channeled to Hamas."

But defense lawyers told the court the translation from Arabic to Hebrew to English distorted the official's original statement, and that he should have been quoted as saying, "We have no connection to Hamas."

The Holy Land Foundation was closed weeks after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on New York and the Pentagon. The action followed years of efforts by Israel and many pro-Israeli groups in the U.S. to close the foundation on the grounds that it was a fundraising front for Hamas.

The former Holy Land officials facing trial are charged with conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists by sending money, goods and services to Palestinian charities controlled by Hamas, a U.S.-designated terrorist group since 1995.

TV Cameraman Among Detainees At Guantanamo (WT/AP)

By Ben Fox, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 25, 2007

NAVAL BASE GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba -- A TV cameraman is getting an inside view of life at Guantanamo Bay prison, only he is unable to get out and tell the story.

Sami al-Hajj, of the Al Jazeera TV network, was stopped at the Afghanistan border by Pakistani authorities in December 2001, turned over to U.S. forces and hauled in chains six months later to Guantanamo, where about 390 men are held on suspicion of links to al Qaeda or the Taliban.

Mr. al-Hajj, a 38-year-old native of Sudan, has been held in this U.S. military prison ever since.

He is believed to be the only journalist from a major international news organization held at Guantanamo.

Colleagues from Mr. al-Hajj's Qatar-based network and the Sudanese government want to know why he is being held, but the U.S. government is saying little. The military did not even publicly acknowledge holding Mr. al-Hajj until last April, when it released a list of Guantanamo detainees in response to a Freedom of Information Act request filed by the Associated Press.

But military documents sketch at least a partial outline of Mr. al-Hajj's experiences at Guantanamo and the U.S. grounds for holding him -- that he transported money between 1996 and 2000 for a defunct charity that purportedly provided money to militant groups, and that he met a "senior al Qaeda lieutenant."

When he appeared before a military review panel at this remote U.S. military base in August 2005, Mr. al-Hajj, citing the advice of his attorney, declined to respond to questions. But he denied any connection to terrorism.

"With all due respect, a mistake has been made because I have never been a member of any terrorist group," he said, according to a transcript released the following year. "I can say without hesitation that I am not a threat to the United States."

During the hearing, aimed at determining whether Mr. al-Hajj posed a threat to the United States or possessed intelligence value, Mr. al-Hajj wore a white jumpsuit reserved for the "most compliant" detainees. An officer told the tribunal that Mr. al-Hajj was leading Islamic prayer sessions and teaching other prisoners English.

His colleagues at Al Jazeera claim his detention is American harassment of an Arabic TV network whose coverage has long angered U.S. officials. Near the entrance to the network's Khartoum, Sudan, bureau a banner saying "Free Sami al-Hajj" hangs alongside his photo.

"He's our colleague, so we're very worried," said Nassef Salah Eldin, an Al Jazeera producer in the Sudanese capital. "We feel it could happen to any of us."

Lamis Andoni, a Middle East analyst for the network who helped organize a campaign for Mr. al-Hajj's release, noted the network's sour relationship with the American government. In April 2003, an Al Jazeera journalist was killed when the network's Baghdad bureau was struck during a U.S. bombing campaign. In November 2001, a U.S. missile destroyed Al Jazeera's office in Kabul, Afghanistan. The U.S. claims both attacks were mistakes.

"When you are targeted once, it could be a mistake," Mr. Andoni said in an interview from Amman, Jordan. "But when you are bombed twice, it's something else."

In an interview in Khartoum, Sudanese Justice Minister Mohammed Ali al-Mardi said the holding of the cameraman without charge "is repugnant to all the conventions and principles of international law."

Washington has given Sudan no information about Mr. al-Hajj, Mr. al-Mardi said. U.S. relations with Sudan are strained over the Darfur conflict in western Sudan.

"I consider the information that we obtained from him to be useful," Paul Rester, director of the Joint Intelligence Group at the prison, said in an interview at Guantanamo Bay. Mr. Rester refused to elaborate or even to comment on the charges aired at the 2005 hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0136488

The U.S. military says that in the 1990s, Mr. al-Hajj was an executive assistant at a Qatar-based beverage company that provided support to Muslim fighters in Bosnia and Chechnya.

Infiltrating The Extreme (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

TORONTO — Mubin Shaikh, the informer, balances his 3-month-old son in the palm of his hand and hoists him aloft like the torch of the Statue of Liberty. The baby coos and smiles, unaware of the danger of falling, then lurches into space. Shaikh catches him gently and laughs.

Shaikh's own balancing act has been more difficult.

He is a 31-year-old Canadian-born Muslim who disavowed the mosque to fit in with his neighborhood friends, then rejected that life to practice traditional Islam. Later, he used his stature in the Muslim community to infiltrate a suspected terrorist cell, and then helped expose it — an act that alienated him from many in his own circles.

Shaikh's struggle with identity and loyalty is part of a larger conundrum confronting Western nations with edgy and diverse Islamic populations. He thought his ability to straddle worlds was the answer to quelling the homegrown terrorism that has stunned London, Madrid and now Toronto. But it has only raised more questions.

The suspected cell's plan, prosecutors said in June, was to explode three truck bombs in front of Toronto police and intelligence headquarters and Parliament Hill, then take politicians hostage and behead them one by one. The group of 18 had acquired 3 tons of what it thought was explosive material when police moved in, authorities say.

Cushioned by faith

To some, Shaikh is a hero, acting to protect not only Canada but Islam. Others charge that he enabled the plotters instead of acting to stop them, betrayed his brethren and reinforced the image of Muslims as terrorists in this country where more than half a million practice Islam.

Now he faces death threats, which he doesn't take seriously, and glares and cold shoulders in the mosque, which he does. As preliminary hearings for the suspects begin, the anguished questions revive: Did he do all he could? Was it necessary? Will he survive it?

Shaikh dismisses the threats and condemnations as he tickles his son's head with his long black beard. He believes that if he falls, he will be cushioned by his faith.

Shaikh was born in Toronto in 1975, two years after his parents arrived from India via England. His family practiced Islam, but he felt indistinguishable from his Italian and Portuguese neighbors.

In high school, he said, he was one of the "cool guys," sporting five tattoos, smoking pot behind a back wall and dating the cheerleaders.

"I am Canadian and I am Indian, born and raised here, with the expectations of conformity and the pain of acculturation," Shaikh said. "I had to deal with the clash of cultures. I liked girls, I liked music, I wanted nothing to do with the mosque."

Shaikh was in the Royal Canadian Army Cadets for six years and trained with a reserve unit. He became skilled with firearms and learned military maneuvers that he said he eventually taught to the aspiring terrorist cell. He was attracted by the discipline, he said.

After high school, still searching for discipline or a higher law, he came back to Islam. And like many young people, he said, he "overcompensated" and became ultra-religious, traveling to India and Pakistan with a conservative Islamic missionary group. He returned to Toronto in a knee-length robe, a skullcap and a long beard that he still wears today.

"It blew everybody away," he said of his transformation. He found it difficult at first to reconcile Canadian secular values with his newfound Islamic beliefs. "From the age of 19, I was made to feel like a stranger in my own country. I was subject to comments and looks."

The alienation increased after the Sept. 11 attacks, when people began to tell him to act like a Canadian or go home.

"This is my home," he said. "I was angry, and cynical. I wanted to go to Afghanistan or Chechnya. I could have been a jihadi."

Instead, he went to Syria in 2002 to study for two years, and came back more appreciative of Canada's laws and freedoms, armed with Koranic verses that argued against terrorism.

Shaikh became a well-known figure in Toronto's Muslim community as an official at the conservative Masjid el Noor mosque and a prominent proponent of using Sharia, or Islamic law, to settle family disputes among Muslims in Ontario province.

The government and liberal Muslims argued that the Islamic religious code clashed with Canadian laws, and the movement failed.

Down the informant's path

When Shaikh heard in 2004 that a childhood friend, Mohammed Momin Khawaja, had been arrested under Canada's new anti-terrorism laws, he called the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and said, "I've known this guy for a long time and there's got to be a mistake." He asked how he could help straighten things out.

CSIS agents quizzed him on his background and his beliefs. After more meetings and a polygraph test, they asked him to infiltrate a group they had been monitoring. Shaikh said he had had brushes with the law but no convictions, and he insisted no deals were made with the CSIS that led him to take on the assignment.

The agency agreed to pay him in installments for his efforts, and he said that as of January he had received more than $250,000. Another informant who ended up going into a witness protection program was paid about $12 million as compensation for giving up his business and home and relocating his family.

Neither the CSIS nor the police would comment for this article, citing confidentiality and preparations for the trial of the plot suspects.

Troubled by doubts, Shaikh consulted his spiritual advisor, who told him to be sure he was doing it for God, not for himself, and cautioned that he must not incite the others or betray his faith.

Shaikh's first test came in October 2005. He went to a fundraiser for imprisoned Muslims, assigned to connect with the alleged terrorist cell ringleader, Fahim Ahmad.

In the course of the evening, Shaikh said, he gave the right answers to Ahmad's questions, a between-the-lines test of whether Shaikh was prepared to wage "holy war." When the other alleged leader, Zacaria Amara, embraced him later that night, it apparently was in part to let Shaikh feel the gun under his clothes.

In turn, Shaikh said, he showed them his hard-to-get firearms license he had obtained as a cadet rifle instructor and told them of his military training. They needed someone to help them get arms and lead a training camp. Soon, he was in.

Shaikh said he and Ahmad seemed to recognize something in each other. Shaikh described Ahmad as a Muslim who struggled with the culture clash, whose religious values pushed him to the margins of society, where he grew angry and alienated and increasingly radical.

Laughing when he realized that he could be giving his own biography, Shaikh asked, "How is it that a guy like that goes one way and I go another?

"I don't know if it is fate or what, but I ended up with the right religious connection," he said. "If I had met a facilitator, chances are I would be somewhere in Afghanistan or Chechnya right now."

'Impressionable' recruits

The group included leaders and their young recruits — high school students from wealthy suburban families who lived in large Tudor houses. One drove a BMW, another a Lexus. A few of the younger ones left the circle at his quiet prompting, Shaikh said, and at the other minors' pretrial hearing, he pleaded for charges against some of the "impressionable kids" to be dropped. On Friday, charges against the youngest suspect were suspended.

He said he saw members of the group nearly every day for 10 months, watched beheading videos to desensitize himself, and wrote careful reports for the CSIS. The agency wired his van, tapped all their phones and monitored the group's movements.

In the winter, he said, the group spent 10 days in the woods a few hours north of Toronto in a makeshift terrorist training camp, led by Shaikh. Under the watchful eyes of concealed CSIS agents, the young holy warriors learned how to fire guns and hit a VIP convoy, and discussed the techniques of beheading.

The plot was progressing, Shaikh said: Amara showed him a homemade detonator sparked by a cellphone and told him he was testing bombs. Shaikh said he didn't know that the group had ordered 3 tons of ammonium nitrate, the material used by Timothy McVeigh in the Oklahoma City bombing.

The supplier turned out to be another mole, unknown to Shaikh, and the bags did not contain ammonium nitrate. After the material was delivered, more than 400 police officers conducted raids in early June, bursting through the doors of suburban homes with SWAT teams to arrest 12 men and five minors. The 18th suspect was arrested two months later.

When whispers ran like a current through the Muslim community that Shaikh was the informer, he decided that the best protection was to explain himself.

"I didn't do it for the money. I didn't do it to be a hero. I did it for Islam, because we don't support terror, and if those guys had succeeded, it would have made all Muslims look bad," he said, anger sparking in his dark brown eyes. "And I did it for Canada. I was born here, and I want this to be a place where people can live together without suspicion."

To many, he was a hero. After he revealed his identity in July, an editorial in the Globe and Mail headlined "In Praise of Mr. Shaikh" said: "He is an observant Muslim who acted against an alleged terrorist ring. For that, Canadians of all stripes should be grateful."

DOJ_NMG_0136490

But within Toronto's multifaceted Muslim community, gratitude was in short supply.

"Individuals cannot credibly spy on their own community while remaining a member of it," said Safiyyah Ally, the host of the TV program "Let the Quran Speak." "Our community is fragile enough as is, and our leaders are our moral anchors."

Ally said the community should report suspicious activity but leave the spying to the authorities.

Shaikh heard that and laughed. "How many Muslims do you think there are in CSIS? How many can penetrate those circles? Why do you think they came to me?"

After his exposure, though, Shaikh has found it more difficult than he expected to break through in even his old circles.

"There has been a lot of hostility." he said. "But that is trivial compared to not doing it, because it could have led to something so devastating, so tragic."

"Instead of being peeved at the fact that I was involved, they should be peeved at the guys who were doing it," he said. "They were angry that I brought attention to it. But think of the attention if those guys had blown up a truck bomb. It would come back to us 100%."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House Disaster Drill Supposes 10-City IED Strike (WP/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Dozens of high-level officials joined in a White House drill yesterday to see how the government would respond if several cities were attacked simultaneously with bombs similar to those used against U.S. troops in Iraq.

White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend and the Homeland Security Council that she heads mapped out in advance a massive disaster involving improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. The attack targeted 10 U.S. cities, both large and small, at the same time, said a senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Townsend presided over the three-hour exercise, which brought the government's top homeland security officials to the Eisenhower Executive Office Building next to the White House. All Cabinet agencies were represented by their secretaries or other high-ranking officials, with about 90 participants in all, White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

Stanzel said the drill revealed gaps in the government's ability to respond, but also showed that there have been many improvements since Hurricane Katrina. The storm exposed federal inadequacies when it devastated the Gulf Coast in 2005. For instance, coordination with state and local authorities and the ability to get federal resources in place quickly -- key missteps after Katrina -- appeared much better now, Stanzel said.

President Bush went on a bike ride yesterday morning and did not take part in the test.

The IED attacks are common in Iraq, but Stanzel said the test was not inspired by new intelligence or any increased chatter about terrorists' desire to use IEDs inside the United States.

This was the administration's fourth such "tabletop" exercise since the first in December 2005. That exercise focused on an avian flu pandemic.

As Bush's ID Plan Was Delayed, Coalition Formed Against It (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Darryl Fears, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Inspired by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, a sweeping federal law to tighten security requirements for driver's licenses is in jeopardy of unraveling after missteps by Congress and the Homeland Security Department, analysts and lawmakers said.

While Washington has delayed implementing it, a rebellion against the program has grown. Privacy advocates say the effort could create a de facto national ID card. Meanwhile, state officials charge that complying with federal requirements will cost $11 billion and potentially double fees and waiting times for 245 million Americans whose licenses would have to be reissued starting next year.

The issue threatens to turn into a partisan fight. The White House expects to release its driver's license plan, Real ID, this week and has warned congressional critics not to thwart or further delay a program that was recommended by the Sept. 11 commission.

"If we don't get it done now, someone's going to be sitting around in three or four years explaining to the next 9/11 commission why we didn't do it," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told the Senate's Homeland Security Committee on Feb. 13.

DOJ_NMG_0136491

Critics in both parties will try to delay the launch of the program by offering an amendment to legislation that Senate Democrats are pushing to implement remaining changes suggested by the Sept. 11 commission.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the homeland security panel, said in a statement that Real ID may not provide real security and that it is opposed by states "because it is overly burdensome, possibly unworkable, and may actually increase a terrorist's ability to commit identity theft."

The White House plan, which has been in the works for two years and will take effect in May 2008, standardizes information that must be included on licenses, including a digital photograph, a signature and machine-readable features such as a bar code.

The new rules also will spell out how states must verify applicants' citizenship status, check identity documents such as birth certificates and cross-check information with other states and with Social Security, immigration and State Department databases. Only complying IDs can be used for federal purposes such as boarding airplanes or entering government buildings.

The law is "vital for the protection of the country," said former New Jersey governor Thomas H. Kean Jr., co-chairman of the Sept. 11 commission. "You can't have 30 different methods of identification to get in and out of the country . . . many of them easily forged, and expect to keep the bad guys out."

All but one of the Sept. 11 hijackers acquired, legitimately or by fraud, IDs that allowed them to board planes, rent cars and move through the country.

Tightening U.S. identification requirements was a focus of both the Sept. 11 commission and the Markle Foundation's earlier bipartisan task force on terrorism. Markle, a New York think tank, focuses on technology policy.

But concern has mounted over Real ID's cost, practicality and impact on privacy and travel.

The National Governors Association calls Real ID an $11 billion unfunded mandate. States say the federal government, not license holders, should pay the tab. It wants up to 10 years for states to enact laws, pass budgets, develop technology, hire staff members and educate the public to phase in changes.

Last month, Maine's lawmakers voted to stop the initiative, saying it would cost $185 million -- six times the Maine Bureau of Motor Vehicles' annual budget. Measures are pending in at least 21 states to oppose or question the law.

Matthew Dunlap, Maine's secretary of state and head of the bureau, said the message from the lawmakers was: "We don't care if you give us bags of money. We don't want it."

An unusual and powerful alliance of civil liberties groups and libertarian groups important to the political bases of both parties has also mobilized. They describe Orwellian scenarios in which Real ID integrates nationwide databases storing personal information without adequate security safeguards, and they ask who will own and control access to the system.

"Real ID is a real nightmare," said Barry Steinhardt, director of the ACLU's Program on Technology and Liberty. "No one should be fooled that just because the data resides in 50 different states it's not all functionally one big database, because all the data is linked together."

Steinhardt said he fears that private companies that demand to check driver's licenses for commercial purposes could sell unencrypted data they get from the licenses to big data brokers. Means to prevent that could be even more costly and raise other security risks.

There are other worries. If Maine wants to include gun-permit information on its driver's licenses, Dunlap asked, will a Maine gun owner whose ID is swiped in a traffic stop in another state face extra scrutiny?

Practical problems also loom. Computer systems that would let state workers electronically verify birth certificates, Social Security numbers or citizenship status do not yet exist, Dunlap said, calling them "science fiction."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), ranking Republican on Lieberman's panel, and Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine) are seeking to delay or repeal Real ID and let security experts, privacy advocates and the states renegotiate the rules.

That is what Congress started to do in 2004. But in 2005, Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, rewrote the law to keep illegal immigrants from getting licenses and to let the Homeland Security Department define the rules for the program.

"If that process had been allowed to finish, we would have been done by now," said David Quam of the National Governors Association.

Instead, work bogged down in the overstretched department, whose top officials failed at first to give it enough attention, current and former officials said.

Stewart A. Baker, assistant homeland security secretary for policy, defended the department's effort: "We've moved this as fast as possible given the importance of the issue to so many different constituencies."

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, blamed the administration and the previous Congress for squandering the consensus on security that formed after Sept. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0136492

"It's a very badly mishandled case overall of a homeland security reform that was logical, important and yet not sufficiently promoted at the right time," O'Hanlon said. "We've lost the sense of urgency."

WAR NEWS:

Murtha Stumbles On Iraq Funding Curbs (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Lyndsey Layton, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Democrats Were Ill-Prepared for Unplanned Disclosure, Republican Attacks

The plan was bold: By tying President Bush's $100 billion war request to strict standards of troop safety and readiness, Democrats believed they could grab hold of Iraq war policy while forcing Republicans to defend sending troops into battle without the necessary training or equipment.

But a botched launch by the plan's author, Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), has united Republicans and divided Democrats, sending the latter back to the drawing board just a week before scheduled legislative action, a score of House Democratic lawmakers said last week.

"If this is going to be legislation that's crafted in such a way that holds back resources from our troops, that is a non-starter, an absolute non-starter," declared Rep. Jim Matheson (Utah), a leader of the conservative Blue Dog Democrats.

Murtha's credentials as a Marine combat veteran, a critic of the war and close ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) were supposed to make him an unassailable spokesman for Democratic war policy. Instead, he has become a lightning rod for criticism from Republicans and members of his own party.

Freshman Rep. Joe Sestak (D-Pa.), a retired Navy admiral who was propelled into politics by the Iraq war, said Murtha could still salvage elements of his strategy, but Sestak, an outspoken war opponent, is "a bit wary" of a proposal that would influence military operations.

"I was recently in the military, and I have to speak from that experience," Sestak said.

The story of Murtha's star-crossed plan illustrates the Democratic Party's deep divisions over the Iraq war and how the new House majority has yet to establish firm control over Congress. From the beginning, Murtha acted on his own to craft a complicated legislative strategy on the war, without consulting fellow Democrats. When he chose to roll out the details on a liberal, antiwar Web site on Feb. 15, he caught even Pelosi by surprise while infuriating Democrats from conservative districts.

Then for an entire week, as members of Congress returned home for a recess, Murtha refused to speak further. Democratic leaders failed to step into the vacuum, and Republicans relentlessly attacked a plan they called a strategy to slowly bleed the war of troops and funds. By the end of the recess, Murtha's once promising strategy was in tatters.

Tom Andrews, a former House member and antiwar activist who helped Murtha with his Internet rollout, fumed: "The issue to me is, what is the state of the backbone of the Democratic Party? How will they respond to this counterattack? Republicans are throwing touchdown passes on this because the Democrats aren't even on the field."

Rep. Debbie Wasserman-Schultz, a Florida Democrat and deputy whip, said party leaders are working on several Iraq proposals and that Murtha's may survive. Finding consensus will be difficult but not impossible, she said. "This is a multi-step process," she cautioned. "At least we're debating the topic, not blindly following the president."

Megan Grote, Murtha's spokeswoman, said the congressman will not discuss Iraq policy until a news conference scheduled for the end of the week.

Murtha, 74, the powerful chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, still holds a unique position on war policy, stemming from his roots as a veteran, his close ties to the uniformed military and his long-standing alliance with Pelosi. When he first publicly called for ending the war in 2005, he commanded the attention the party's left and right wings.

The strategy he would craft was designed to calm the nerves of the party's conservatives by fully funding the war, while placating the antiwar left by attaching so many strings to those funds that the president would not be able to deploy all the 21,500 additional combat troops he wanted.

To be sent to battle, troops would have to have had a year's rest between combat tours. Soldiers in Iraq could not have their tours extended beyond a year there. And the Pentagon's "stop-loss" policy, which prevents some officers from leaving the military when their service obligations are up, would end. Troops would have to be trained in counterinsurgency and urban warfare and be sent overseas with the equipment they used in training.

Pelosi endorsed the plan in concept but never the details. The plan surfaced Feb. 15 in an unorthodox Murtha appearance on MoveCongress.org, an antiwar Web site affiliated with the liberal activists of MoveOn.org.

It came the day before the House voted on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's additional troop deployments that Democratic leaders had been touting as a major rebuke. Murtha dismissed that vote as he promoted his coming plans regarding the war spending bill. "This vote will be the most important vote in changing the direction on this war," he said of his proposal. "This vote will limit the options of the president and should stop the surge."

To many Democrats, that was not only impolitic, it was disloyal.

"He stepped all over Speaker Pelosi's message of support for the troops," said Rep. Jim Cooper (Tenn.). "That was not team play, to put it mildly."

Even after that Web appearance, some senior Democratic aides say Murtha might well have been able to save his plan if he had quickly laid it out before the Democratic caucus and marshaled Democratic leaders behind a defense. Instead, the House recessed for a week, Murtha disappeared from the media, and Democratic leaders were silent, saying they could not discuss Iraq legislation because no real plan existed.

In the face of an unanswered Republican assault, the Democratic rank-and-file cracked -- on the left and the right.

"While we're all for troop readiness, we're all for them having all the equipment they want," Matheson, the Utah Democrat, said, "I'd be very concerned about doing anything that would hamstring resources and commanders on the ground."

Indeed, Matheson and other Blue Dogs said the Democrats should concentrate on oversight hearings on Iraq policy, while refraining from binding legislation on the war.

The party's newly elected Iraq veterans favor a more straightforward approach than Murtha, establishing a legal timetable for pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq, Sestak said. And the party's antiwar left is no less unhappy with what they see as half measures from Murtha.

"Congress has the authority, and I know it has the responsibility, to get us out of there. And we should use every means possible," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (Calif.), a co-chairman of the Out of Iraq Caucus.

Rep. Barbara Lee (Calif.), another co-chairman who sits on the Appropriations Committee, is likely to try to tie the war spending bill to legislation demanding a withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq by a date certain, with the bill's money available only for the safe withdrawal of the troops.

Such legislation was precisely what Murtha hoped to head off with his recent Internet appearance, said Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), who helped connect him with MoveCongress.org. And Moran still believes the appearance ultimately will work to the Democrats' favor. "The cognoscenti is upset because he's not under their control," Moran said. "They would prefer he release his plan to a think tank, but he decided he wanted to communicate directly. He doesn't trust the way the media filters what he says and does. He understands the power of being able to communicate."

War Critic Faces Test On Iraq Spending Bill (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

JOHNSTOWN, Pa., Feb. 23 — As Democratic Congressional leaders escalate their challenge to the Bush administration's policy in Iraq, one of the most influential players will be that unlikely darling of the antiwar left, Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Murtha's power comes not just from his role as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, in charge of the huge spending bill for the war that will advance in the House in March. It also derives from his close alliance with Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and from his popularity, ever since he called for an end to the war in 2005, among the party's antiwar base — at the grass-roots level, among liberal Internet communities, and in the House.

"He has the aura of a folk hero among the legions who want to get out of Iraq," said Tom Matzzie, Washington director of MoveOn.org.

Still, Mr. Murtha faces an extraordinary political challenge over the next month, and some Democrats are already worried about his handling of it. As they consider the president's nearly $100 billion spending request for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, Democrats must find a way to satisfy an antiwar wing that wants clear progress toward winding down the war — the Out of Iraq Caucus claims a third of the House Democrats — while producing legislation palatable to the party's conservatives and centrists.

Mr. Murtha says he will meet with the Democratic leadership on Wednesday to talk about his plans; a spokesman for Ms. Pelosi said she had yet to sign off on any proposal. But the ideas Mr. Murtha has floated over the past month — attaching restrictions to the financing, and requiring the Pentagon to meet clear standards on readiness, training and equipment for troops about to be deployed to Iraq — have already drawn substantial criticism. Mr. Murtha has argued that his approach both protects American forces and makes Mr. Bush's troop buildup plan impossible to sustain.

But some Democrats said they feared that the Murtha approach could amount to Congressional overreaching, an attempt to micromanage the war. "Congress is a blunt instrument," said Representative Joe Sestak of Pennsylvania, a retired admiral and a critic of the war, who added that he had the "greatest respect" for Mr. Murtha but was "wary."

"There may be unknown ramifications, unintended unknown ramifications, when you get on the operational level," Mr. Sestak said.

Republicans say Mr. Murtha is leading a stealthy effort to cut financing for the troops. "When you hamstring the Pentagon with burdensome standards and hold the funding over the Pentagon's head, that's somewhere between irresponsible and dangerous," said Brian Kennedy, spokesman for Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader. And Vice President Dick Cheney took repeated shots at Mr. Murtha and Ms. Pelosi this week while traveling in Japan.

Back home in his district, Mr. Murtha, a 33-year veteran of the House, stole a few days away from the political maelstrom. Every inch the traditional congressman from Western Pennsylvania, he paid tribute to the Boy Scouts at a dinner Thursday and vowed to keep fighting for organized labor at a breakfast on Friday. He rarely mentioned his opposition to the war in his public remarks, although he told local reporters he believed that sometime over the next few months, Congressional Democrats would reach some compromise with the White House on Iraq.

For all of President Bush's vows to pursue his policies in Iraq, Mr. Murtha argued, "They can't continue this direction.

"They can say that, just like they said they weren't going to fire Rumsfeld two weeks before the election," he added, referring to the dismissal of Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary immediately after the election. "But in the end, you can't sustain a war if you don't have public support."

Of Mr. Cheney's remarks, Mr. Murtha said, "They're striking out because they have no answers."

Mr. Murtha has his critics, but he has an enormously powerful friend in Ms. Pelosi, a political relationship of which House Democrats are keenly aware. Mr. Murtha said Ms. Pelosi had "the best political mind of any speaker I've dealt with" and was a better speaker for the quick-response era of modern politics than even "my mentor, Tip O'Neill."

Ms. Pelosi has returned the favor, often telling colleagues that Mr. Murtha's decision to oppose the war in the fall of 2005 transformed the debate and helped the Democrats recapture the House. "She's said it on more than one occasion," said Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, a vice chairman of the Democratic caucus. Mr. Murtha's shift on the war carried special weight; he is a Vietnam veteran and retired Marine colonel, and one of the House's most respected members on military matters.

The proof of Ms. Pelosi's loyalty came when she backed Mr. Murtha in his failed campaign to become majority leader. And she defended him again last week, when he was widely criticized for granting a lengthy online interview to MoveCongress.org, an antiwar group, just when House Democrats were trying to build a bipartisan majority on the nonbinding resolution against Mr. Bush's troop buildup.

Organizers said they conducted that interview to reassure antiwar activists that Democrats would not stop with a nonbinding resolution, which many on the left believed was too little, too late. But Representative Walter B. Jones, a North Carolina Republican who backed the resolution, said Mr. Murtha's interview had scared some Republicans who were against the troop increase.

Republican leaders seized on the interview, Mr. Jones said, and used it to hold the line. "If he had made his comments after the vote, we could have picked up five to eight more Republicans," Mr. Jones said.

That episode underscores the broader challenge facing House Democratic leaders. Representative James P. Moran, a Virginia Democrat, said Mr. Murtha needed to pay attention not only to anxious centrists and moderates, who are worried that he will go too far, but also to antiwar Democrats who have promised "that they will not vote for one more dollar for support for Iraq."

Mr. Moran added, "If we get hit from both the left and the right, it may be problematic."

In the end, Democratic leaders were counting on Murtha the legislator as much as Murtha the folk hero. "He's a realist, and he's trying to find a majority on the House floor," said one House Democratic strategist.

Mr. Murtha said, "We're working our way through this," but he argued that time — and public opinion — were inexorably on his side.

Iraq: Democrats Vow To Keep Pressure On Bush (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136495

WASHINGTON — When Congress returns to work this week after its holiday recess, Democratic leaders promise to confront President Bush even more forcefully over his Iraq war strategy.

Senate Democrats are moving to modify the 2002 resolution that authorized the war to place new limits on the role of U.S. forces in Iraq.

But it is uncertain whether they will fare any better in this effort than in their last try — an unsuccessful attempt to pass a symbolic resolution opposing the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq.

That resolution passed the House but stalled in the Senate.

Now, Senate Democrats are looking at bringing to a vote a stronger measure, one that would limit the mission of U.S. forces. The measure, which has not been drafted, might restrict military operations to going after Al Qaeda operatives and to supporting and training the Iraqi army. And it might set March 2008 as a goal for withdrawing troops that are not involved in that narrower mission.

Democrats contend that conditions have changed since Congress authorized the invasion to topple Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, and some of the reasons for the war have since been shown to be unfounded.

"Saddam is gone," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who has introduced legislation that would require the president to return to Congress at the end of this year to extend the war authorization. "Iraq in fact had no weapons of mass destruction."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) are working on the proposal to set new limits for the U.S. mission in Iraq.

Democratic leaders plan to gauge support for the measure within their caucus. But this latest Democratic effort was already drawing strong Republican criticism.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) panned the proposal as "a Goldilocks resolution: one that is hot enough for the radical left wing, but cool enough for party leaders to claim that they are 'for the troops.' "

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), said Democrats wanted to keep the heat on Republicans. "There is no single piece of legislation that will bring this war to an end, but Democrats will continue to look at ways to force the president to change course," he said.

To overcome a filibuster — or override a presidential veto — Senate Democrats need GOP support to challenge the president's war strategy.

Seven Senate Republicans joined Democrats to vote for a debate on the anti-buildup resolution, but that still gave Democrats four fewer than the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

Democrats say they want to ratchet up political pressure on Republicans, especially those up for reelection next year in states where antiwar sentiment is running high.

Antiwar groups have targeted Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.), who is up for reelection in a state that ousted two House Republicans in November. Sununu voted against a debate on the troop resolution.

"What I don't know is what kind of reaction members are hearing from their constituents back home," Manley said. "But it's evident that the president and his Republican supporters on Capitol Hill are increasingly isolated and out of step with the American people."

Although the new Democratic efforts are aimed at turning up the political heat on Republicans, they could also make some Democrats uncomfortable. Those from conservative districts or states are fearful of taking a step that Republicans could portray as cutting funding to troops in harm's way or tying the commander in chief's hands in wartime.

One Democrat who supported the anti-buildup resolution expressed misgivings about a House effort to attach strings to the White House's latest war-funding request, such as setting troop-readiness standards for deployments.

"It raises constitutional and practical questions to have 535 members of Congress micromanaging troop deployments," said Rep. Chet Edwards (D-Texas). "A more appropriate approach would be for Congress to reconsider the authorization of war or to set deadlines for bringing U.S. troops home."

One prominent Republican war critic, Rep. Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, has come out against any cut in funding for troops.

"We must take great care to ensure that any effort to provide for our armed forces not be used as a proxy for resolving larger issues concerning the war in Iraq," Jones said in a letter to Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Penn.). "Any attempt to 'starve' the war as a way of bringing it to a conclusion, rather than through a serious policy debate about the best way forward in Iraq, would be wrong."

Murtha, chairman of the House defense appropriations subcommittee, has announced plans to sponsor legislation to ban the deployment of units that do not meet strict readiness standards.

Republicans in turn are continuing to dare Democrats to bring to a vote a resolution opposing any cut in funding for the troops.

Democrats, who hold a 51-49 majority in the Senate, also must tread carefully. There has been speculation that Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut independent who caucuses with the Democrats, would join the GOP if Democrats cut funding for the troops. Such a move would hand control of the Senate to the Republicans.

Last week, Lieberman, one of the strongest Senate supporters of a troop buildup, said that he had "no desire or intention" to leave the Democratic caucus.

Governors Warn Of Troop Buildup's Impact On Guard (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — Republican and Democratic governors meeting here Saturday warned that President Bush's "surge" of additional troops to Iraq would put added pressure on National Guard units already stretched to their limits.

"We the governors rely on the Guard to respond to natural disasters, a pandemic or terrorist attack," said North Carolina Gov. Michael F. Easley, a Democrat. "Currently, we don't have the manpower or the equipment to perform that dual role" of responding to both state and federal needs.

The Pentagon last week announced plans to send 14,000 National Guard members to Iraq next year as support for the 21,500 troops to be deployed under Bush's plan. The announcement came on the heels of a change in Pentagon policy to deploy Guard troops more frequently but to limit tours to a year; the average now is 18 months.

Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican, said the federal government must follow through on its pledge to replace equipment taken by Guard troops to Iraq.

"Those promises need to be kept," Pawlenty said. "We'll be able to test that, because we have a significant number coming back this summer. We'll be able to see if the equipment comes back."

The governors' willingness to challenge the buildup reflects overall impatience with Washington, which has inspired a slew of state initiatives to tackle such issues as global warming, energy efficiency and healthcare.

Eighty-eight percent of stateside Army National Guard units are "very poorly equipped," with less than half of what they need to respond to a domestic crisis, Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum testified a few weeks ago to the independent Commission on the National Guard and Reserves.

Blum, chief of the National Guard Bureau, coordinates between the states and the Pentagon.

He said 45% of Air National Guard units lacked the necessary equipment to deploy.

Last month, National Guard officials notified commanders in Arkansas, Indiana, Oklahoma and Ohio that their combat brigades — each about 3,500 strong — might be the first to return to Iraq under the new guidelines, redeploying between January and July of next year. All four states sent troops to Afghanistan and Iraq in 2004. Under the old rules, Oklahoma was not scheduled to be called on again until 2010; the other three states, 2009.

In interviews, National Guard officials in Arkansas, Indiana and Oklahoma said their units were short on rifles and other basic equipment.

"We are hurting in equipment nationally, Guard-wide," said Lt. Col. Deedra Thombleson of the Indiana National Guard.

Governors, in town for a National Governors Assn. meeting, plan to raise the issue Monday at a White House session with Bush. Guard officials plan to talk to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates about it Tuesday.

"We will do all that we can to support the effort, but getting the equipment to do that will be a challenge," said Maj. Gen. Roger Lempke, head of the Nebraska National Guard and president of the Adjutants General Assn. of the United States.

Equipping the Guard is of particular concern in states such as California and Florida, where troops are routinely called to respond to natural disasters like hurricanes and forest fires.

"We want to protect our troops and make sure they have what they need to deal with natural disasters," said Florida Gov. Charlie Crist, a Republican.

Gov. Easley of North Carolina called National Guard equipment levels across the country "putridly inadequate."

And without adequate equipment, he said, the National Guard's role in the buildup would amount to "a squandered mobilization."

With plans to increase the frequency of Guard deployments — now once every six years — North Dakota Gov. John Hoeven, a Republican, said that getting enough troops for a second rotation in Iraq was "a concern."

The governors association president, Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat who has advocated sending National Guard troops to secure the U.S.-Mexico border, said the Guard was "being stretched" to respond to the buildup.

DOJ_NMG_0136497

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, is reviewing the plans with his National Guard leadership to assess the impact on the state. He has advocated doing what's necessary to ensure success in Iraq but said he would not support a policy jeopardizing California's safety.

11 Days Till Baghdad (WP)

By David Finkel, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Crucial to the President's New Strategy for Iraq, A Commander and His Soldiers Head Into War

FORT RILEY, Kan. -- Their camouflage on, their wives carrying infants, their older children carrying flags, the soldiers of George W. Bush's surge crowded into a gymnasium for their brigade deployment ceremony, a last public viewing before they disappeared into Iraq.

Baghdad, long an abstraction, was now imminent. Of the 21,500 additional troops President Bush decided to send to Iraq in the coming months, about 3,500 were coming from here. "Are you frightened?" a TV reporter called out. "I'm confident," one of those soldiers replied. An enormous American flag hung on the back wall. A military band lined up in formation. "Ready to go," another soldier said.

Outside, snow was coming toward this isolated place. Inside, as the bleachers filled and the doors swung closed against the cold, a 41-year-old soldier near the middle of the floor began clapping his hands in anticipation.

And now waved at his wife and children.

And now took his position in front of the soldiers he would soon be leading into combat.

This was Lt. Col. Ralph Kauzlarich, the commander of an Army battalion called the 2-16 -- the 2nd Battalion, 16th Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Brigade Combat Team, 1st Infantry Division. The unit has 800 soldiers, most in their late teens and deploying to Iraq for the first time under the command of a man who, in this gymnasium filled with believers, was among the biggest believers of all.

"We are America," is how Kauzlarich would describe his belief a few days later, just before boarding a plane that would take him and his soldiers for a year's deployment into the center of an increasingly unpopular war. "This nation can do anything that it wants to do."

Down the hill, in another part of Fort Riley, a different ceremony was underway. That one, a private memorial service, was for a 21-year-old sergeant from a different battalion who five days before was traveling through northern Iraq when a makeshift bomb detonated near his vehicle, making him one of 25 American troops to die that day in the war.

The ceremony in the gym was a celebration, however, and now, from the band, came a stirring series of notes from a trumpet, followed by a moment of quiet, interrupted by a single boom of a bass drum so sudden and explosive it caused people to flinch, including some of the soldiers.

Ralph Kauzlarich, who perhaps would be an American hero a year from now, or perhaps would be an American tragedy, didn't flinch, though. Instead, just for a moment, he smiled.

What is it like to be a soldier in an unpopular war? To be part of a troop increase that the American public is overwhelmingly against, and to lead 800 soldiers into a war being described as "barbaric" and a "meat grinder" and the result of a "failed policy" and down to "the last chance" and "lost"?

"What we're about to do is going to change every one of our lives," Kauzlarich told his command staff at a meeting the day after the ceremony, which had concluded with handshakes from people who would grab onto him and lock onto his eyes, as if they were already trying to remember the last time they saw Ralph Kauzlarich. "And it'll all be okay," he continued, "as long as we win."

So fiercely does Kauzlarich believe this -- that the war can be won and that it will be won -- it can seem as if he is the one grabbing onto something, in this case the idea that victory is a matter not only of strategy and tactics, but of sheer willpower as well. A true believer's certainty: This is Kauzlarich's, who at 8 years old announced to his family that when he grew up he wanted to be "a leader of men," became the youngest Eagle Scout ever in his home state of Montana, attended West Point, became an Army Ranger, served in Desert Storm, served in Afghanistan, played a controversial role in the Army review of the friendly-fire death of Cpl. Pat Tillman, served a special-operations tour in Iraq, has climbed steadily through the officer ranks, and has yet to experience military failure.

As one of his soldiers said: "He's the kind of guy you follow to hell and back. He's that kind of leader."

He has never lost a soldier under his command. "No, I have not had to contend with that yet," he said. He has never had a soldier of his even get hurt, has never loaded a wounded soldier of his onto a stretcher, or treated a bleeding soldier of his on a battlefield, or notified a family that their beloved child, or husband, or father, had died. "I've talked to families that have lost sons in combat," he said, but those conversations were well after the fact and didn't involve soldiers who were directly his.

That, he imagines, will change. "Statistically, there's probably a pretty good chance I'm going to lose men," he said, and like so many things that would happen in the 11 days between the deployment ceremony on Jan. 25 and his actual departure on Feb. 5, the statement seemed both factual and heartbreaking. Ironies and bittersweet juxtapositions are inescapable in wartime, and these days weren't any exception.

One day came news that two soldiers and 250 insurgents had died during all-day gun battles that were unusually fierce, even by the standards of Iraq; that was the day Kauzlarich, his wife and three children all put on matching outfits of blue jeans and white shirts and went to Sears for a family portrait.

Another day: "I looked at Ralph's body armor today, and picked it up, and felt it," Kauzlarich's father -- who had flown in with his wife to say goodbye, and had gone to his son's office, and had hoisted the armor, and had heard medics boast that they could get a wounded soldier to a hospital from anywhere in Baghdad in 15 minutes max, and had been spared the detail that snipers had begun aiming at soldiers' thighs in order to pierce the femoral artery -- said at dinner. There was ham. There were twice-baked potatoes. There was a Betty Crocker cookbook open on the counter. There was an apple crisp in the oven.

Earlier, out of his son's earshot, the father, whose name is also Ralph Kauzlarich, said: "I have feelings. I have fears. I know he could get injured. I know he could not get back. But I know what he feels, too. He believes this."

His eyes had gotten a little wet as he said this, but now, eyes back to dry, merely nodding, he ate ham and potatoes and listened as his son described the first time he had come under fire in Desert Storm, how he had thought he might die, how he hadn't.

"Okay, there's a reason I'm here," Kauzlarich said he decided that day, as his parents listened, and his wife, Stephanie, went to get the apple crisp out of the oven, and his 7-year-old daughter, Allie, climbed onto his lap for a hug, and his son Jacob, who was born just after Sept. 11, 2001, slid laughing across the floor on his belly. "I wasn't afraid of anything from that point on."

Later:

"That's all you want to be buried with?" Stephanie asked.

Kauzlarich was filling out something called the Family Contingency Workbook.

I want to be buried, cremated: Buried.

Location of Cemetery: West Point.

Personal effects I want buried with me: Wedding Band.

Yes, he told Stephanie, whom he had met when they were students at West Point and who hadn't exactly been seduced by his first words to her, which were: "You can call me The Kauz." That was all he wanted to be buried with.

Type of head stone: Military.

Scripture you want read: Psalm 23.

Music you want played: Something upbeat.

"Ralph, upbeat music?" Stephanie asked.

"I don't want people to be sad at my funeral," Kauzlarich said.

His soldiers -- average age 19, the oldest 46, the youngest 17 -- were filling out forms, too. Getting their wills in order. Designating powers of attorney. Working down final medical checklists: teeth, hearing, heart, blood pressure, blood type.

As part of a battalion that has been in almost every American conflict since the Civil War, these newest soldiers of the 2-16 had been training for a year for some type of mission, though they didn't know any details. When their deployment to Iraq became official in late 2006, they were told they would be protecting fuel convoys coming into the country from Jordan. But then Bush's troop increase was announced, along with a strategy shift toward counterinsurgency warfare, and now the soldiers were hearing that their mission would involve patrols somewhere in Baghdad.

Where exactly, and what exactly, were still a mystery to them. Kauzlarich knew. So did his top commanders. Every day, they would disappear for a while into a secure room at battalion headquarters to learn more about the area they would be trying to bring under control. "A mean and nasty little place," Kauzlarich said when he emerged one day, and meanwhile his soldiers continued to prepare for whatever.

"What in the hell?" asked Command Sgt. Maj. Michael McCoy, the battalion's top enlisted man, as he inspected lines of soldiers who stood at attention in the parking lot in their body armor, acting as if the wind wasn't making the temperature feel barely above zero. Straps weren't tight enough, ceramic plates intended to stop bullets were an inch off, medical kits containing compression bandages and tourniquets were attached to the left side instead of the right. "Consistency," McCoy reminded them.

What if it was dark? What if in that dark another soldier was trying to find your medical kit, and you couldn't help him because you were too busy bleeding, and you couldn't direct him because you were too busy screaming?

They had briefings on health risks. Wash your hands. Don't smoke. Drink bottled water. Wear ear protection. Wear cotton underwear. Watch out for rats. "From what I hear, the forward operating base we're going to is right next to a sewage plant," said one of the briefers. And then came a chaplain who began: "All right. Stress management. Suicide prevention. Let's go." And on he went. "This is important. If you are not ready to die, you need to get there. If you are not ready to die, you need to be. If you are not ready to see your friends die, you need to be."

They had battle training, too, one day mounting up in mockups of Humvees that were surrounded by video screens showing all kinds of hellish scenarios. They were trying to maneuver to a downed helicopter. That was the exercise. There was an explosion, a suicide bomber, an ambush. One of the Humvees was hit. Two soldiers were dead. Three were alive. "You're talking about somebody who's on fire," came the directions to soldiers in one of the other Humvees, who were on their way to attempt a rescue. "You're talking about someone whose fingers are burning off. They can't reach over and unbuckle their seatbelt. You've got to get them out . . ." and meanwhile one of the "wounded" soldiers began crying theatrically, "I want to live! I want to live!"

This was Spec. Ryan Nyhus, 19, of whom Kauzlarich said: "The kid's heart is as big as a basketball. He's a superstar." A superstar now, but a year and a half ago he was a high school wrestler in Wisconsin who didn't get the college scholarship he'd hoped for, and so was open to a suggestion from a friend that they join the Army together. Nyhus was sworn in first. Then came the friend's turn, and as he raised his hand, someone noticed that he had signed his name on the enrollment form in the wrong place, and as Nyhus tells it the friend took it as a sign from God "and walked out. Went home. Now he's really big into photography."

Eight hundred soldiers, 800 stories.

McCoy's: Age 44, wife, two children, career Army. "My job is not to die for my country," he said. "It's to see how many of those bastards I can kill for their country."

Staff Sgt. Frank Gietz, 41: two Iraq tours already, the last one doing convoy escorts in which 18 of 132 soldiers in his company were killed, now in charge of a platoon of 32, one of whom asked him just before Christmas how to deal with having to kill somebody. "Yeah, it worried me," Gietz said. "That's why I talked to him for two hours." And said? "Put it in a dark place while you're there."

Pvt. Mario Luna, 17: He asked Gietz the question. He asked it because a girl he had been talking to asked it of him. "And that got me all wound up," Luna said, so Gietz told him to look at the thing he was about to shoot at "as a target, not as a person, and that got me back in the game."

Eight hundred -- and every one was now the responsibility of Kauzlarich, who kept disappearing into the secure room and reappearing with adjustments and refinements.

"I am right now vetting an initiative in which all of us grow mustaches," he told his command staff at one of their daily meetings. Maybe it would foster trust when they moved along the streets of Baghdad, he explained, because Iraqis regard a man with facial hair as a man and a man without facial hair as a boy. "Any advantage we can get," he said, and then he looked at the men he was talking to and wondered aloud: "Can you grow mustaches? I look at you. You've all got such baby faces."

The meeting continued, and meanwhile, outside Kauzlarich's office, Staff Sgt. Jeremy Hodges, 27, one of those baby faces, his with a round scar in a cheek that led to another scar on the back of his neck, told the story of what it was like to get shot in Iraq on July 21, 2006.

"Everything went dark," he said.

And: "I remember the moaning. I remember the gurgling sound in my throat."

And: "I thought it was my last breath of air that day, until I realized the pain was going to last forever."

And: "Hey sir," he wrote during his recuperation, in an e-mail to an officer he had met a few years before who had told him "what a great soldier I was" and "how much confidence he had in me," and who had been "kind of like a father figure to me," and had said Hodges would always be welcome in his command and had single-handedly persuaded him to reenlist.

"I asked him if he still wanted me," Hodges said. "I told him I was broken."

"I don't care," Kauzlarich wrote back. "I'll take care of you. When can I expect you?"

And here Hodges was, one of the 800, ready to tell any of the other 799 what it is like to get shot. Not that they'd asked. "They just kind of stare at me and wonder," Hodges said. But if they did ask, "I'd tell them it hurts."

***

They packed ammunition and photographs and first-aid kits and candy. They went into town and in a few cases drank too much, and in a few other cases went AWOL. Five days before departure, Kauzlarich studied a list of soldiers who wouldn't be able to go. Seven needed some sort of surgery. Two were about to have babies. One had an infant in intensive care. Two were in jail. Two (including Luna) would have to stay back until they turned 18. Nine were, for various reasons, "mentally incapable of doing what we're about to do."

But most could do what they were about to do, were eager to, impatient even, and said so in no uncertain terms.

"You ready?" McCoy asked soldier after soldier during another body armor inspection.

"Roger, Sergeant Major!"

"You sure?"

"Roger, Sergeant Major!"

"It's the decisive point of the fight," one soldier explained later, foot tapping, head nodding, practically vibrating. "This is the chance to win it."

Belief, then. Kauzlarich remembers the day he realized how strong a force it could be. He was in Fort Benning, Ga., for advanced coursework, and at the end of an exercise, as he and other soldiers waited outside for a ride, a visiting soldier from Sierra Leone explained how he had survived that country's various wars.

"In my country, we put on a blouse. It is a magic blouse. When I wear it, I know bullets cannot harm me," Kauzlarich recalls him saying. The soldier then rolled up a sleeve of his magic blouse. "Let me show you," he said. "Give me a knife." Someone gave him a knife. "Watch," he said, and Kauzlarich watched incredulously as the soldier swung the knife, which had a four-inch, razor-sharp blade, down on his soft inner forearm. It went easily through the skin. It went through veins. It went through muscle. It went all the way down to the bone, and for one belief-filled moment everyone waited for the healing to begin -- and then the soldier collapsed.

"That's a form of belief," Kauzlarich said of what he learned that day. "That's also a form of jackassery."

What about Iraq's believers, though? The ones for whom a briefing about suicide would focus on how to do it in order to kill as many American soldiers as possible, rather than on how to prevent it? The ones who believe as surely as Kauzlarich believes, and who are presumably waiting for him?

"Who will win?" he said, rephrasing the questions. "I will win."

He thought about his answer.

"Is that belief or confidence?" he asked. "Is it confidence, or is it overconfidence? Those are questions I have to ask myself. Because if it's overconfidence, it's arrogance."

He thought some more.

"I will win," he said again.

Three days until departure now. Kauzlarich wanted his soldiers to have these last days off to be with their families, who had come here from a dozen states and filled every hotel room in town, but first he gathered them on a field behind battalion headquarters to tell them the details of what they were about to do. It had snowed, and it was cold, and the sun was going down as he said that they soon would be on the edge of Sadr City, Baghdad's infamous and violent slum. The soldiers ringed him and pressed closer to hear, and as he raised his voice, his words about "initiative" and "paranoia" and "emotion" echoed off the ice and the surrounding buildings, making this place feel even chillier than it was.

"Now it's not a game, guys," he said. "You are going to see some horrific things in the next year. You are going to see some things you are not going to understand. . . .

"It's down to nut-cutting time, and we're going to get some, but we're going to do it in a disciplined manner, like we do everything. . . .

"I am absolutely confident in your abilities, absolutely confident. . . .

"The bottom line is this weekend's your last, okay? So call your parents, love your families, stay focused on them for this weekend. Not later than Tuesday night, as soon as you get on that airplane and that airplane takes off, your sole focus is going to be winning our nation's war."

There was a pause, just long enough for the word "war" to echo and evaporate, and then the soldiers began to cheer, loudly and for a while, and then they left the field and headed inside the battalion building, filling room after room not with a soldier's bloodlust, which would come soon enough, but with the wintry smell of boys who have been out in the snow.

And then it was departure day, and in the Kauzlarich house a phone call came at 8:30 a.m. saying there had been a death.

The family, by then, was wide awake. The children were running around with stuffed animals purchased over the weekend, each with a memory chip containing a quick recorded message from their father for them to play over the coming year. "Hi Jacob. I love you." "Hi Garrett. I sure do love you." "I love you, Allie-gator."

And so came one more juxtaposition: "Sir, there's been a casualty forward," the caller said.

DOJ_NMG_0136501

The dead soldier, who in coming days would be identified as the 3,100th U.S. fatality of the war, wasn't in Kauzlarich's battalion, but his brother was, and that's why Kauzlarich was being called. The parents didn't know yet. They were somewhere in the area visiting their son who was about to deploy, and a search for them was underway. Did Kauzlarich happen to know where they were saying goodbye to one son, so they could be informed that their other son had died?

He hung up. He pictured the soldier -- not the dead one, whom he didn't know, but the one in his battalion, who of course would now not be going to Iraq, at least not right away. He made some calls. No luck. More calls.

The morning continued. Seven-year-old Allie wanted his attention; the night before, after saying she had a headache, and then saying she might have a fever, she had said, "I don't want you to leave," and when he told her, "I'll be okay, and if I'm not okay, you'll be okay because I'll be checking on you," she had said, "Then I'll kill myself so I can be with you." The boys, too young for such sensitivities, ran around the house clobbering each other as usual, while Stephanie had her own images to contend with.

"Gray. Dismal. A very sad place to live," is how she would picture the place her husband was going when she would close her eyes. She had done her time in the Army after graduating from West Point, and she had a soldier's guarded sense of sentimentality, but now came a new image, that of a freshly dead soldier. She had been keeping any doubts about the mission to herself. "He believes in this," she had explained one day. But this day was different. "You better come back," she now said.

Belief vs. uncertainty: Such was the subtext in 800 places that morning as the Army continued its search for two parents and a son. The soldiers would be leaving in two groups over the next 24 hours. The first group was due at battalion headquarters at 1 p.m., and at 12:42 the first hug was underway in the parking lot, a tangle of moving arms that was still going strong at 12:43. By 12:45, tears had begun in several places, including inside a car where a woman sat motionless against the door, head in her hands, and so it continued as the afternoon progressed.

The soldiers smoked. They got their guns. They lined up their body armor. They waited, checking their watches, with wives, girlfriends, children, parents, grandparents. "I seen 'em off in World War II," said the grandfather of a private named Ricky Andrus. "I had a brother who was killed. A pilot on a B-24. He went down in the Mediterranean. He was 20 years old." Which was one year younger than Andrus, who was loading the family car with things he wouldn't be taking, including a pair of cowboy boots whose top halves had been dyed a beautiful blue.

A sergeant named Johnathan Pritchett, meanwhile, was kissing a young woman who was up on her tiptoes, while Gietz told his platoon to start wrapping up the goodbyes already, while Nyhus stood alone on a loading dock and recounted the advice he'd gotten the night before during a call with his friend the photographer. "Keep your head down," the friend had said.

Three p.m. now, and Kauzlarich arrived with Stephanie and the children. "This day sucks," he said. The soldier and his parents still hadn't been found, but it was only a matter of time now, and Kauzlarich understood there would be ripples as word began seeping out, first through the soldier's squad, then his platoon, then the battalion. Blood through a magic blouse; that's what the effect of this death would be. "There's nothing good about it," Kauzlarich said, and when he began saying goodbye to his family and Allie started to cry, something she hadn't done all the other times he had left, that only made things worse.

He said goodbye to his family in his office. He said goodbye again when he put them in the car. He said goodbye again when they didn't leave right away, just stayed in the car, and then he went back into his office and into the final hours.

Computer: packed. BlackBerry: packed. Extra tourniquet: packed. Extra compression bandage: packed. Family photo: packed. Lights: off. He shut the door to his office. He ducked into another office when Jeremy Hodges, who would be staying behind to recuperate, called to him. "Thank you. I will," Kauzlarich said, and walked on. "Jeremy Hodges. Great American," he said, and then he made his way to a nearby gymnasium for one last ceremony, this one with no TV cameras, no trumpets, no drum. Just soldiers sitting on bleachers, eating cookies and waiting to be bused to a plane and listening to one last speech.

"This is going to be hard. Probably the hardest thing you've ever done," the speech began. "But it's going to be okay."

It was the same thing Kauzlarich had said a few days before to his command staff, but this time it was a general talking while Kauzlarich stood to the side, bouncing up and down on the balls of his feet and looking at row after row of soldiers, every one of them his.

What if they die?

And what if he dies?

Would such a death, in such a war as this war has become, be worthwhile?

"It's worthwhile if we win," Kauzlarich said. "But to sacrifice, there's got to be a purpose. And if we don't win, then our sacrifices are going to be in vain."

"Good luck and Godspeed," the general said, ending his speech, and then it was time to go.

DOJ_NMG_0136502

Out went the soldiers, funneling into single file to get through the exit doors. They had learned in training to avoid such a formation. Too easy for the enemy to get them. "The fatal funnel," it was called. But here, there was no enemy, only Kauzlarich, the man who had yet to fail, clapping them on their backs as they moved past.

"Ready?" he asked.

"Yessir."

"Good?"

"Yessir."

"Ready to be a hero?"

"Yessir."

Out they went, one by one, hundreds of them, until there was only one soldier left for Kauzlarich to speak to.

"Are we ready for war?" he asked himself, and then out he went, too, onto a bus, onto a plane, into Kuwait to regroup with his soldiers, and as of this week, into the heart of Baghdad, where any moment now their surge will begin for real.

He Wrote The Book. Can He Follow It? (WP)

By Sarah Sewall

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

If anyone can save Iraq, it's David H. Petraeus, the ultimate can-do general. Installed in Baghdad earlier this month, he's bringing in his A-team and rolling up his sleeves. The question for the history books is before us: Will he be an alchemist, fusing existing elements of a moribund strategy with his knowledge and willpower to erase the United States' biggest mistake since the Vietnam War? Or does success in Iraq require more than is humanly possible?

Many of Petraeus's strongest supporters fear that his new assignment is a no-win mission, one that could not only stain his professional reputation but also, ironically, discredit the new counterinsurgency doctrine he spent the past year creating.

Petraeus is almost unique among senior Army leaders in fully embracing both the theory and practice of counterinsurgency. During two previous tours in Iraq, he provided relative security and fostered economic and political reform in Mosul and Nineveh province and later overhauled the coalition's training of Iraqi forces. He incorporated lessons from these experiences directly into FM 3-24, the revised counterinsurgency field manual whose preparation he oversaw. The new manual challenges the Army to think differently about how it conducts war.

That's why, as director of a human rights center, I supported his efforts by cosponsoring the doctrine revision seminar and helping shape the field manual. It features such counterintuitive paradoxes as "Sometimes, the more you protect your force, the less secure you may be," and "Some of the best weapons do not shoot."

The paradoxes challenge much U.S. military experience in Iraq over the past four years. Winning, the manual says, requires first ensuring the security and well-being of the civilian population -- the center of gravity in these wars. Counterinsurgent forces must integrate into the population, assuming more physical risk to soldiers, and other tools such as money, humanitarian assistance and construction projects are critical to the fight.

On the surface, President Bush's new "surge" strategy appears to coincide with Petraeus's approach to counterinsurgency: providing security for the population and allowing the host government to take charge. But if you hold the president's strategy up to the light of Petraeus's doctrine, there's only one conclusion you can draw: You can't get there from here. The Bush plan is burdened with three main deficiencies: too few capable U.S., allied and Iraqi counterinsurgent forces; weak U.S. efforts at promoting political and economic reform; and corrupt or feckless Iraqi institutions and leadership. The administration's strategy may have changed, but the supporting components have not. And even if the general asks his chain of command to address these shortfalls, it's unlikely that fixes can be found.

According to the new counterinsurgency field manual, the proper "troop-to-task" ratio for Baghdad requires 120,000 U.S. and allied security forces. During his confirmation hearings, Petraeus carefully predicted that the present numbers will rise to 85,000, but only with some important caveats: if there is a full surge of 21,500 additional U.S. troops (recent administration hints of stopping deployments midway through the increase raise questions about this, however), and if you count all Iraqi security forces (which presumes that the troops both report for duty and prove capable -- both large assumptions). If you also count private American and foreign security contractors and the Iraqi guards that protect government ministries, the counterinsurgent numbers increase by tens of thousands.

Petraeus has never denied that the numbers didn't add up to the ideal. Instead, he has said that he could accomplish the security mission by using these forces differently than they have been used in the past, aggressively pushing them out among the population that they are supposed to secure. Petraeus may conclude -- consistent with the field manual -- that he needs more

U.S. forces for a longer period of time. But given current political calculations in Washington, neither the administration nor Congress is likely to provide them.

Petraeus's counterinsurgency doctrine also holds that 80 percent of any counterinsurgency effort should be political. Yet the military has always been the 800-pound gorilla in Iraq. Petraeus is politely urging other government departments to play larger roles, and in particular to increase economic assistance to support the security effort. But the State Department can't even fill the civilian slots on the planned additional provincial reconstruction teams it is sending to Iraq; it has asked the Defense Department to provide military officers instead of foreign service officers. And no one has much confidence that State, Treasury or Justice Department support in Iraq will suddenly become effective -- particularly if security continues to disintegrate.

Finally, there is the field manual's mantra: It's the host government, stupid. Petraeus rightly points out that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is still young -- the fourth in 3 1/2 years. Bush's strategy is to provide the government with enough confidence and breathing room to make tough decisions and take decisive action. All good, except that virtually none of the institutions comprising Iraq's government function as advertised. Both the security apparatus and civilian agencies lack effective oversight or a meaningful national identity. The army, police and intelligence agencies are riddled with sectarian divisions and militia influence, while corruption and a lack of expertise erodes public trust in civilian bureaucracies that still cannot provide prewar levels of services.

Breathing space for this Iraqi government may provide life support, but not a cure. Only a soup-to-nuts overhaul focused on carefully vetting and training personnel and holding them accountable -- for years -- could realistically stem the rot. Given limitations in U.S. capacity and will, this is not feasible.

In addition to facing these jarring realities, an administration happy to return Petraeus to Baghdad should consider whether insurgency is even the right label for the sectarian bloodletting in Iraq. If it's really a civil war or worse, as the recent National Intelligence Estimate concluded, how much can an under-resourced counterinsurgency effort accomplish? In civil conflict, security requirements become paramount, in part because the political space for compromise has all but vanished. Stopping a civil war requires still more of the very resources and time that Petraeus currently lacks.

Placed in charge this late in the game, Petraeus should not have to carry the burden of Iraq's probable failure. Yet there is a silver lining in his appointment. Petraeus has the expertise to identify shortfalls and the likelihood of failure, and he has the credibility to force a political response. Even the president would have to take his assessments seriously. Petraeus vowed to provide forthright, professional military advice regarding the mission in Iraq. He testified that, by late summer, he should know whether the strategy is working. He promised to alert not just his immediate military superior, but Congress as well, if the strategy cannot succeed.

Petraeus may provide the ultimate service to the troops and the nation -- and seal his legacy -- not by winning, but by speaking the truth about Iraq.

Failing In Baghdad -- The British Did It First (WP)

By Toby Dodge

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

At the center of Baghdad's neglected North Gate War Cemetery, near the edge of the old city walls, stands an imposing grave. Sheltered from the weather by a grandiose red sandstone cupola, it is the final resting place of a man from whom George W. Bush could have learned a great deal about the perils of intervening in Iraq.

Lt. Gen. Sir Frederick Stanley Maude was head of the British army in Mesopotamia when he marched into Baghdad on a hot, dusty day in March 1917. Soon thereafter, he issued the British government's "Proclamation to the People of Baghdad," which eerily foreshadowed sentiments that Bush and his administration would express 86 years later: British forces, Maude declared, had entered the city not as conquerors, but as liberators.

Maude had arrived in Baghdad after a long and arduous military campaign. British forces had been fighting the Ottoman army for 2 1/2 years and had suffered one of the worst defeats of World War I in the six-month siege of the eastern city of Kut, which had ended in an ignominious surrender to the Turks in April 1916.

Having rallied from that loss and finally reached Baghdad, Maude tried to create common cause between the British army and the city's residents, whom he saw as having been oppressed by 400 years of Ottoman rule. "Your lands have been subject to tyranny," he declared in his proclamation, and "your wealth has been stripped from you by unjust men and squandered." He promised that it was not "the wish of the British Government to impose upon you alien institutions." Instead, he called on residents to manage their own civil affairs "in collaboration with the political representatives of Great Britain."

Maude did not live to see the failure of his efforts to rally the people of Iraq to the British occupation. He died eight months later, having contracted cholera from a glass of milk.

After his death, British policy toward Iraq changed repeatedly as the army attempted to dominate the country and suppress the population, while the government strove to adjust to Britain's diminished role in the international system after WWI. Initially, the aim was simply to annex the territory and make it part of the Empire, run in a fashion similar to India. But Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points speech in January 1918 did in that idea. In setting out America's vision for the postwar world, Wilson expressly attacked the duplicitous diplomacy of European imperialism, which he blamed for dragging the world into prolonged military conflict.

This meant that a modern, self-determining state was now to be built in Iraq. Britain was to take the lead, but its effort was to be continually scrutinized by the League of Nations, which had been set up under Wilson's watchful eye at the Paris Peace Conference at the end of the war.

In an echo of what is happening under the U.S. occupation, hopes for a joint Anglo-Iraqi pact to rebuild the country were dashed by a violent uprising. On July 2, 1920, a revolt, or thawra, broke out along the lower Euphrates, fueled by popular resentment of Britain's heavy-handed behavior in Iraq. The British army had set about taxing the population to pay for the building of the Iraqi state, while British civil servants running the administration refused to consult Iraqi politicians, judging them too inexperienced to play a role in the new government.

The rebellion quickly spread across the south and center of the country. Faced with as many as 131,000 insurgents armed with 17,000 modern rifles left over from the war, the British army needed eight months to regain full control of Iraq; 2,000 British troops were killed, wounded or taken prisoner and 8,450 Iraqis were killed. To make matters worse, the British government was forced to pour troops back into Iraq, long after the end of the war, to stabilize the situation.

The revolt forced Britain to devolve real power to Iraqi politicians. At the head of this new administration the British placed a newly created king, Faisal ibn Hussein, famous for his association with Lawrence of Arabia during the war. But the revolt had as much influence in Britain as it did in Iraq itself. The "blood and treasure" expended in putting down the violence made the continued occupation extremely unpopular. The public's discontent reached its peak in the general election campaign of November 1922. The leader of the opposition, conservative Andrew Bonar Law, captured the national mood when he declared: "We cannot alone act as the policeman of the world."

Newspapers and candidates organized their electioneering around the "bag and baggage" campaign demanding that Britain withdraw from Iraq as soon as it could. After defeating wartime coalition leaders David Lloyd George and Winston Churchill, the victorious Bonar Law pledged that "at the earliest possible moment, consistent with statesmanship and honour, the next government will reduce our commitments in Mesopotamia."

U.S. presidential candidates now campaigning to seize the White House in 2008 should be forewarned, however: It took Britain 10 more years to jettison its financial and military commitments to Iraq. During that period, a number of governments struggled to reduce the size of the forces deployed in Iraq and the amount of money being spent there. They strove for a decade to stabilize the country and meet Britain's pledges to the international community while trying to placate domestic opinion. The tensions involved in this exercise -- building a state from scratch with a hostile population, under severe budgetary constraints and in the face of rising domestic anger -- ultimately led to the failure of the whole exercise.

Like Maude's before him, Bush's policy in Iraq has resulted in a series of unintended outcomes. In the face of ever-increasing violence, the stirring rhetoric about Iraq becoming a beacon of democracy in the Middle East has been quietly dropped. Instead, the operation in Iraq has been placed on the frontline of the global fight against terrorism: It is better to battle terrorists on the streets of Baghdad than in Brooklyn or Houston, the mantra goes.

Where does this leave U.S. policy toward Iraq? Historical studies often divide military interventions into three general phases. The first phase, the initial decision to invade, is shaped by common misperceptions that the conflict will be short and that military force can be used to achieve political objectives. World War I began with an assumption that British troops would be home by Christmas; Bush declared "mission accomplished" after three weeks.

The second phase is marked by a slow realization that both these assumptions are wrong. The policy failure leads to increasingly desperate attempts to stay the course, to pour in ever greater numbers of troops, gambling on a resurrection of the initial policy. This middle stage comes to an end with the decision to disengage. Interestingly, this choice -- admitting defeat and going home -- is usually taken by a new government.

The 1920 revolt, followed by the change of government in London in 1922, led to a prolonged but largely unsuccessful attempt to do nation-building on the cheap. The final transformation of policy was marked by another change of government. The election of May 1929 resulted in a Labor administration. The new foreign policy team found it easier to identify the contradictions at the heart of Britain's relations with Iraq and find ways to overcome them. It recommended Iraq for unconditional membership to the League of Nations in 1932, unceremoniously dumping Britain's commitment to building a democratic and stable state.

Iraq became a fully independent state that same year. But it was unable to defend itself against its neighbors, or to impose order without assistance. The government was ultimately dependent on the British air force to guarantee its survival.

Eighty years later, after failing to stabilize Iraq, the U.S. government has come face to face with the high costs of the new "forward-leaning" foreign policy of the Bush doctrine. Comparisons with other military interventions suggest that Bush will continue to pursue a largely unvarying policy in Iraq, deploying all the troops and resources at his disposal in an attempt to correct the mistakes that have been made. The result, as the president himself has recognized, will be to push the difficult decisions about the future of U.S. involvement in Iraq onto his successor.

History, however, has two final disturbing lessons for the next president. The governing elite nurtured by the British to take their place -- the Iraqi royal family and their associates brought to the country in 1921 -- proved unfit for the purpose and were swept aside by a military coup in 1941. The British army was forced to reinvade and restore them to power. Yet even this second invasion was not enough. The violent instability that engulfed Iraq and resulted in the rise of Saddam Hussein was triggered by the murder of the royal family by Iraqi army officers in July 1958. The crime was committed in the name of Arab nationalism, as a strike against British interference in a sovereign Arab nation.

Here is what Britain's history of failure at building a democratic state in Iraq in the 1920s and '30s tells George W. Bush and his successors: If, like Gen. Maude, they fail to deliver on the promises of a better future for the Iraqi people, then Iraq will continue as a font of violent instability long after those who made the promises have been buried.

The Iraqis Down The Street (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

'HAVE you tried any of the new Iraqi restaurants over on Coldwater Canyon?"

That might sound odd today, but within a few years, Angelenos may very well come to learn more about Iraqi cuisine and culture than they ever could have imagined. There may develop a Little Mesopotamia — possibly with its own marker on the freeway — in the Valley, or maybe in the OC. You never know.

What's likely, though, is that this appreciation we'll gain of Iraqi culture will come about only after our troops have left that country and Baghdad is no longer a front-page dateline. Better late than never, I suppose.

Such a cycle — the time it takes for a major U.S. overseas commitment to ripple back into our nation's demographic fabric — isn't new. After all, how many Americans were going to Korean restaurants in 1952, or Vietnamese ones two decades later?

Two weeks ago, the White House announced that the U.S. would accept up to 7,000 Iraqi refugees by the end of this year. It's an initial trickle; we should be receiving more. Not just because it's the humane thing to do but because it serves our interests.

Throughout the 1990s, when Saddam Hussein was in power, the U.S. accepted tens of thousands of Iraqi refugees. But since the 2003 invasion, we've received fewer than 500 people from a nation in which sectarian violence has sent 2 million people into exile. It's hard to take refugees from a country that you are trying to pretend is a happily liberated place, relishing the peace and prosperity you've delivered to it. But that pretense is wearing thin, and in being more candid about the realities on the ground in Iraq, the Bush administration is going to have to allow more refugees from that country.

Ever since the federal government first recognized refugees as a distinct group in the aftermath of World War II, the U.S. has favored people fleeing from enemy states and places where we've intervened militarily. From 1982 to 2002, 80% of all refugees fell into those two categories, the largest group coming from Southeast Asia. It should come as little surprise that the U.S. welcomes few refugees from nations that it perceives as having no strategic value.

U.S. military intervention overseas has historically created lasting ties to those lands. In fact, the size of contemporary immigrant communities in this country is often directly related to the intensity of U.S. military interest in the refugees' home countries.

Thinking back to my own suburban Los Angeles upbringing, I'm struck by how many of my childhood friends and teenage dates were first linked to the U.S. by war. The Korean American classmates I studied with were, in a very real sense, the legacy of the Korean War. Filipinos were first linked to the U.S. by the Spanish-American War in 1898 and then came in large numbers after their role as allies in World War II. The Armenians who transformed my hometown in the 1980s were products of the Cold War. My college girlfriend, who transformed me, was Vietnamese.

We know now that as U.S. influence expands throughout the world, the world's influence expands here at home. And accepting refugees can improve the nation's image overseas.

"The more you have refugees entrenched here and becoming Americans, the more they export American values back home," said Georgetown University political scientist Yossi Shain. "Members of mobilized diasporas become ambassadors for the United States around the world." Of course, 7,000 refugees do not a diaspora make. But those numbers are likely to grow as the war lingers on. A quick military withdrawal could also lead to louder demands to assist the many Iraqis who have risked their lives for U.S. interests. In the months after the fall of Saigon in April 1975, the U.S. resettled 130,000 Vietnamese refugees. Many more followed.

"Seven thousand is not just a family," said University of Chicago sociologist Saskia Sassen. "They will come from many families and many communities, and they will build bridges back to these places. This is a form of soft diplomacy that benefits us in the long run." Although it won't likely alter our image among hard-liners, opening our doors to Arab Muslim refugees could help mold public opinion in the Middle East.

But whatever the final number of refugees may be, one day soon these new Iraqi arrivals and their children will be part of us. And as unlikely as it may seem at this dark hour, a war that has already killed tens of thousands of people may bring our two nations closer.

Bomb At Iraqi Mosque Kills 36 After Sunni Imam Condemns Militants (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 24 — A truck bomb detonated beside a Sunni mosque and public market near Falluja on Saturday, killing 36 people and wounding at least 62 more worshipers a day after the imam there condemned Sunni militants, according to Iraqi security authorities.

The blast, which struck during a prayer service in Habbaniya, a town between Falluja and Ramadi in one of the most dangerous areas of Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, was unusual in that such bombings are a staple of Sunni insurgents. Attacks of that sort are usually directed at Iraqi police and soldiers, or at Shiite sites or mixed neighborhoods.

Residents of Habbaniya said the mosque's imam had condemned Qaeda militants during Friday Prayer the day before, and there was immediate speculation that the attack was linked to his sermon.

A statement issued by the American military said the blast struck about 4:30 p.m. near a school and Iraqi police station, in addition to the mosque. "The target of the attack is not known," the statement said. The military said American forces arrived quickly to help secure the area and transport victims to hospitals.

The bombing was the worst of several attacks in Iraq on Saturday, including one that left at least eight Iraqi national policemen dead at a checkpoint about two miles south of Baghdad International Airport.

According to the American military, witnesses said as many as 10 insurgents rushed to the checkpoint and leaped out of a vehicle, firing assault rifles and lobbing grenades at the police.

Two attackers were killed, but a military statement did not say what had happened to the other attackers. The statement also said American forces arrived and were fired on by the attackers, and then called in unspecified "aviation support."

In another car bombing, at least three people were killed and nine wounded in Baghdad near the compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the powerful Shiite party Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Interior Ministry said.

On Friday, American forces detained and then released Mr. Hakim's eldest son, Amar, after he crossed the border from Iran back into Iraq. The detention spurred demonstrations in Basra and the Shiite holy city of Najaf, and prompted the American military to issue a statement on Saturday calling the episode "unfortunate" but suggesting members of Amar al-Hakim's convoy had provoked the scuffle.

Reiterating both his earlier comments as well as assertions made on Friday by a senior aide to his father, Amar al-Hakim complained at a news conference in Najaf that American forces had physically abused his guards and treated him roughly and disrespectfully.

President Jalal Talabani, whose Kurdish political coalition is the primary governing partner of the dominant Shiite coalition headed by the elder Mr. Hakim, released a statement sharply criticizing the detention and demanding that American commanders hold accountable soldiers who he said had mistreated Mr. Hakim.

Mr. Hakim is considered an heir to his father's political dynasty, and in recent years he has spent much of his time in Shiite southern Iraq building support for his father's ambitions, including a controversial proposal to carve out an autonomous state made up of nine Shiite provinces.

Initially, an American military official said Amar al-Hakim was seized because his passport had expired and because he was traveling with men possessing a large number of weapons.

On Saturday, the military released a longer but less specific statement that said Mr. Hakim was never mistreated. And while Iraqi border officials and associates of Mr. Hakim have said he was detained by American troops, the military on Saturday asserted that Iraqi border forces led the detainment and were merely "supported" by American forces.

Mr. Hakim's convoy "was initially stopped because the vehicles met specific criteria for further investigation in an area where smuggling activity has taken place in the past," the military said. "At the time, members of the convoy did not cooperate with Coalition Forces and displayed suspicious activities which subsequently led to Mr. Hakim's detention."

Mr. Hakim "was treated with dignity and respect throughout the incident," the military said, adding that "unfortunate incidents such as this occasionally occur as Iraq endeavors to secure its borders."

At Least 40 Die In Bombing At Sunni Mosque In W. Iraq (WP)

Attack Follows Sermon Denouncing Insurgents

BAGHDAD, Feb. 24 -- During what turned out to be the last Friday prayer he led, Imam Mohammad al-Marawi urged worshipers at a Sunni mosque in the western city of Habbaniyah to stand firmly against al-Qaeda in Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group that has a strong following in the area.

"A bunch of corrupted individuals," the imam called the group's members, according to a man who was at the service.

Less than 24 hours later, someone in a Mercedes truck drove up next to the mosque and detonated explosives hidden under a load of stone and marble. At least 40 people were killed, including 15 who were praying inside.

The blast Saturday afternoon in front of Hay al-Ummal mosque killed several passersby, including women and children. The mosque is within a few feet of a children's clinic and a police station.

"If the target was the police station, the truck would have been placed near it, not next to the mosque's outer wall," said Hussein Ali, a prominent community leader.

The bombing was the first in recent months to kill dozens of civilians in a predominantly Sunni area. But witnesses said that unlike other large attacks, this one did not appear to have been driven by sectarian rivalries -- Shiite militias are not known to be active in the area -- but rather was probably carried out as a warning from Sunni extremists to Sunnis who support the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

Tribal leaders in Habbaniyah and other Sunni insurgent strongholds in volatile Anbar province have tried to mobilize civilians against al-Qaeda in Iraq, which has sought to impose strict Islamic code in several regions and has frequently attacked U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Falah al-Dulaimi, leader of Anbar Civil Defense, one of several groups trying to quell the insurgency, said in a telephone interview that insurgents had nicknamed the city "Tel Aviv," a disparaging reference to U.S. influence.

Despite warnings from Sunni insurgents, women in Habbaniyah are not forced to cover their hair with the traditional hijab, and residents are free to use the Internet and cellphones.

U.S. soldiers stationed at a nearby facility responded to the blast in Habbaniyah, which is about 50 miles west of Baghdad. They cordoned off the area and transported many of the wounded to medical centers.

Alaa Jaber al-Marawi, 30, who owns a grocery store across the street from the mosque, said the bombers probably picked the site because it is on the edge of the city's well-guarded center. He said in a phone interview that his brother was among the injured and that one of his legs was amputated Saturday night.

The attack came as thousands of troops from across the country are being deployed to the capital for the implementation of the Baghdad security plan. Some provincial leaders are concerned that the new measures in Baghdad might push insurgents and militias to other parts of the country.

Also Saturday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani issued a statement calling for the punishment of U.S. soldiers involved in the temporary detention of the son of an influential Shiite political leader.

Amar al-Hakim -- whose father, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, heads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq -- was detained Friday near the southern city of Kut after returning from Iran.

Talabani said Hakim had "received uncivil and inappropriate treatment" during his hours-long detention. U.S. officials said soldiers had not singled him out, and they described his detention as a routine procedure along the heavily patrolled border.

Truck Bomb In Iraq Hints Of Sunni Feud (WT/AP)

By Brian Murphy, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A suicide truck bomber sent a deadly storm of metal, stone and jagged plaster through worshippers leaving a Sunni mosque yesterday, killing at least 39 in a likely sign of escalating internal Sunni battles between insurgents and those who oppose them.

The motive for the attack was not immediately clear, but it carried the hallmarks of an increasingly bloody struggle for control of Anbar province -- a hotbed of anti-U.S. guerrillas since the uprising in Fallujah in 2004 that galvanized the insurgency.

U.S. military envoys and pro-government leaders have worked hard to sway clan chiefs and other influential Anbar figures to turn against the militants, who include foreign jihadists fighting under the banner of al Qaeda in Iraq. The extremists have fought back with targeted killings and bombings against fellow Sunnis.

The blast in Habbaniyah -- in the heart of insurgent territory about 50 miles west of Baghdad -- was among the deadliest against civilians in Anbar.

The imam of the mosque had spoken out against extremists -- most recently in a sermon Friday, residents said. Many people in the neighborhood work for the Iraqi military and police forces, who frequently come under attack by militants.

The truck, filled with building materials such as stone and plaster board, was blown apart as worshippers left after midafternoon prayers.

Rescuers, including U.S. soldiers, pulled survivors from the debris. The U.S. military sealed off the area and said it opened its medical facilities to "the most life-threatening injuries" among the more than 60 hurt.

Police Lt. Abdul-Aziz Mohammed placed the death toll at 39, but authorities warned it could rise. The U.S. military said it was a suicide attack.

The attack occurred a day after U.S. troops raided a factory complex in Fallujah full of propane tanks and industrial chemicals that the military said could be used to make bombs. Back-to-back bombings in the past week released chlorine gas and raised worries that insurgents were experimenting with chemicals to boost the terror level of their attacks.

At least 14 persons were killed in bombings around Baghdad yesterday, most of the explosions targeting Shi'ite areas, even as U.S.-Iraqi forces press ahead with neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweeps seeking to reclaim control of the city.

After nightfall, nearly 20 strong blasts reverberated through Baghdad in a reported exchange of fire between U.S. troops and insurgents south of the capital.

"There is no safe shelter for all outlaws," said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who reported that 426 militants have been captured since the campaign began Feb. 14, but the crackdown also has sent Sunni insurgents fleeing the city to the nearby province of Diyala, which has emerged as a new and busy front for U.S. troops.

It's become so volatile that the Pentagon may delay plans to turn over control of Diyala to the Iraqi military by the end of the year, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon told the Associated Press.

"The potential is there" to hand over Iraq's other 17 provinces, "except in Diyala, where the future remains in question," said Gen. Mixon, commander of U.S. forces in northern Iraq, which includes Diyala.

Diyala, northwest of Baghdad, is known as "Little Iraq" because of its nearly equal mix of Sunni and Shi'ite Arabs as well as Kurds -- the country's three major groups. Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi, a Jordanian, was killed in a U.S. air strike in Diyala last year. Sunni extremists claim Diyala's capital, Baqouba, as the seat of an Islamic state in Iraq.

Direct-fire attacks on U.S. soldiers are up 70 percent in Diyala since last summer, and fierce battles have raged since the Baghdad security plan began.

"We're working our way into the Baghdad security plan, and we won't be into the thick of it until late spring or summer," Gen. Mixon said. "I expect more violence in Diyala through then."

Shi'ite compliance is essential for the Baghdad plan to work. Shi'ite leaders apparently have ordered their militia, including the powerful Mahdi's Army, not to confront the security operation.

But the cooperation suddenly has been strained after U.S. military border guards stopped and searched the heir-apparent of the largest Shi'ite political group.

"Is this the way to deal with a national figure? This does not conform with Iraq's sovereignty," said Amar al-Hakim, 35, who was taken into custody for nearly 12 hours Friday after crossing from Iran with bodyguards.

Al-Hakim's father, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, heads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, which has close ties with Iran and is the strongest voice in Iraq's 275-seat parliament. In December, he met President Bush at the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0136509

The younger Mr. al-Hakim -- whom many believe is being groomed to take over the group -- said U.S. soldiers handcuffed and blindfolded him before his release and "strongly abused" his bodyguards. He said cellular phones, licensed weapons and two-way radios were among items confiscated.

A U.S. military statement called the detention "unfortunate," but insisted Mr. al-Hakim was not mistreated.

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, called the detention "uncivilized and inappropriate."

Iraq Insurgents Turn On Sunnis (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen, Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD — At least 37 Iraqis were killed Saturday in a highly unusual insurgent bomb attack against Sunni Arabs as they were leaving a mosque.

A preacher at the Sahaba mosque in Habbaniya, 40 miles west of Baghdad, had delivered a blistering sermon a day earlier condemning Al Qaeda activities in Iraq, an official in the town said.

U.S. military officials helped secure the site and evacuate dozens of injured Iraqis. The most seriously wounded were taken to a nearby base, a news release said.

Shiite Muslims are the main Iraqi targets of the Sunni-led insurgency. But police and residents in the Sunni Muslim-dominated area said the people had largely aligned against Al Qaeda militants operating in the region. They said most of the young men in the village, between Fallouja and Ramadi, were employed in the police and the army — unusual for Al Anbar province, long a hotbed of insurgent activities.

The mosque, as well as a nearby market and shops, was severely damaged in the explosion.

Across Iraq on Saturday, car bombs and mortar attacks killed and wounded dozens of people, including a car bomb outside the Baghdad headquarters of Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and the largest Shiite voting bloc in the Iraqi parliament, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

Three people were killed and seven others were injured, primarily merchants and their customers.

Another car bomb in an area busy with vendors near the capital's fortified Green Zone, where U.S. and Iraqi government offices are located, killed two people and injured eight others. Rocket and mortar fire killed one and injured nearly two dozen others, including some women and children, in incidents in south and west Baghdad.

Iraqi special forces shot and killed a would-be suicide bomber as he was trying to detonate an explosive device in a crowd in a mixed area of southern Baghdad.

Some of the attacks Saturday targeted Iraqi military and police installations that had been established in the renewed effort to secure the country, injuring officers.

A former Iraqi general was assassinated by gunmen near his house in southwest Baghdad, and a tribal sheik was killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Kirkuk.

Police patrols found the bullet-riddled bodies of 20 men dumped around the capital on Saturday, a higher tally than in recent days but still lower than during the spasm of violence that had consumed Baghdad in past weeks.

Beyond Baghdad, Beyond 'the Surge,' War Still Simmers (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

THE letter from Al Qaeda in Iraq to the members of the local police was clear.

Come to the mosque and swear allegiance on the Koran to Al Qaeda, the letter warned, or you will die and your family will be slaughtered. Also, bring $1,200.

It had the desired effect on American efforts to build an Iraqi security force here.

Nearly a third of the local police force went to the mosque, paid the money and pledged their allegiance. Another third was killed. By late October, only 34 local police officers were left to try to maintain order in this city of 100,000.

Events in Baghdad have dominated the news as American troops move aggressively to quell the sectarian violence that has set Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods at war with each other. But a visit to this restive city is a reminder not only of the many fronts of the war, but also of its many complexities.

While sectarian warfare dominates Baghdad, and southern Shiite cities like Basra contend with criminal gangs and tribal violence as splinter groups compete for power, a different dynamic is at work in this predominately Sunni city on the Tigris River between Baghdad and Tikrit, the birthplace of Saddam Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0136510

Samarra, 65 miles north of Baghdad, is home to the Mosque of the Golden Dome, one Iraq's most sacred Shiite shrines. A year ago, Sunni insurgents bombed the mosque, ripping a hole in the dome and unleashing sectarian violence in the country.

Even so, there has been little of the sectarian violence here that has engulfed Baghdad, where scores of tortured bodies turn up every day and suicide bombers claim dozens in attacks directed at civilians.

Here, and in other cities to the north and west of Baghdad, where Shiites are a distinct minority, Sunni militants continue to wage war on Americans and terrorize the civilian population into submission.

The coordinated attack on an American combat outpost north of Baghdad on Monday by Sunni militants, which left two soldiers dead and some 30 wounded, is an example of the kind of stepped-up attacks the American military fears could become more common.

Lt. Col. Viet X. Luong, the commander of the 2nd Battalion of the 505th Parachute Regiment in the 82nd Airborne Division, said he was seeing an increase in militant activity to the south of Samarra. That, he said, is partially a result of the Americans' successes in the city, but also likely the result of Sunni militants moving out of Baghdad to escape the American offensive there.

"We are getting attacked between the seams," he said.

Over the past five months, his soldiers in the city have conducted more than 1,000 raids, been attacked by improvised explosive devices 69 times and come under direct fire attack at least 85 times, the colonel said.

There are at least two different forces here battling the Americans: the Islamic Army of Iraq, a homegrown militant group made up largely of former Baathists, and Al Qaeda in Iraq, which is aided and sometimes directed by foreign fighters.

Some members of the Islamic Army of Iraq, the main Sunni militant group here, said in interviews that they were pressing Al Qaeda to focus on Shiite militias and not the Americans, whom they see as a temporary buffer in their fight against the Shiites.

Local residents say that Al Qaeda is so bold as to even run a training camp within the city, managing to avoid the American patrols and intimidating the local population through murder and kidnapping.

American soldiers were supposed to pull out of Samarra by March, but the Iraqi security forces are still nowhere near ready to take charge. Colonel Luong says it will likely be another 6 to 12 months before the Iraqis could hope to stand on their own.

The risks of pulling out too soon have already been demonstrated. Twice in the past four years, the city has fallen to militants. And twice, it took major American offensives to reclaim the city.

Even now, many consider it unsafe. "No judge can come to Samarra because he will be killed," said Lt. Col. Abdul Jalil Hanni, the commander of the local police force, which now numbers 114. Many new recruits come from Sunni cities farther north.

There are another 201 National Police officers in the city, but nearly 70 percent of them are Shiite, presenting a host of additional complications in this Sunni city. While their commander is Sunni, residents interviewed over the past two weeks said they did not have the slightest faith in them. The Iraqi Army does not patrol in the city.

Capt. Buddy Ferris, who leads Company C at a small outpost on the edge of the city, said that if Americans left tomorrow, the effect on Iraqi security forces would be like "sudden infant death syndrome."

Captain Ferris and his soldiers see the problems clearly, but the company is proud of its achievements, like bringing the police force back from near collapse.

In six months, the company has established a network of local informants and recently captured a Qaeda member who was sent to Guantánamo because of his connections to suspected terrorists outside Iraq. Captain Ferris acknowledges they have not yet won the loyalty of the population but says he thinks they have a strong leader in Colonel Jalil, whose son, Hassan 18, was assassinated by militants.

Colonel Jalil, whose camouflage uniform covered the scar of a bullet wound in his right arm, says the Americans are too soft. "They do not let me slap them," he said of the militants, in an interview. A former officer in Saddam Hussein's feared Mukhabarat, the colonel talked about how he would like to have a free rein to beat prisoners and kill them without trials if they are guilty.

As he spoke, a television in the corner of his office was showing the movie "Annie." The little orphan was singing, "The Sun Will Come Out Tomorrow."

Iraqi Allies, U.S. Split On Baathist Policy (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD — The son of one of Iraq's most prominent Shiite politicians lashed out at the United States in an incendiary televised appearance Saturday, a day after he was detained by American troops.

DOJ_NMG_0136511

Thousands of Iraqis took to the streets across the country to protest the detention of Ammar Hakim, whose father's political party has been a major U.S. ally. The demonstrators chanted "Down with America" and called Western forces "occupiers" who must leave the country.

Not only has the arrest angered followers of the moderate Shiite party led by his father, Abdelaziz Hakim, it has provided common ground with more radical followers of the anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

U.S. policymakers have advocated isolating Shiite radicals from more moderate figures in the community. But at rallies across the country Saturday, members of Sadr's Al Mahdi army, longtime rivals of the Hakim family, protested alongside members of the elder Hakim's Badr Brigade militia.

Ammar Hakim was arrested and held for several hours because of what were said to be questions about his passport as he crossed into Iraq from Iran. He said soldiers stopped him without good reason, treated him rudely and roughly and appeared to have kept seven AK-47s, 14 pistols and more than $6,000 in U.S. and Iraqi currency taken from him and his bodyguards.

"The U.S. troops said that they treated me politely, which is not true," Hakim said in a televised news conference. One soldier "kicked me violently against the wall. He handcuffed me. He bound my eyes."

The arrest and subsequent protests come at a sensitive time, as the U.S. tries to build relationships with the Iraqi people amid a security crackdown. The incident has the potential to undermine relations between Iraq's majority Shiites and the U.S. forces that toppled their Sunni oppressors.

"We condemn this trespassing act of the U.S. forces that is illegal and against the human rights," said Sheik Suhail Uqabi, a spokesman for Sadr in the city of Najaf. "This reveals the reality of double standards in the U.S. policy toward the Iraqi people, even against the forces that are working under the constitutional political process."

U.S. diplomats have apologized for the incident and said they would investigate Hakim's complaints. They have noted that he was quickly released, and have defended the soldiers involved by saying they followed standard procedures.

Abdelaziz Hakim is the leader of the largest Shiite voting bloc in the Iraqi parliament, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI. The elder Hakim met with President Bush in Washington in December and pledged to help stem the violence in Iraq.

The elder Hakim was an opponent of Saddam Hussein and spent much of the 1980s in exile in Iran as a commander of the Badr Brigade.

The militia has close ties to Iran and has been accused of operating death squads targeting Sunnis, but it is also viewed as among the more moderate Shiite forces in Iraq.

Ammar Hakim leads the Shahid al-Mihrab Foundation, a charity affiliated with SCIRI that provides food and money to the foundation's supporters.

Iraqi sensitivity about the arrest stems from a feeling that it impinged on the country's sovereignty.

Protesters said they were offended that foreign soldiers could detain a prominent figure so easily, on mere suspicion.

"What the U.S. troops have done is a direct digression of the laws, and a dangerous initiative," said Ahmed Fatlawi, a lawyer and member of Najaf's provincial council. "Abdelaziz is a moderate man who has been trying to bring people together, especially on the political level."

In Hillah, south of Baghdad, a crowd of about 300 people, including followers of Sadr and SCIRI supporters, protested the detention, calling for the "liberation" of Iraq and condemning U.S. policy in the country.

More than a thousand people gathered in front of the SCIRI offices in Baghdad's Sadr City to denounce the way Hakim was treated during his arrest.

"It harmed our feelings," demonstrator Abu Muthanna Waili said. "Such behaviors create a tension inside the country."

In Najaf, Sadr militia representative Oon Abid Ali participated in a demonstration with several hundred people in which protesters chanted anti-U.S. slogans and carried banners saying they held U.S. troops responsible for Hakim's alleged mistreatment.

The detention "is a message … that the U.S. troops could arrest any figures going against its plans," Ali said. "We shall be seeing such acts a lot soon."

Mohammed Mousawi, the head of the Badr organization in Najaf, said, "We did not expect that it would reach this level of naivete and meanness. We are asking the U.S. troops to go out of Iraq immediately. We used to think highly of them."

Car Bomb Kills Dozens; Mystery Blasts Rock Baghdad (CNN)

CNN.com, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- At least 39 people were killed Saturday when a car bomb exploded as they left a Sunni mosque in Habbaniya, Iraq, an Interior Ministry official said.

DOJ_NMG_0136512

Also Saturday, only hours after Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki announced "positive results" in Baghdad security, several strong blasts were heard in the capital.

The car bomb, which occurred about 40 miles west of Baghdad, wounded 61 people outside a mosque, a school and an Iraqi police station, according to Multi-National Forces-Iraq.

Medical personnel arrived to help and coalition forces were providing security and helping take the injured to medical facilities.

Local residents told The Associated Press the imam of the mosque had spoken out against extremists.

Also, according to AP, many who live in the neighborhood are employed by Iraqi military and police forces, who are frequently the targets of militant strikes.

The vehicle exploded as worshippers left the mosque's afternoon prayers, AP reported. It was filled with stone and plaster and other building materials. After the blast, U.S. soldiers joined other rescuers who pulled survivors from the rubble, AP reported.U.S.-Iraqi operations

In Baghdad, the U.S. military attributed the mysterious explosions to "indirect fire," a reference to mortar or artillery fire. "We do not know where it is coming from," the military told CNN.

Gen. Qassim Moussawi, spokesman for Baghdad's ongoing U.S.-Iraqi military security plan, said he didn't know the cause behind the explosions, but confirmed that joint operations were being conducted in the southern part of the capital city.

Earlier Saturday, Prime Minister al-Maliki said the U.S.-Iraqi crackdown has dismantled terrorist cells and yielded the arrests and killing of hundreds of insurgents.

Al-Maliki spoke to reporters after a tour of the security plan command center. The prime minister said 426 suspected insurgents have been detained and roughly the same number killed.

The crackdown has reduced sectarian killings and kidnappings; foiled terrorist plots; and allowed hundreds of displaced families to return home, al-Maliki said.Politician's son slams troops

A day after he was detained at a checkpoint, the son of a leading Iraqi politician lambasted U.S. troops who held him, accusing them of blindfolding and pushing him and keeping possessions they confiscated.

"There is no excuse for what happened," said Ammar al-Hakim in Najaf Saturday. "It shouldn't happen to anyone in the future."

He is the son of leading Shiite politician Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who has close ties to both Iran and the United States and is considered by some people the most powerful Shiite politician in Iraq.

Ammar al-Hakim and his armed entourage were stopped Friday while attempting to enter Iraq's Wasit province from Iran. He was searched, then blindfolded and handcuffed as troops pushed him against a wall and yelled, al-Hakim said.

The troops also searched his car and suitcase -- where they found clothing and about $1,000 -- and they confiscated from his bodyguards seven Kalashnikov rifles, 14 handguns, seven cell phones and $4,250, said the politician's son.

None of the bodyguards' items was returned, he added.

The U.S. military disputes the account, saying all possessions were returned.

The U.S. military on Saturday defended Ammar al-Hakim's arrest and detention, a day after the U.S. ambassador to Iraq apologized for it.

The military's statement on Saturday did not include an apology.

It stated that "unfortunate incidents" may happen occasionally as Iraq "endeavors to secure its borders," but al-Hakim was "treated with dignity and respect throughout the entire incident."

Smugglers have used the checkpoint in the past, the military said, and Ammar al-Hakim's convoy "met specific criteria for further investigation."

Troops arrested al-Hakim and his entourage only after they failed to "cooperate with coalition forces and displayed suspicious activities," the U.S. military said.

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim is the leader of the United Iraqi Alliance and the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. The alliance is the dominant political coalition in Iraq, and SCIRI is one of the leading parties in the alliance.Other developments

Just north of Baghdad, five suspected members of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mehdi Army were detained in a village east of Taji on Saturday, the U.S. military said. The military said the suspects were part of a cell believed to be responsible for kidnappings, murders and roadside bombings.

Farther to the north, in Nineveh, an insurgent suspected of participating in a "foreign fighter smuggling network" was detained Saturday near Tal Afar. The network has smuggled fighters, arms and money into Iraq to support the insurgency, the U.S. military said.

DOJ_NMG_0136513

A suicide attack outside a SCIRI compound in Baghdad killed three people and wounded seven, an Interior Ministry official said, adding that the compound was not the bomber's target. A suicide car bomber was about 500 yards away from an exterior checkpoint when guards opened fire because they considered the vehicle suspicious. The bomber then detonated the explosives, the official said.

Two civilians were killed and four were wounded when a car bomb targeting a U.S.-Iraqi patrol in western Baghdad exploded, Iraqi emergency police said. Thirty minutes later, two more civilians were killed and eight others wounded in a car bomb attack on an Iraqi police patrol in central Baghdad.

In Baghdad's southern Dora district, at least two civilians were killed and 23 others were wounded -- including women and children -- when four mortar rounds slammed into a residential area, an Iraqi Interior Ministry official said.

The U.S. military said coalition forces broke a terrorist funding operation and arrested 12 suspected terrorists during Saturday morning raids around Iraq, targeting al Qaeda in Iraq members and affiliates.

CNN's Arwa Damon, Jomana Karadsheh, Nic Robertson, Mohammed Tawfeeq and Michael Ware contributed to this report.

Iraq Rebel Cleric Reins In Militia; Motives At Issue (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 24 — Moktada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric and founder of the Mahdi Army militia, discovered recently that two of his commanders had created DVDs of their men killing Sunnis in Baghdad. Documents suggested that they had received money from Iran.

So he suspended them and stripped them of power, said two Mahdi leaders in Sadr City, the heart of Mr. Sadr's support here in the capital.

But did he do so as part of his cooperation with the new security plan for Baghdad, which aims to quell the sectarian violence tormenting the city? Because his men had been disloyal, taking orders from Iran, whose support he values but whose control he fights? Or was it just for show — the act of an image-conscious leader who grasped the risk of graphic videos and wanted to stave off direct American action against him?

Mr. Sadr has been the great destabilizer in Iraq since 2003, wielding power on the streets and in the ruling Shiite bloc, thwarting the Americans and playing out at least a temporary alliance with Iran.

With the new security plan for Iraq under way, every question about Mr. Sadr's motives touches on a different facet of Iraq's complicated struggle.

He now finds himself under pressure from several sources. One is his popular Shiite base, which demands protection from devastating Sunni attacks. Another is Iran, with which he has had long but difficult ties. Then there are renegade factions of his own militia that resent his move into the political mainstream.

Finally, the Americans, who have accused Iran of supplying Shiite militias, including Mr. Sadr's, with an especially deadly roadside bomb known as an explosively formed projectile, or E.F.P, which has killed an increasing number of American soldiers.

It is not clear whether the Americans will move directly against him. The United States has demanded that the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki act forcefully against the Mahdi Army; Mr. Maliki, however, owes much of his political strength in the ruling Shiite coalition to Mr. Sadr's backing.

For now, American and Iraqi officials say Mr. Sadr seems to be cooperating with the effort to pacify Baghdad, ordering his men not to fight even as American armored vehicles roll into Mahdi strongholds in eastern Baghdad. He seems to be cleaning house of fighters who could taint him by association with Iran or with death squad killings. His aides say he has called for a sectarian truce. "Moktada al-Sadr said to protect your clerics, protect your shrines and cooperate with the government," said Hazim al-Araji, head of the Sadr office in western Baghdad. "So no actions have been taken."

In perhaps his boldest move yet, Mr. Sadr has assisted the joint Iraqi-American campaign against parts of his militia, signaling whom to arrest and telling others to flee, said two Mahdi commanders and a Shiite politician in Baghdad. On his own, they said, Mr. Sadr has "frozen" more than 40 commanders, including about 20 with links to Iran.

The moves are part of an organizational overhaul, the Sadr aides said. Though Mr. Sadr's whereabouts are unknown — the Americans say he is in Iran, which his aides and Iran dispute — a new Mahdi general for all of Baghdad has been appointed for the first time, they said. Mr. Sadr has also selected new commanders for east and west Baghdad.

Some of the Sadr aides and commanders who described Mr. Sadr's recent moves during separate interviews in Najaf and Baghdad refused to give their names, saying they had not been authorized to speak and feared reprisals from current or former members of the militia.

They said the cleric allowed the arrests of members of his own militia, or suspended them himself, because evidence showed that they had not obeyed his orders and because he wanted to show Iran, American officials and his militia that he was a strong leader who must be respected and feared.

"He wants to prove to the people that he has full control of his militia," said a 47-year-old Mahdi commander from Sadr City who referred to himself as Jabar Abdul al-Hahdi. "He wants to show he's in charge."

Mr. Sadr's conflicted relationship with Iran mirrors Iraq's. Each country's majority Shiites revere the other's clerics and visit the other's religious shrines. But they speak different languages, are dominated by different ethnic groups, and fought each other in a long war in the 1980s.

Mr. Sadr's father, Grand Ayatollah Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr, became one of Iraq's most popular Shiite clerics largely because he set himself up as the rebel alternative to Iran's religious leadership, focusing on poor, oppressed Iraqis, not just theological debate. His mix of social and religious resistance led Saddam Hussein to order his assassination in 1999.

Moktada al-Sadr rose to prominence after the American invasion in 2003 with anti-American speeches and echoes of his father's populism. But he was young, not yet 30, and less educated than his clerical rivals. So even as he railed against Iranian meddling, he sought money and support from Iran's top clerics, meeting with Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme religious leader, in June 2003. It was a dramatic reversal from family tradition.

Less than a year later, he led a revolt against American troops in Najaf, and again Iran played the role of patron. On the 11th day of the revolt, with Mr. Sadr under siege, an Iranian delegation arrived in Iraq to mediate. The Iranians were joined by Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, who called for Shiite unity and calm.

Mr. Sadr eventually agreed to stop fighting and join the political process. The Americans let him.

His popularity rose with the speed of a pop star's, and the Mahdi Army grew like a fan club, from a few hundred young men to thousands — including some who proved hard to control.

Since then, according to some Shiite officials, Iran has funneled support to his organization. What it receives, how much and how consistently, remain a mystery, but some Shiite leaders say Mr. Sadr collects less from Iran than does a rival Shiite party: the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which was founded in Iran by Iraqi exiles in 1984.

Iran generally supports many groups simultaneously, including some Sunni ones, so that it can benefit from any eventuality, said Sami al-Askari, a Shiite member of Parliament who works closely with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

"Iran intervenes in many ways, with many methods," Mr. Askari said.

In the case of the Mahdi Army, he said, Iran has recognized its diffuse nature, sprinkling support at high and low levels. Some support comes through ties to Hezbollah, the Shiite militia in Lebanon that also receives Iranian support. Beirut now has a Sadr office, and Mahdi commanders say they have been sending fighters to Hezbollah at least since last summer, when Hezbollah battled Israel.

Iran also provides institutional assistance to Iraq, mainly to the Health Ministry, which is run by Mr. Sadr's political bloc. Three days after bombs killed more than 140 people in Sadr City last fall, for example, 50 Iraqi ambulances carried some of the wounded to the Iranian border. They were transferred to Iranian ambulances and taken to Iranian hospitals, with much of the cost covered by organizations in Iran.

Qasim Allawi, a spokesman for the Health Ministry who described the process, said another 25 wounded men and women from the recent Sadriya market bombing in Baghdad were to head to Iran any day.

Iran's more potent forms of aid are direct — and some goes not to Mr. Sadr, but to underlings.

"Sometimes the aid comes for the leadership, and they get to decide where it goes," Mr. Askari said. "Sometimes it goes to the local leadership, and this encourages them to rebel."

"Iran puts Moktada al-Sadr between two pressing sides," he said. "On one hand, they are helping him and they have the ability to take that away. At the same time, they're undermining him by helping people below him."

According to Sadr aides and Mahdi commanders, Mr. Sadr's recent purges aim to put Iran on notice that he is in charge and independent. They said he also wanted to remind members of his militia that he would use every available tool, including Iraqi and American troops, to maintain control of the militia, the source of any political power he wields.

The goal is a top-down, tightly managed operation.

"We're going to end the decentralized system that we had before," said one of the aides in Najaf.

If Mr. Sadr consolidates power over his unruly militia, he could be held more responsible for the actions of its members. Until now, American and Iraqi efforts against the Mahdi Army have focused on so-called rogue elements.

The 30 members of Parliament associated with the Sadr bloc have not been arrested, keeping Mr. Sadr's legitimate influence intact. At the same time, American, Iraqi and British officials are engaged in classified negotiations with his envoys over how to address the Mahdi Army and its Sadr City stronghold, the neighborhood named for Mr. Sadr's father.

DOJ_NMG_0136515

When asked about the talks, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the top military spokesman in Iraq, said the meetings represented a reasonable and appropriate attempt to avoid unnecessary bloodshed.

"Anytime you can find a political solution instead of a military solution," he said, "it's always better."

But can Mr. Sadr deliver what the Americans want? Are his efforts adequate? Some American military officers remain skeptical.

"You know what their intent is," said Maj. Kevin Hosier, an intelligence officer with the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, as his unit prepared for sweeps through predominantly Shiite areas near Sadr City this month. "They want Baghdad. They want to make Baghdad a Shia city."

Peter Harling, a senior analyst with the International Crisis Group, a research organization, who wrote a thorough profile of Mr. Sadr last summer, said the impact of the Mahdi purges and command restructuring would likely be short-lived.

"He has been excommunicating some of his key commanders, that's a fact, but he has just put them in the corner," Mr. Harling said, relying on interviews with several Mahdi commanders cited in his July profile. "Many of them, after Sadr really accused them in the harshest terms, actually came back in the movement and carried on with their careers. All this is kind of temporary."

According to Mr. Harling, Mr. Sadr has little choice but to trim at the edges of his organization. His hold on power remains tenuous, dependent on a loose association of clients all over the country who he knows could turn on him at any moment.

"He remains in a strong position as a leader only as long as he is useful to all these smaller leaders," Mr. Harling said. "He rules by consensus."

Vali Nasr, a professor of national security affairs at the Naval Postgraduate School and author of "The Shia Revival," says Mr. Sadr should be viewed as a politician who was trying to preserve his power. Poor Shiites have made him an Iraqi celebrity, a national symbol whose bearded visage graces everything from wristwatches to alarm clocks and large posters. Above all else, he will be loyal to them, Mr. Nasr said.

"Since the Samarra bombing last year, Moktada has received a lot of pressure to be tougher on the Sunnis," he said, referring to the explosion in the northern city of Samarra last February that destroyed one of Shiite Islam's holiest shrines. "He's found that the tougher he's been, the more his popularity has gone up."

In the long run, Mr. Nasr said, "he's not very concerned with what the Americans think of him. What matters to him is what the Shiites think."

Kurds Endorse Draft Oil Law (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Measure Would Go To Iraqi Assembly

BAGHDAD, Feb. 24 -- Leaders of Iraq's oil-rich Kurdish region have apparently approved a draft oil law that will be presented to Iraqi lawmakers in coming weeks, an eagerly awaited breakthrough that is expected to professionalize and expand drilling in the country.

The agreement was announced Saturday by Massoud Barzani, president of the regional government in Kurdish-populated northern Iraq, during a news conference in the northern city of Sulaymaniyah attended by Iraq's president and the U.S. ambassador, the Associated Press reported.

"We reached a final agreement," Barzani said, according to AP. "We accept the draft."

Barzani did not disclose further details of the agreement, and no other officials discussed them publicly.

John C. Roberts, a spokesman for U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, said Saturday night he was unaware of the development or the ambassador's presence at the news conference. Spokesmen for the Kurdish regional government and Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih also said they had no information on the reported agreement.

The Kurdish minister of natural resources declined to discuss the issue.

Iraqi officials in recent weeks have been struggling to reach an agreement on legislation that would govern the exploitation of the country's vast oil reserves and who should control the revenue.

Among the contentious issues are to what extent oil exploration will be controlled by the Shiite-led government in Baghdad; how proceeds will be distributed among oil-rich and oil-poor areas; and to what extent foreign companies will be allowed to drill for oil.

Iraq's largest reserves are concentrated in the Kurdish north and in the predominantly Shiite south, which has led to squabbling among Iraqi leaders concerned that their constituencies might not benefit sufficiently from oil proceeds. Sunnis live mainly in central and western areas without oil reserves. More than 90 percent of the country's budget comes from oil.

U.S. officials have been pressing Iraqi leaders to send a bill to parliament, a step they see as crucial to strengthening the country's economy and reducing violence. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Iraqi leaders last week during a brief visit to Baghdad to reach a resolution on the draft.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had promised to get the measure passed by the end of 2006, but negotiations, primarily between Kurds and Shiite leaders, have stalled several times. The Kurds want to make sure they have enough oversight over the oil industry in their region and have expressed concern about the impact the legislation might have on contracts they have signed with foreign companies that recently began working in the relatively safe region.

It is unclear how quickly lawmakers, in a parliament beset with sectarian strife and general bickering, will turn the bill into law.

Hometown Fights For Soldier Charged In Iraq Slayings (LAT)

By David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

SWEETWATER, TENN. — The first fundraiser was down at the First Assembly of God church, where Bonnie Cleveland stood in the doorway with a collection basket in hand. She told everyone that the church music group's former teen drummer, Ray Girouard — now Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard — was in deep trouble.

The Army has charged Girouard, 24, with ordering the slayings of three Iraqi detainees in May, then orchestrating a coverup. He's in a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., awaiting court-martial.

"He's been fighting for our freedom, and now he needs our help," Cleveland, a schoolteacher and the wife of a dairy farmer, told fellow parishioners.

By the end of the service late last month, parishioners had contributed $6,600 to help hire a civilian lawyer for a church member who became an Army Ranger and served two tours in Iraq.

It was the beginning of an extraordinary outpouring of cash and tributes from this idyllic east Tennessee community of 6,000. The fund now stands at $19,000, fattened by residents who cannot reconcile the Army's portrait of a calculating killer with their memories of a polite and caring boy.

Sense of betrayal

Sweetwater, a conservative community where American flags fly on porches and many residents are veterans, now finds itself at odds with the military. Many here say the Army has betrayed a young patriot who volunteered to fight for his country.

"The military kind of made it personal," said Tammy "Tot" Chapman, who's helping organize an antique car rally as a fundraiser. "When you mess with our boys, you have to deal with us."

Post 106 of the American Legion in Sweetwater is coordinating the contributions. Lloyd Langley, the post vice commander, says Girouard is being "railroaded" by the military.

"A soldier ain't worth a dime if he don't carry out his orders, and that's exactly what Ray was doing over there," Langley said.

Girouard, who enlisted right out of high school, is charged with premeditated murder and conspiracy. Three other soldiers also were charged in the deaths, which occurred during a combat mission May 9 on a marshy island on Tharthar Lake, 60 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Girouard's photo now graces bumper stickers, storefronts and restaurants in Sweetwater. A gazebo on the narrow main street bears a banner that reads, "Staff Sgt. Ray Girouard Fought For Us. Let's Fight For Him."

Just after the church fundraiser, Girouard's sister Joy Oakes delivered a passionate defense of her little brother at a rally Jan. 27 at City Hall, where residents contributed $1,700.

"The Army is doing everything they can to smear his name, his reputation and his legacy," she said that day. But the "truth will come out, and it will set Ray free," she added.

Oakes, 26, a mother of three, has set up what she calls the Ray Room in a bedroom of her grandfather's home. Inside is a computer where she maintains a website supporting her brother, stacks of court documents and a "media book" with news clippings about the case.

"This case is my whole life — I live it, I breathe it, 24 hours a day," she said.

Girouard and his two sisters were raised by their maternal grandfather, Ron Bentley, an Air Force veteran, after their mother died when Girouard was 6. Bentley calls his Ranger grandson "a true American hero." A sign on his front door reads: "Terrorism Is A Disease. Rangers Are The Cure."

DOJ_NMG_0136517

Bentley says he is furious at the military for prosecuting Girouard for "doing what he was sent over there to do."

"What really got me going was seeing a picture of Raymond in shackles — after all he's done for his country," Bentley, 64, said as he sat hunched over his living room table, feeling faint from chemotherapy for lymphoma.

As Bentley spoke, Oakes answered a cellphone call. It was Girouard, calling from the brig on a $1-a-minute phone card. Oakes said he told her, as he had before, that he never ordered anyone to kill detainees and did not take part in a coverup.

She said Girouard also told her that his brigade commander, Col. Michael Steele, held "a big hoo-ah rally" the night before the mission and gave orders to kill every military-age male on the island. Steele's lawyer, Maj. Kris Poppe, said Steele "categorically rejects" the allegation.

A codefendant, Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, gave a similar account in a phone interview in October. But Jan. 25, Clagett entered a plea agreement with the government and testified that Girouard, the squad leader, told his men to kill the three Iraqis they had just detained.

Clagett said he and Spc. William B. Hunsaker cut plastic handcuffs off the men, told them to run, then shot them. He testified that Girouard punched him in the face and cut Hunsaker with a knife to make it appear that the detainees had attacked the soldiers while attempting to escape.

Hunsaker, the first to accept a plea deal, also testified against Girouard. Hunsaker and Clagett got 18 years. Girouard could get life without parole if convicted.

Clagett's plea was a stunning blow to Girouard's family, and to Sweetwater. The Clagett and Girouard families had teamed up to fight the charges. Clagett's mother, Melanie Dianiska, stayed at Bentley's home last year on her way to a court hearing at Ft. Campbell, Ky.

"I understand the pressure they were under from the government, but it's still hurtful the way they turned on Ray," Oakes said.

Dianiska and lawyer Paul Bergrin said they felt boxed in after Hunsaker's plea and reluctantly agreed to their own deal.

"I'll tell you one thing," Oakes said. "This family will not buckle. We will not take a plea deal. Ray will not plead guilty to something he didn't do."

Girouard's lawyer, Anita Gorecki of Fayetteville, N.C., said she intended to proceed to court-martial, scheduled for March 13, and would call Steele as a witness.

"He is eager to have his day in court," Gorecki said. "Our defense is simple: Sgt. Girouard did not give that order."

John Canada, who taught Girouard in a Royal Rangers church program similar to the Boy Scouts, said many people in Sweetwater felt uncomfortable challenging the military. Even so, he said, "it bothers me that an American soldier could kill our enemy and have that construed as first-degree murder."

Still confident

Girouard's grandmother Pat Bentley said her grandson remained confident that he would be exonerated. "He's got it in him to fight," she said. "If he goes down, he's going to go down fighting."

Charlie Boyd, who heads the antique car club that is organizing a fundraiser, said U.S. soldiers faced the same problem he had faced when he fought in Vietnam: It is difficult to distinguish the enemy from civilians in a guerrilla war.

"Ray shouldn't get a court-martial," Boyd said. "He should get a medal."

By prosecuting soldiers for their actions during combat operations, the military is sending the wrong message, said Daniel Chapman, the car club's vice president.

"If our soldiers see someone like Ray going to prison, they'll be scared to death that they'll be prosecuted every time they open fire," he said. "They'll hesitate — and that'll get you killed."

Administrative Issues Cited At Walter Reed (WP)

Report From Long-Running Army Probe Notes Problems; Official Orders Fixes

The preliminary findings of a nine-month Army investigation confirm problems in the administrative procedures at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and other hospitals, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey has ordered the service to begin fixing them, a spokesman said yesterday.

The Army inspector general's probe said that the service needs to standardize its training of workers who assist patients, that its information-management databases are inadequate and that there are "policy disconnects" between Army regulations and Defense Department instructions.

DOJ_NMG_0136518

After hearing recommendations from the inspector general's office on improvements, Harvey directed Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, to start implementing those steps that can be taken immediately, Army spokesman John P. Boyce Jr. said yesterday. The office's final report is not expected for several weeks.

"Look, this is very complex," Harvey said in a statement. "But this is too important and cannot wait for a report to be finished or a review to be completed. We'll fix as we go; we'll fix as we find things wrong."

The investigation, which began in April, was prompted by a Government Accountability Office study of the Army's system for evaluating the fitness of wounded soldiers to stay in the service.

Harvey's action followed the publication last week of a two-part series in The Washington Post on the challenges facing soldiers being treated as outpatients at Walter Reed. The articles depicted a system in which outpatients at the Army's premier medical facility often languish in a numbing bureaucracy, some forgotten, many overwhelmed.

The series touched a nerve with the public, politicians and the military. The resulting cascade of outrage underscored that, while the war in Iraq is an enormously divisive issue, it remains a tenet of faith among the public that wounded troops deserve the best of care.

President Bush demanded swift action to fix the problems, and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates declared the situation at Walter Reed "unacceptable" and promised that officials responsible would "indeed be held accountable."

The Army, meanwhile, has begun repairing facilities that house Walter Reed's outpatients.

Gates named an eight-member independent review group on Friday to review all rehabilitative care and administrative procedures at Walter Reed and at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda. Co-chaired by former Army secretaries Togo West and John O. Marsh Jr., the group will submit a report to the Pentagon within 45 days.

One member of the panel, John J.H. "Joe" Schwarz, a physician and former Republican congressman from Michigan, said yesterday that it had not yet met and that he was "awaiting marching orders" on how the review will proceed.

Battle Worn (WP)

By Paula Span

The Washington Post Magazine, February 25, 2007

After he was injured in Iraq, Richard Twohig found himself fighting an unexpected foe: the U.S. Army.

THE SHADES IN RICHARD TWOHIG'S GARDEN APARTMENT ARE DRAWN TIGHT AGAINST THE SUMMER SUN. This is partly because it's 94 degrees in Knoxville, Tenn., this afternoon, but also because light can trigger one of his bad headaches, the kind that make his knees buckle. His kids have grown accustomed to dimmed surroundings.

They've been cavorting on the living room carpet, Lizzie with her fuzzy pink dog named Princess, her little brother, Damon, with his prized jeep. Their chirpy ebullience isn't unusual for a 6-year-old and a 3-year-old who haven't had much chance to romp outside today but noise can bring on Twohig's migraines, as well. "Why don't you go up and play a while?" he suggests mildly, and they troop upstairs to their shared bedroom.

The apartment, which the family moved into three weeks ago after a nomadic year, still feels a bit empty. There's a couch and a coffee table and a big TV in the living room, but the walls are bare. Twohig wishes he had a yard for the children and their real dog, a boisterous Great Pyrenees named Athena. Still, the place is clean and comfortable, and he can manage the $570 rent on the disability checks that the Department of Veterans Affairs sends each month.

"If I have a good day, I try to take them up to the park at the school," he says, knowing that the kids should probably be outdoors more. It's only a two-minute drive. But he doesn't have so many good days.

Since he was thrown from a moving armored vehicle in Baghdad in May 2003, and landed on his head, the former Army corporal says he has suffered from near-constant headaches. This afternoon's is the easier kind to take: He figures the throbbing registers a 6 or 7 on the 10-point scale that injured vets learn to use to quantify their pain. The more severe headaches come perhaps once a week now, he says, and even the heavy-duty drugs he takes can't really blunt them: "Before, I would pass out in the shower, things like that. You kind of learn when they're coming on. So when I feel lightheaded and my legs get weak, I crouch down" so he doesn't fall. Those are the sort he rates a 10.

The headaches are one of the disabling conditions Twohig incurred in the line of duty, the Army acknowledges, along with a "mood disorder with depressive features." He appears fit, in his patched jeans and T-shirt: 6-foot-2 and, now that the bloat from earlier drug regimens has dissipated, 180 pounds. Tattooed snakes and samurai, souvenirs of Fort Bragg, twine up his arms. With his blue eyes, cleft chin and crew cut, Twohig looks like the same paratrooper -- Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 325th Airborne Infantry Regiment, 82nd Airborne Division -- who easily handled 25-mile marches wearing a 35-pound pack and carrying an M4 rifle.

But he isn't. He often forgets what his mother, retired Marine Corps Maj. Belinda Twohig, tells him on the phone moments after she has said it. He's lethargic; he can't concentrate. If he has to enter a mall, he calculates which entrance will let him come and go with the least amount of human contact. A guy who used to happily devour an entire sausage pizza and some cheese sticks for dinner, he now has scant appetite and, troubled by nightmares, sleeps perhaps three hours a night.

He can't imagine holding a job in this condition. "What can I actually do?" he asks. "Physical work gives me migraines. I vomit all the time . . . I'm on morphine; I'm addicted. I'm just a mess."

Ask him his age, and he takes a long, thoughtful pause before replying. "Twenty-five."

Despite the migraines, the tinnitus (ringing in his ears), the chronic shoulder dislocation and other documented physical problems, he works hard at caring for the children, doing their laundry, cooking them simple meals, supervising them with great patience. (Their mother, from whom he is separated, serves with the Navy in Virginia.)

"Damon, either sit up in your chair or go upstairs and play," he cautions calmly, when the kids grow restive watching the Cartoon Network. "Do not sit on your sister." He rarely raises his voice.

In fact, Twohig's response to most things is muted. He doesn't laugh much, doesn't seem to take much pleasure in Lizzie and Damon's exuberant antics. It might be the meds or the pain or the prospect of a life in which he may never work, but there's a flatness to his personality that his family finds new and troubling.

One subject prompts a more animated response, though, rousing him to noticeable anger: the U.S. Army.

Like any member of the armed forces injured in the line of duty and no longer able to serve, Twohig has been grappling with a complicated disability system that determines whether he merits military retirement. Thousands of other soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines are dealing with the same process. With U.S. troops still in Afghanistan and the war in Iraq entering its fourth year, the annual caseload of troops injured severely enough to be considered for retirement has climbed nearly 53 percent since 2001, to about 23,000 a year. The great majority don't get it, which has made the disability system the object of confusion, apprehension and suspicion among injured veterans and their advocates.

In Twohig's case, an Army Physical Evaluation Board ruled in 2005 that he wasn't disabled enough to qualify, a decision that deprived his wife and children of health insurance through him. He and his family have been battling the finding since.

To Twohig, the fight is based not only on finances but also on principles. He enlisted; he trained; he followed every order "to a T," he says. He paid the price, and now it feels as though the Army is abandoning him.

"I have a son, and I wouldn't let him join the Army," Twohig announces, agitated. "They don't really care about soldiers. They got their mission, and if you're hurt, oh, well."

His voice tightens: "After we're no good to them, they just get rid of us."

RICHARD TWOHIG REMEMBERS LITTLE ABOUT HIS TIME IN IRAQ. His commanding officer, Capt. (now Maj.) Jeffrey Burgoyne, says that Bravo Company saw "a lot of firefights" in Fallujah and other towns as it made its way to Baghdad in late April 2003. But what Twohig can summon up from Iraq aren't battles but the heat and the odd quality of the sand ("it had been cooked so long that when you stepped on it, it broke into pieces") and the occasional K rations, "in big old metal things they heated up," that tasted better than meals-ready-to-eat.

Nor is much recorded about the accident that damaged Twohig -- not even the exact date it occurred. The Commander's Performance Statement, signed by Burgoyne, says Twohig was "on combat patrol" aboard a Bradley armored fighting vehicle, "going approximately 45 mph when it turned a corner in downtown Baghdad, causing Cpl. Twohig to be thrown from the vehicle. He fell on his head and lost consciousness."

Burgoyne now says that the vehicle wasn't a Bradley but a smaller, older M113 about to leave the unit's walled compound and thus going far more slowly. But Burgoyne was at a forward operating base five miles away and only heard of the accident by radio. In any event, "the guy fell off a moving truck; that's significant." And when the battalion learned that Twohig was being helicoptered to Germany, Burgoyne says, "that's when we realized it was more serious than we thought."

A neurology consultation at the Army hospital in Landstuhl, dated May 20, 2003, is the first record of Twohig's injuries, noting his head trauma, throbbing headaches and other symptoms, including memory loss. "I didn't remember my Social Security number or my unit or people I worked with," he says. He even, temporarily, forgot that his son had been born a few months earlier.

He was flown back to Fort Bragg a couple of weeks later. As he made the rounds of doctors at Womack Army Medical Center, Twohig says, his memory improved somewhat, but the headaches and psychiatric symptoms persisted. Belinda Twohig felt her hopes for a speedy recovery sink. She accompanied her son to a neurology appointment in which the doctor told them that when Richard's migraines struck, he should just take his meds and lie down in a quiet, dark room; there was no purpose in going to the emergency room, because nothing else could be done, no stronger medication prescribed. The prognosis was uncertain. After a concussion, the brain needs time to heal, the neurologist cautioned; it could take a year or two to see any improvement.

Meanwhile, Twohig's marriage was fraying under the strain. He says he was vomiting frequently, sleeping a lot and feeling depressed. He could no longer mow the lawn or help with errands; the house, despite his two young children, had to remain quiet. "It just changed the relationship," Twohig says. "She didn't understand and want to deal with my problems." His wife, Sang, did not respond to phone calls seeking comment. At times, he felt so lousy that he wouldn't even come to the phone when his mother called. "We had a close relationship; he always talked to me," Belinda says. "So the withdrawal was the first thing I noticed." When they did talk, she was aware of "confusion. I'd ask him something -- 'How was your day? Have you taken your meds?' 'Yeah, I think so' . . . Just a slow, lethargic answer. And this is not Richard."

Frightened as she was, she told herself that at least the Army would, in her words, "take care of him" and his family. After more than two decades in the service, she knew the outlines of the disability system, and she assumed he would be able to retire. For her son, though, this was uncharted territory.

The magic number, he quickly learned, is 30 percent -- the point at which a disability is considered to be severe enough to prevent someone from functioning normally in the workplace. Those with 30 percent or higher disability ratings can retire with benefits that include monthly checks for the rest of their lives, access to commissaries and post exchanges on military bases, travel on military aircraft and, most coveted, coverage by TriCare, the military's health insurance plan, for themselves and their dependents, present and future. Those rated below 30 percent usually receive a severance check from the military: two months' pay for each year's service, up to 12 years. They can then apply for benefits from Veterans Affairs, which also rates disabilities and provides monthly checks but doesn't offer the other advantages of retirement.

The practice of compensating injured soldiers dates to Colonial times, but the current system has its roots in World Wars I and II. Congress mandated the development of ratings for disabilities in 1917; the Career Compensation Act of 1949 then linked the amount of payments to the degree of disability, establishing the 30 percent threshold. "The thinking was, those rated less wouldn't be so handicapped as to warrant long-term disability pay," explains Rick Surratt, deputy legislative director of Disabled American Veterans. "A lump sum would hold them until they could get reestablished in the workplace."

Getting any rating at all can take many months, however. Once an injured service member is medically stable, he must wait for a military doctor to write a narrative summary of his condition. Then a board of physicians reviews the medical records -- often thick with test results, multiple diagnoses, lists of medications and addenda -- to decide whether he meets retention standards. If not, an informal Physical Evaluation Board assesses the severity of each disability that makes a service member unfit for duty and assigns it a numerical rating, based on detailed guidelines in the Veterans Affairs Schedule for Rating Disabilities.

"What we're attempting to do is approximate the average loss of earnings capacity," says Tom Pamperin, who oversees revisions to VA's guidelines, a nearly unceasing project. Amputation at the upper third of the thigh, for instance, merits an 80 percent disability rating. Amputation at the middle or lower third of the thigh: 60 percent. Mental disorder characterized by "occupational and social impairment, with deficiencies in most areas, such as work, school, family relations, judgment, thinking or mood . . .": 70 percent. Migraines "with characteristic prostrating attacks occurring on an average once a month over the last several months": 30 percent.

Twohig picked up the gist of the process at the Fort Bragg gym, where he worked with other soldiers too disabled for regular duty. He checked ID cards and handed out towels four hours a day -- and says he found even that difficult, because the clanging of free weights and the thunking of basketballs brought on migraines. Meanwhile, he and his buddies pondered the mysteries of disability retirement. There was ample time to compare notes; the pace at which cases proceed can be exasperatingly slow, in violation of the Pentagon's own guidelines.

Twohig waited 17 months to receive the medical evaluation board report that found him no longer fit to serve. Meanwhile, he watched as others received ratings too low to qualify for retirement. One guy with what Twohig describes as "titanium vertebrae" got a 10 percent rating. Another received no severance.

In fact, the majority of injured soldiers fall short of the magic number; the informal evaluation board rates them below 30 percent. The Defense Department reports that the Army, which handles more than half of the military's disability cases, put less than 4 percent of the 10,460 active duty soldiers and reservists it evaluated last year on the permanent disability retirement list and less than 15 percent on the temporary list. (Temporary retirees undergo periodic reassessments of their condition for as much as five years before a final decision.) By comparison, the Navy (including the Marine Corps) retired about 35 percent of its injured, temporarily or permanently, and the Air Force about 24 percent, the Defense Department says.

The difference, the Army's disability agency says, may reflect a higher proportion of musculoskeletal injuries that can interfere with soldiers' duties but have "mild" impact on civilian employability, resulting in severance pay rather than retirement. The Army also has "a unique policy" of not granting retirement for pain that has "no clear cause or objective findings." But, the agency concedes, "it is not possible to state with certainty what might account for the difference" between the Army's and the other branches' retirement rates.

At Fort Bragg, soldiers sometimes find it hard to understand why some people qualified for disability retirement and others didn't. "You don't really know too much about it until you start doing it," says Twohig's friend Jacob Biehn, a former specialist who suffered multiple gunshot wounds in Iraq and eventually received a 30 percent disability rating -- which allowed him to retire but struck his comrades as minimal, given his injuries. "When you go to find out what they decided," he says, "it could be a good day or a bad day."

For Twohig, it was a bad day. He called his mother from Fort Bragg on Nov. 2, 2004, sounding "shaken up," she recalls. "He said: 'Mom, it came back 20 percent . . . How am I going to survive? How can I take care of my family?' I said, 'Son, calm down. We're going to fight this.'"

TWOHIG HAD THE RIGHT TO CONTEST HIS DISABILITY RATING BEFORE A FORMAL PHYSICAL EVALUATION BOARD, and his mother stood ready to help him. A lifelong Marine and a congenital optimist, Belinda felt more determined than discouraged, convinced that the system had erred and would correct itself.

Each branch of the military provides opportunities for injured service members to challenge their ratings, but most of the injured simply pocket their severance checks and go home. Only 20 percent of soldiers ask for a formal hearing, at which an attorney can present evidence and call witnesses, the Army says. Then only half of those soldiers proceed with the hearing.

Perhaps that indicates most injured soldiers are satisfied with their ratings. But veterans groups say that more wounded service members would challenge their ratings if it weren't so complicated and time-consuming.

"It's probably one of the most convoluted workman's compensation systems in the world," says Steve Robinson, government affairs director at Veterans for America.

Most of those hurt in the line of duty are young, weary of fighting and anxious to return to their civilian lives, Robinson and others point out. A severance check for $10,000 or $12,000 (the latter was Twohig's severance after 49 months of service) can seem to be a lot of money. If a case has already dragged on for months, seeking a formal hearing -- even if that's in a service member's best interest -- can require still more time and frustration.

All of which tends to discourage the injured from taking on the system -- and some veterans advocates suspect that the Pentagon, openly worried about ballooning health-care costs, prefers it that way. Medical benefits are not discretionary; the Defense Department must pay the tab. "Increasingly, it's having a direct impact on the department's ability to meet its needs for equipment, replacement equipment, personnel," says William Winkenwerder, assistant secretary of defense for health affairs. "The costs of retirees, the health-care costs, are a great concern to us."

Nevertheless, the Defense Department says that each disability case "is evaluated on the basis of relevant clinical information," and the Army vehemently denies that its evaluation boards award lower ratings because of pressure, direct or indirect, to hold down costs.

"No one has discussed that financial burden with me at all," says Col. Carlton Buchanan, the new deputy commander of the Army's Physical Disability Agency, which oversees its evaluation system. "Nobody has said I have a particular requirement or a goal or a quota or a threshold that I can't surpass . . . I feel no pressure whatsoever to set limits on disability. We will do what's right."

Still, civilian attorneys who argue military disability cases see a pattern in the ratings.

"The informal board will tend to lowball," says Vaughan Taylor, who practices in Jacksonville, N.C., and has argued dozens of disability cases. Like many of the small fraternity of civilian lawyers who specialize in military cases, he is a former military lawyer, or judge advocate, himself. "It's almost as if the informal board exists to give out the standard 10 percent, and then see who squawks."

"The unwritten guidance seems to be: Push these people over to the VA, and let them pay for this," agrees Joseph W. Kastl, a former Air Force lawyer who now calls his Bethesda firm the Military Defender.

Sometimes, service members find the system works well for them. One of Taylor's clients, former Marine Sgt. Eric LeClair of Swansboro, N.C., was unhurt during the first wave of the Iraq invasion, only to take a bad landing during a martial arts test aboard the USS Iwo Jima in September 2003. His list of injuries was pages long: a traumatic brain injury, nerve palsy, bone spurs and degenerated discs. "I can't lift a half-gallon of milk above my waist, and it's been like that for two years," LeClair said this past summer.

The night before he was scheduled to learn his disability rating, he and his wife were too jittery to sleep. They had seen other seriously injured Marines "going through it and getting the shaft," in LeClair's opinion. Despite the pages of additional material and independent physicians' findings that his lawyer had amassed, LeClair expected the same result. But the next morning, to his surprise and his wife's enormous relief, he was placed on the temporary retirement list with a 60 percent rating -- no formal hearing needed.

Former Master Sgt. John Alden Millan of Newland, N.C., had to go a step further. An MP with the Army National Guard, he injured his neck jumping from a truck the day his unit arrived in Iraq. Despite surgery, he says, he still suffers from back pain and severe headaches. When he received a disability rating of 20 percent, he and his attorney, Jack Gately, asked for a formal evaluation board hearing. After Gately presented testimony and Millan answered questions, the board told Millan that his injuries warranted a 40 percent rating. "I said, 'I concur, sir,' signed my paperwork and left," Millan says.

But formal boards reject cases, too. Former Maj. Lionel Walton, who lives in Prince George's County, already had a 20 percent disability from past injuries but had chosen to remain in the Army Reserves ("I bleed green," he says), eventually serving 24 years. In Iraq, he says, he hurt his knee jumping from a truck and running from rockets and car bombs, and injured his back loading heavy cases. Now, at 46, "I can't walk 30 yards without having to sit down; I'm at level 8 pain every day," Walton says. He also struggles with post-traumatic stress disorder.

When his informal evaluation board found him 20 percent disabled -- the same rating he'd had before Iraq -- Walton hired Kastl. In September, the formal evaluation board at Walter Reed Army Medical Center declined to raise his rating. He was stunned: "My government, my country, should do better by me."

Refusing to back down, Walton appealed the formal board's decision to the Physical Disability Agency, and enlisted the help of Maryland Senator Barbara Mikulski's office. He's convinced that her involvement eventually helped raise his rating to 60 percent, and that infuriates him. "It's a shame," he says. "I fought to the end, but a lot of soldiers have given up because of this nonsense."

NORMALLY, THE TWOHIGS AREN'T THE SORT OF PEOPLE INCLINED TO TAKE ON THE MILITARY. Both Richard Twohig's parents were career Marines; his younger brother, Chris, has enlisted in the Marines and shipped off to Parris Island. This is a family that believes every young person should serve this country.

Belinda Twohig trusted so fully in the military's commitment to caring for its own that the idea of looking beyond an Army attorney to represent Richard didn't initially cross her mind. But when she called a friend who was a judge advocate, he warned, "Belinda, you don't fight the Army with the Army." What she needed, he said, was a civilian lawyer specializing in military cases. After a little research, he sent her a name: Mark Waple, a West Point graduate and former judge advocate who practices in Fayetteville, N.C.

Waple has argued perhaps 200 physical evaluation board cases, going back to the Vietnam War era. For most of that time, he says, the evaluation boards "tried very hard to be as fair as possible." Now he describes the system as "broken."

Wounded service members are supposed to be guided through the confusing thicket of disability regulations by physical evaluation board liaison officers, universally known as PEBLOs, whose job is to explain the process, advise service members of their rights and assemble their files. But service members complain that documents get lost, that files are incomplete; some report that the liaisons discourage appeals and the use of outside attorneys.

"Sometimes I feel half of what I do is explain what a PEBLO should have already explained," says Danny Soto, a national service officer for Disabled American Veterans, the only vets organization permitted an office at Walter Reed.

Liaison officers handle many cases; in the Army, for example, they counsel an average of 15 to 30 people a day, not including phone calls. Twohig only remembers meeting his liaison officer once: the day she told him he wouldn't be retired.

The Army has tried to keep up with the sharp rise in disability cases, expanding the Physical Disability Agency staff by 50 percent since 2003, and adding 40 percent more liaison officers and assistants. The Army's caseload, however, has soared by more than 80 percent since 2001.

At Walter Reed, where two part-time Army lawyers handled disability cases in 2003, three lawyers and a paralegal now work full time presenting cases to the formal evaluation board. These lawyers get high marks from their civilian counterparts and from vets groups for knowledge and competence, but low grades on having enough time to put together strong cases, which can involve preparing witnesses and gathering further medical documentation. Each lawyer at Walter Reed handles an average of 256 cases each year, and often doesn't meet a client until the day before the evaluation board hearing, when the attorney spends an hour or so preparing the soldier to testify.

"I don't know how you can prepare adequately for a hearing, a full and fair hearing, if you pick up the case file the day before, two days before," says civilian lawyer David Sheldon, who has a military practice in the District.

The Army disagrees. "Lengthy e-mail messages and in-depth phone calls from the paralegal and the attorney ensure that adequate contact is made in sufficient time before the hearing," says Lt. Col. Samuel Smith, Walter Reed's supervising staff judge advocate, via e-mail because the Army barred in-person interviews with any legal staff or with evaluation board members.

Few of the injured hire their own attorneys to contest findings, even though they have that right. A key barrier is money: A civilian lawyer specializing in military cases will likely charge $5,000 or more to prepare for a formal hearing, with no guarantee of success.

Waple was blunt about that when the Twohigs went to see him in early 2005. He thought Richard was clearly entitled to retirement. But migraines are hard to get rated for, because sufferers can rarely document how frequently they occur, something the physical evaluation board wants to know. Richard would have been better served, Waple said, if his neurologist had told him to go to the emergency room whenever he had an incapacitating headache, or even advised that he keep a diary. Waple, however, could call a witness -- Belinda -- who could explain why there was no record of how often Richard's headaches struck.

Richard's psychological symptoms presented a different problem. Waple knew the board might not give much credence to his mood disorder.

The way the military rates psychiatric injuries -- or doesn't -- is a sore subject among veterans groups and civilian lawyers who handle disability cases. The incidence of mental health problems among those returning from Iraq appears high. An Army research team, reviewing the records of more than 300,000 soldiers and Marines, reported last year that more than one-third of Iraq veterans had visited mental health clinics at least once in their first year at home; they were considerably more likely to show signs of psychological distress than those who had served in other overseas locations such as Afghanistan or Bosnia. Yet critics charge that evaluators are particularly skeptical about diagnoses of post-traumatic stress disorder and other psychological injuries.

"If they've been shot five times and need multiple surgeries, and it's very obvious to the doctors what's wrong, then it's a lot easier," says Charlotte Cluverius, a Washington attorney who represents service members at disability hearings. "The burden on the service member is much, much higher with psychological issues, even though those can be just as devastating and incapacitating."

Danny Soto agrees. At Walter Reed, where he counsels dozens of soldiers each week, he thinks that just 40 to 50 percent are being rated correctly for their injuries. When it comes to clear-cut physical problems, something as visible and inarguable as amputation, "they get that right," Soto says. "If you're talking traumatic brain injuries, psychiatric injuries, it drags on."

The Army rejects the notion that large numbers of injured soldiers aren't being rated correctly. Its Physical Disability Agency reviews 25 to 30 percent of informal and formal evaluation board decisions, and is satisfied with its work.

David Armitage, the agency's senior medical adviser, acknowledges that correctly evaluating post-traumatic stress syndrome and other mental disorders -- or any self-reported disability -- can be difficult. "It's a fact-finding matter," he says. "We look for supportive evidence." Otherwise, a condition such as migraine headaches "is too easily conjured up or exaggerated." But he adds, "that's true throughout the entire disability world, not just in the military . . . I think we're doing better every day."

Waple wasn't so sanguine. He told the Twohigs that he wasn't having much success with the Army and that the odds weren't high that the formal evaluation board would raise Richard's rating to 30 percent. Besides, Waple's services, including the fee for the independent forensic psychologist's evaluation he recommended, would cost about $6,000. Belinda, who had just paid lawyers' fees to divorce Richard's father, blanched. But they agreed to proceed, with each parent paying half the cost.

Richard's case would be heard at Walter Reed, where the evaluation board scheduled the hearing for a day when Waple had a court appearance elsewhere and then refused to grant a five-day delay. That meant Waple would prepare Twohig's case but that an Army lawyer would have to present it.

Still, the Twohigs felt hopeful. Once the board heard the full story, Belinda was sure, "they are going to realize that there was wrong done. They're going to see and say, 'Okay, Richard should be 30 percent.'"

BELINDA ACCOMPANIED RICHARD TO WASHINGTON FOR HIS HEARING IN MARCH 2005. For one thing, he was in no condition to drive, she says, "from the stress and all the meds he was on." In addition to the pain drug Dilaudid, he was taking medications for his migraines, for nausea and sleeplessness, and for depression. Belinda would also be a witness, able to testify about the changes in her son and about what his neurologist had advised.

It was a stressful time. Belinda, who had been teaching ROTC at Florida A&M University, was newly divorced and about to retire from the Marines after 28 years, forgoing an expected promotion to lieutenant colonel. She planned to sell her house in Tallahassee and look for a job in Tennessee, where she would be near Richard and her grandchildren.

"My children have sacrificed a lot for my career," Belinda says. "There were deployments; there were a lot of long hours." She can still tick off her absences: the 10 weeks her two boys stayed with her sister while she was at Officer Candidates School, the six months' further training at Quantico when she got home every other weekend, a stint at Guantanamo . . . "I wasn't always there for them, I feel."

Now, she intended to be. So while Richard lay in the back seat of her '94 Mustang, she drove north, stopping at a highway rest area when a headache nauseated him and he needed to vomit.

This wasn't the son she had raised. Growing up mostly in Jacksonville, N.C., he was the kind of kid who was happiest outdoors, a deer and duck hunter, a year-round surfer at nearby beaches, a halfback on a traveling soccer team. "Richard always had friends; Richard used to joke a lot," she remembers. She wasn't pleased, when she and her husband went off one weekend, to learn that Richard had invited his soccer buddies over for a beer bash that drew the police. But the incident does remind her that back then, "he liked to be around people. He was always dragging someone home."

He went off to North Carolina A&T to study business management, and, toward the end of freshman year, met a young woman in a club. He and Sang, the daughter of Cambodian immigrants, went out for a while, had Lizzie when they were both 19, then married. Twohig left school and took jobs flushing radiators at Jiffy Lube and loading United Parcel Service trucks, but he had trouble earning enough for a family, and none of his employers supplied benefits. The military would. It might be "the best option to get my degree and help the family," he thought. "My mom did it that way, went in the Marine Corps, got her education. So did my dad." And the Army was offering $20,000 signing bonuses. He walked into the recruiting station in Jacksonville and enlisted in early 2001. When he graduated from boot camp, his mother swore him in, an officer's prerogative and an act she now sometimes regrets.

Twohig was sure after September 11 that he'd be sent to Afghanistan. But his unit remained at Fort Bragg until Iraq, a war whose political dimensions he gave little thought to. "I looked on it more as a job," he explains. "You're supposed to do it. Your feelings don't really matter."

He had been a good soldier, his mother thought, and he was a good man. She had faith, and not solely in the military.

In the months since his accident, Belinda, a churchgoing Catholic, prayed the rosary as she walked around the track at Florida A&M each morning. She was praying again as they rounded the Beltway and headed for a hotel in Silver Spring.

THAT AFTERNOON, THE TWOHIGS MET WITH ASSIGNED MILITARY COUNSEL DAVID WHITE, who, using Mark Waple's brief and materials, would represent Richard at the hearing next day. White explained the procedure and, as Belinda remembers it, said Richard stood a decent chance of having his 20 percent rating raised.

Richard hardly slept that night. When they reported to Building 7 at Walter Reed the next morning, both in uniform, he felt ill and vomited a little in a hallway water fountain; Belinda fished some tissues from her briefcase and cleaned up the mess. To ward off an approaching migraine, he took his anti-nausea pills and Dilaudid, which tended to undermine his already-diminished ability to concentrate. "He looked like a zombie," his mother says.

The Physical Evaluation Board at Walter Reed is one of three meeting around the country for the Army; the others are at Fort Lewis in Washington state and Fort Sam Houston in Texas, sometimes supplemented by a mobile board. (The Navy and Air Force have their own physical evaluation boards.) A typical board has three members, one of whom is a physician. But that doesn't mean anyone on the board has had previous experience in evaluating disabilities; the physician hearing about brain injuries could be a dermatologist or an obstetrician. Members of the Army board take a five-day classroom course before they start adjudicating cases; the rest of their training comes on the job.

Inadequate training is among the problems that investigators have repeatedly cited in calling for improvements to the disability system. For nearly two decades, studies by both military and civilian teams -- the Army Audit Agency, the Defense Department's Inspector General, the Rand Corp. -- have criticized the system's inconsistencies, its delays, its lack of oversight and quality control. The latest report, issued by the Government Accountability Office last year, sounded many of the same themes, and the Defense Department didn't disagree. The Pentagon says a number of improvement efforts are now underway, including the long-planned computerization of all health records.

The Army, however, insists that it is already doing a good job. Armitage, who helped develop the Army's five-day training course, defends the members of the evaluation boards and their preparation. "These are people who know what soldiering is all about; they know the stresses that soldiers undergo; they know what the requirements are for soldiers to perform," he says. "They've been there."

The evaluation board that met to consider Twohig's case included a longtime infantry officer as president (he has since retired), a retired Navy psychiatrist as the medical member and a personnel management officer who had served in Iraq. They met in Room 235, a small space hung with Army insignia and posters of the human spine. Each of the three members and the soldier had a microphone on the table before him so that the hearing could be recorded on a CD.

It's supposed to be a non-adversarial proceeding. Some soldiers find it intimidating, nonetheless. For Twohig, it mostly seemed perplexing. The transcript shows that several times, as the attorney had him describe his injuries or board members chimed in with questions, he sounded muddled, not quite able to grasp what was being asked.

Physical Evaluation Board president Col. James Babbitt (after Twohig testified that he had trouble concentrating): If the 1st Sergeant tells you, "Go to 1st Platoon and find the Platoon Sergeant and tell him I want to see him at 2 o'clock," can you do that?

Twohig: Yes.

DOJ_NMG_0136525

Babbitt: If he says, "Go find the 1st Platoon Sergeant, tell him I want to see him at 2 o'clock, find the 1st Squad Leader and tell him I need to see him right now, and tell the 2nd Squad Leader I'll see him tomorrow," would you have any problem delivering those messages?

Twohig: What?

Belinda Twohig also testified, speaking at length about the changes she had seen in her son since his accident, his isolation and memory problems, his physical incapacity. "There is depression, because he feels he is incapable or cannot achieve any dreams that he had before," she said. "I think that the depression is coming because he doesn't know how to get better, and, you know, I don't either . . ."

But Babbitt prevented her from testifying about what the neurologist had said about not needing to seek further medical attention when the migraines hit. "We've brought that out already," he said. "That's not necessary. That's just duplicious."

After nearly two hours, the board recessed briefly. Then Babbitt read its decision: that Richard was physically unfit to perform his duties, that he had "post-concussive syndrome associated with headaches, dizziness, bilateral tinnitus, nausea, decreased concentration and forgetfulness" that "limit his activities of daily living." That he took "a narcotic substance, mood stabilizing and antidepressant medications." That he further had "mood disorder with depressive features manifest by chronic irritable mood, insomnia, decreased appetite, social withdrawal and low self-worth."

It sounded to the Twohigs as though the board saw things their way. Then Babbitt read Richard's rating: 10 percent.

After thanking Richard for his service, the board adjourned; the recording equipment was turned off.

Belinda Twohig remembers erupting in shock. "I don't believe this!"

"Mom, what happened? What are they saying?" Richard didn't understand.

"I gave the Army a perfectly capable young man, and what you give me is somebody incapable of working, and you tell me that's only worth 10 percent?" Belinda exclaimed.

The board president said he understood her distress.

"I don't believe we are not taking care of him," she said.

"That's what the VA is for," she remembers Babbitt saying.

One board member, Lt. Col. Nick Gnemi, disagreed with the finding and announced he would submit a minority report, a rare occurrence. As the Twohigs waited in the anteroom while Gnemi wrote it, Richard was anxiously wondering how he could take care of Sang and the kids. They would have to sell the house they had bought just two years earlier. "He was just ripping inside," Belinda says.

Sounding stronger than she felt, she told him not to worry, that they would get through this. She didn't want Richard to see her in tears, and she didn't want to show emotion before the other officers, "especially that president." So she found a corner downstairs, wept briefly, dried her face.

Gnemi handed them a copy of his two-page minority report, explaining his disagreements with the rating and concluding, "This combat veteran needs to be given the benefit of the doubt and be placed on TDRL [temporary disability retirement list] to continue additional rehabilitation and medical care." He told the Twohigs he hoped it would help.

Enervated, they left Walter Reed and started the long trip home. Richard was feeling sick.

"Do you want to stop?" Belinda asked.

"No, I just want to get the hell out of here."

So she paused just long enough for him to open the car door at a stop sign, lean out and vomit. Then she drove on.

RICHARD TWOHIG IS VERY QUIET on the 40-mile drive out to his mother's farm in Sweetwater, Tenn. It's the first time he has left the apartment in a couple of days.

Smoking Newports, he steers his SUV off the interstate, along a two-lane blacktop that climbs past fields of Queen Anne's lace and dairy cows in fenced pastures. Belinda first visited this area during a vacation in the Smokies, and bought her tract of fields, creeks and woodland six years ago. She hadn't expected to move here this soon, but now that seems the best solution for everyone.

Her plan is to raise, breed and sell alpacas. She already owns eight, currently boarded in Georgia while she prepares paddocks and barns. Richard, always an animal lover, has spent time learning to care for them. Alpacas are one of the few subjects for which he can, sometimes, summon real enthusiasm -- talking about how "they're real skittish" until you've worked with them for a while, how "they love kids," how their fleece comes in lots of colors, "gray, silver, black, white."

So Belinda's great hope is that he and the kids will move into a log cabin she's building on the property, where she can help raise her grandchildren while her son helps raise her flock.

"Daddy! Daddy!" Lizzie and Damon, who have spent the night with Belinda ("Grammy") and her fiance, Robert Rhyne, come dashing over as Twohig pulls into the drive. "Did you bring our water guns?"

DOJ_NMG_0136526

"I didn't think of it," he says. He has a headache, one of the milder ones, but he sits on the front porch of the cabin -- Belinda and Robert are hanging kitchen cabinets inside -- and plays several rounds of tic-tac-toe with Lizzie. "No more," he says, after a few minutes. He watches Damon run his battery-powered truck up the pile of dirt next door to the cabin.

He and the children bounced around a good deal after his hearing and separation from the Army. The Veterans Affairs office in Winston-Salem, N.C., processed his benefits application at near-record speed -- probably helped along by an article in the Fayetteville Observer about his plight. The VA often assigns higher ratings; it uses the same guidelines as the military but applies them according to its own regulations and practices. It found Twohig 100 percent disabled, including a 50 percent rating for his headaches and 70 percent for his cognitive and mood disorder, with lower ratings for several other physical problems. "It is clear," its report says, "that you are unable to acquire and/or maintain substantially gainful employment in either a physical or sedentary setting . . ."

But while the VA began paying him $2,700 a month, it also -- by regulation -- deducted the Army's severance payment from his checks until the entire $12,000 was repaid. Unable to maintain a household on so little income, Richard sold the family's brick ranch in Fayetteville, and he and the kids lived for a while with his mother in Florida, then with his father in Tennessee and with Sang in Virginia. When he and Sang separated this past summer, they agreed that Richard should take the children because he wasn't working and could be at home.

He wouldn't get higher monthly income as a retiree than he currently gets from the VA. But TriCare insurance would let him see local civilian doctors; he would not have to drive nearly two hours to the VA hospital in Johnson City, Tenn. And it would cover Lizzie and Damon. Providing them with health insurance is the reason his estranged wife enlisted, so they're okay for now, but Sang has said she isn't loving the Navy. What happens if she leaves?

An appeal filed with the Physical Disability Agency was denied in April 2005, but Waple said he was willing to take Twohig's case to the ultimate level, the Army Board for the Correction of Military Records.

Even after Waple reduced his normal fee ("These people have been through hell," he explains), the appeal would cost another $2,500. "Mom, don't waste your money," Twohig urged. But Belinda considered that a reasonable investment if it brought her grandchildren health insurance until adulthood. "If I don't do this for the kids' sake, for their medical benefits, I'll regret it for the rest of my life," she decided.

So in July, Waple filed a petition arguing that the physical evaluation board failed to award the appropriate disability percentage, based on the regulations and the evidence presented. A decision could still be months away.

Belinda remains optimistic. "If I was sitting on that board and this was not my son, and I looked at everything," she says, "I would give him that 30 percent."

Meanwhile, the farm is taking shape. Belinda teaches ROTC in a Knoxville high school, and on weekends she and Robert, a jovial former contractor, do as much of the construction work themselves as they can. The main house, a dormered colonial of clapboard and fieldstone, is going up just across the meadow from the cabin. It will have three bedrooms upstairs and one on the main floor for Belinda's mother.

The cabin, where soon everyone is eating sandwiches and sitting on lawn chairs and upended spackle buckets on the porch, is just 400 square feet. Belinda can use it for meetings with prospective buyers and seminars on alpaca-raising. But it has a kitchen and a bathroom and could easily be expanded, which is her not-very-secret plan.

She's treading carefully, trying not to pressure Richard; she knows he needs to make his own decisions. She's mindful of the time she offered to ferry Lizzie to and from school each day -- the elementary school is near the high school where she's teaching -- and her son objected, "Mom, I have to have a purpose in life." Sometimes, beset by pain and depression, he says caring for his children is all that keeps him going. So Belinda hasn't pushed for a decision.

"I'm just in transition," Twohig says. "I don't know what I'm doing." In the coming months, as he turns 26, he'll move out to a rented house near the farm -- but not onto it.

Nevertheless, when Belinda stands on the porch and looks out at her property, a quiet haven without another house in sight, she envisions building a couple of bedrooms onto the cabin for Richard and the kids and the dog. He could help with the alpacas, with feeding and watering, shearing, trimming toenails. And when he had a bad day, Belinda and her mother would be just a few hundred feet away, ready to care for the kids until he recovered.

He'd never have to contend with crowds or noise or pressure or bosses. He could raise children and alpacas, and she'd have his back. He could, perhaps, be happy.

Lives Entwined By War Enter A Long, Arduous Chapter Called Recovery (NYT)

Petty Officer Third Class Dustin E. Kirby, a Navy corpsman whose efforts to save a wounded marine in Iraq and his own wounding by a sniper on Christmas were covered by The New York Times, has returned home to Georgia and expects a nearly full recovery, he and his family said.

He returned escorted by a police honor guard early this month, after his discharge from the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., and four operations during five weeks of care.

Petty Officer Kirby, 23, was struck by a bullet in the left side of the face while near a bunker on the roof of Outpost Omar, a Marine position in Karma, a city in Anbar Province.

His injury mixed the worst of luck with an uncanny stroke of good fortune.

The bullet, which he said was an armor-piercing 7.62 millimeter round fired from a Dragunov-style sniper rifle at a range of 400 to 600 yards, passed through his head and exited at the side of his mouth. In traveling this path, it did not strike his brain, spinal column or major veins or arteries, he said.

Immediately after the bullet's impact, Petty Officer Kirby remained conscious and could walk. He communicated by writing notes. But his condition deteriorated, he and officers in his battalion said, from blood loss and trauma to the roof of his mouth and the base of his skull.

Although officers in the unit to which he was assigned, Second Battalion, Eighth Marines, initially thought he had lost his ability to speak, since undergoing the operations he has recovered a voice that is only slightly slurred.

"I'm doing a lot better than most people would expect," he said by telephone from Hiram, Ga.

Petty Officer Kirby had been assigned as a trauma medic to the battalion's weapons company. In early November he was the subject of an article that described his work and prayers to save the life of his friend, Lance Cpl. Colin Smith, a machine gunner in the vehicle's turret who was shot through the skull by a sniper in Karma in late October.

Lance Corporal Smith, 19, survived, and is undergoing treatment and full days of intensive therapy at the Veterans Affairs Medical Center in Minneapolis. His father, Bob Smith, said by telephone that while his prognosis is unclear he has made significant progress.

The bullet, the same type that struck Petty Officer Kirby, destroyed the top regions of both frontal lobes of Lance Corporal Smith's brain. But since being medically stabilized and beginning a range of therapies, he has begun to walk with assistance and a four-pronged cane, to smile and to mimic sounds and repeat words he hears, his father said.

Mr. Smith also said his son recognized relatives and was in very good spirits, often laughing, acting playfully and twinkling his eyes.

"The essence of him is there," Mr. Smith said. "It is not always easy for him to communicate, but it is there."

Because of damage to areas of the brain that control speech, Mr. Smith said, it was not clear how fully Lance Corporal Smith would recover his ability to converse. Similarly, he has extremely limited movement on the right side of his body. It is too soon to predict how much range of motion and strength would return.

"You never know when the healing process will plateau," Mr. Smith said, but added, "Every day you can see him improve."

Petty Officer Kirby's therapy and treatment are less extensive. The bullet tore away seven teeth, the right side of his lower jaw, several patches of nerve and a section of his tongue. It also shattered part of his lower skull, near the roof of his mouth.

Surgeons have rebuilt his face with bone and skin from one of his legs, he said, and secured the damaged tissues with 14 metal plates.

"The plates are just kind of holding everything together and allowing it to grow back to what it was," he said.

He said he expects to have three or four more operations in the next six months, and will require therapy to recover his speech in full.

His mother, Gail Kirby, said that his prognosis is good, and that his attitude is, too.

"At his first meeting with the local speech therapist, he walked in and said, 'Supercalifragilisticexpialidocious,' " she said, using the word made famous by Julie Andrews in "Mary Poppins." "Then he said, 'There. Can I go now?' "

Petty Officer Kirby said he intended to return to active duty when his doctors allow, and hoped to become an instructor at a military school, training other corpsmen in combat medical duties.

As the two men have continued to convalesce, their battalion completed its tour in Iraq and moved out of the country through Kuwait. Its last members returned to its home base, Camp Lejeune, N.C., on Feb. 21. Petty Officer Kirby said he hoped to rejoin them.

Mr. Smith, Lance Corporal Smith's father, said his son's platoon sergeant was planning to visit him in March.

In Hiram, Petty Officer Kirby's mother said that for now she was simply grateful he was home.

For months, she said, she barely slept, and constantly checked e-mail messages, news reports from Iraq and Web sites that track American casualties in Iraq.

More Sabers To Rattle, Perhaps Fewer To Thrust (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

WITH just enough flourish to give North Korea something to think about, a squadron of radar-evading F-22 Raptors landed in Japan a week ago, the first overseas deployment of the United States Air Force's new ground-attack jet.

In a decision intended to give Iran similar pause, a second aircraft carrier arrived last week in waters within easy sail of the Persian Gulf.

These moves seemed like perfectly logical geopolitical responses to heightened dangers. But they also helped mask another reality. Because the military today does not have enough available ground troops to use for intimidation, the moves were pretty much the only options rather than choices among several.

In the past, certain Army brigades were designated to be on standby, ready to rush to global hot spots in 18 to 72 hours. But the Army and Marines are carrying out the mission in Iraq and Afghanistan with large and sustained deployments, so warplanes and warships are replacing boots on the ground elsewhere.

Senior military planners do not deny that last week's deployments reflect a deep concern in the Pentagon that the United States simply may not have enough ready and available resources to go around. Moves like these have become necessary to offset enemy notions that being tied down in Iraq and Afghanistan have made America weak and in no position to exert any kind of force outside of those conflicts.

There is ample cause for concern. In addition to a shortage of available ground troops, military planners worry, armor and other combat gear being rushed to Iraq might not be around for use in another crisis.

Just last week, the nation's highest-ranking officer, Gen. Peter Pace, secretly upgraded to "significant" the risk the military faces this year in carrying out its full national security mission. He unwaveringly stated that the armed forces would succeed at any mission ordered by the president; the response would just be slower, less elegant, more dangerous.

Taken together, the active-duty military and the reserves number more than two million, but the military is struggling to fill a roster of about 160,000 troops to carry out President Bush's strategy in Iraq. Part of the strain is simple inefficiency. As Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the departing Army chief of staff, has said, the military deployment system is like a keg of beer, with the tap put too near the top to drain the whole barrel.

In a reflection of these strains, the Army is preparing this week to go public with its detailed plans for training and equipping the five Brigade Combat Teams being rushed to Iraq under Mr. Bush's stabilization strategy — the so-called surge.

"Those B.C.T.'s are needed in Iraq sooner than the Army had planned to have them ready, and that increases the risk, of course," said one senior Army officer.

To meet the orders to deploy, and to reassure the troops and their families that every soldier landing in the desert will be certified ready for the mission, those brigades will focus on training relevant only to the counterinsurgency effort in Iraq, leaving for another day the full spectrum of training desired by the Army to have its units prepared for any emergency, a senior officer said.

"At the end of the day, strategy is the management of risk, whether personal or military strategy," said Jeffrey D. McCausland, a retired Army colonel now a senior fellow at the Carnegie Council in New York. "The question is, how much risk are we willing to live with? We are taking a significant amount of strategic risk today because, if you look at our ground forces, we have pulled almost everything out of the box already. So if a major problem arises somewhere else, what do we turn to?"

As a consequence, he said, the United States has lost much of its historic military flexibility. "We know that," he said. "So do our adversaries. To some degree, Iran and North Korea can play this round of poker more boldly."

American military planners are adapting to this new world of threat by deciding that its forces are fungible, and that the role traditionally assigned to the ground brigades designated for emergency deployment can be filled by other parts of the military. Aircraft and ships are the moving pieces to thrust and parry on the global chess board.

That, and billions in new spending. Money has been requested to increase the military by 92,000 people over the number in uniform on Sept. 11, 2001, with new money to recruit soldiers and entice experienced ones to stay longer. The 2007 budget has new allocations of $17.1 billion to reset Army equipment and $5.8 billion for Marine gear, with a separate fund of $13.9 billion in emergency spending power to replace or repair gear destroyed, damaged or worn in combat.

The debate over readiness and how to mitigate the current risk played out in secret this past week. Dated Feb. 20, a six-page document with red trim on the cover was quietly delivered to both houses of Congress, fulfilling a legal obligation for the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in odd-numbered years, to give his unvarnished assessment of the nature and magnitude of the current risks to carrying out the nation's military strategy. That is the report in which General Pace told Congress that the risk had increased to "significant," from "moderate" in the previous assessment.

The chairman's risk assessment is based on hard facts: numbers of troops deployed in combat zones, recruiting successes and shortfalls, armored vehicles to be replaced or repaired or drawn out of emergency depots to fulfill the Iraq mission, availability of transport planes, aerial refueling tankers, remotely piloted surveillance vehicles.

But there are important intangibles, mostly of perception. While General Pace's assessment is classified, he has said in public that potential adversaries like Iran or North Korea should not miscalculate because the United States retains the military capability to carry out any mission ordered by the president.

A range of officials who read the assessment noted with concern that it did not factor in the 20,000-plus troops ordered to Iraq in January.

While the armed forces labor to keep the lid on Iraq and Afghanistan (and there is clear if cautious optimism on the part of senior officers), there are plenty of other bad neighborhoods: the Straits of Hormuz, where Iran could try to shut off global oil supplies in retaliation for efforts to curtail its nuclear ambitions; the straits dividing China and what it views as a renegade Taiwan; the tense demilitarized zone between South Korea and a newly nuclear-capable North, which can strike Japan, one of America's most important allies, with missiles.

And here are some of the less-talked-about what-ifs that keep military planners awake at night: How does the American military respond if Fidel Castro dies and hundreds of thousands of Cubans set sail for the Gulf Coast of the United States? What if violent Islamic extremists seek to topple oil-rich American allies in the Persian Gulf, especially Saudi Arabia? What if the next assassination attempt on President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, whose country has the bomb, is successful?

In fact, the Pentagon detailed its efforts to mitigate the risks described by General Pace in a parallel document from Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that, by law, is required to accompany the chairman's assessment whenever the classified report judges that the risk to carrying out the mission has become "significant."

The document from Mr. Gates described the Pentagon's continuing efforts to increase the size of the military, replace lost or worn equipment, prepare the reserves for more efficient mobilization and modernize the force.

"There is no doubt that we can still conduct all of the missions assigned to us under the national military strategy," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman. He noted that when the active-duty military, the reserves and Pentagon civilians are tallied, the rolls top three million, and that is without any call to national mobilization.

Al Qaeda Resurgent (NYT)

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

Almost five and a half years ago, America — united by the shock of 9/11 — understood exactly what it needed to do. It had to find, thwart and take down the command structure of Al Qaeda, which was responsible for the deaths of 3,000 innocent people on American soil. Despite years of costly warfare in Afghanistan and Iraq, America today is not significantly closer to that essential goal.

At a crucial moment, the Bush administration diverted America's military strength, political attention and foreign aid dollars from a necessary, winnable war in Afghanistan to an unnecessary, and by now unwinnable, war in Iraq. Al Qaeda took full advantage of these blunders to survive and rebuild. Now it seems to be back in business.

As our colleagues Mark Mazzetti and David Rohde reported last week, American intelligence and counterterrorism officials believe that Al Qaeda has rebuilt its notorious training camps, this time in Pakistan's loosely governed tribal regions near the Afghan border. Camp graduates are fighting in Afghanistan and Iraq — and may well be plotting new terrorist strikes in the West.

The same officials point to more frequent and more current videos as evidence that Al Qaeda's top leaders, Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri — once on the run for their lives and unable to maintain timely communications with their followers — now feel more secure. Al Qaeda is not as strong as it was when its Taliban allies ruled Afghanistan. But, the officials warn, it is getting there.

Al Qaeda's comeback didn't have to happen. And it must not be allowed to continue. The new Qaeda sanctuaries in Pakistan do not operate with the blessing of the Pakistani government. But Pakistan's military dictator, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has not tried very hard to drive them out. In recent months he has virtually conceded the tribal areas to local leaders sympathetic to Al Qaeda. President Bush needs to warn him that continued American backing depends on his doing more to rid his country of people being trained to kill Americans.

Washington also has to enlist more support on the Afghan side of the border. NATO allies need to drop restrictions that hobble their troops' ability to fight a resurgent Taliban. Afghan leaders need to wage a more aggressive campaign against corruption and drug trafficking. And Washington needs to pour significantly more money into rural development, to give Afghan farmers alternatives to drug cultivation. One reason General Musharraf has been hedging his bets with the Taliban and Al Qaeda is his growing doubt that Washington is determined to succeed in Afghanistan.

Having failed to finish off Al Qaeda in Afghanistan, Washington now finds itself fighting Qaeda-affiliated groups on multiple fronts, most recently in Somalia. Al Qaeda's comeback in Pakistan is a devastating indictment of Mr. Bush's grievously flawed strategies and misplaced Iraq obsession. Unless the president changes course, the dangers to America and its friends will continue to multiply.

Where Were You That Summer Of 2001? (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

"UNITED 93," Hollywood's highly praised but indifferently attended 9/11 docudrama, will be only a blip on tonight's Oscar telecast. The ratings rise of "24" has stalled as audiences defect from the downer of terrorists to the supernatural uplift of "Heroes." Cable surfers have tuned out Iraq for a war with laughs: the battle over Anna Nicole's decomposing corpse. Set this cultural backdrop against last week's terrifying but little-heeded front-page Times account of American "intelligence and counterterrorism officials" leaking urgent warnings about Al Qaeda's comeback, and ask yourself: Haven't we been here before?

If so, that would be the summer of 2001, when America pigged out on a 24/7 buffet of Gary Condit and shark attacks. The intelligence and counterterrorism officials back then were privately sounding urgent warnings like those in last week's Times, culminating in the President's Daily Brief titled "Bin Laden Determined to Strike in U.S." The system "was blinking red," as the C.I.A. chief George Tenet would later tell the 9/11 commission. But no one, from the White House on down, wanted to hear it.

The White House doesn't want to hear it now, either. That's why terrorism experts are trying to get its attention by going public, and not just through The Times. Michael Scheuer, the former head of the C.I.A. bin Laden unit, told MSNBC's Keith Olbermann last week that the Taliban and Al Qaeda, having regrouped in Afghanistan and Pakistan, "are going to detonate a nuclear device inside the United States" (the real United States, that is, not the fictional stand-in where this same scenario can be found on "24"). Al Qaeda is "on the march" rather than on the run, the Georgetown University and West Point terrorism expert Bruce Hoffman told Congress. Tony Blair is pulling troops out of Iraq not because Basra is calm enough to be entrusted to Iraqi forces — it's "not ready for transition," according to the Pentagon's last report — but to shift some British resources to the losing battle against the resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan.

This is why the entire debate about the Iraq "surge" is as much a sideshow as Britney's scalp. More troops in Baghdad are irrelevant to what's going down in Afghanistan and Pakistan. The surge supporters who accuse the Iraq war's critics of emboldening the enemy are trying to deflect attention from their own complicity in losing a bigger battle: the one against the enemy that actually did attack us on 9/11. Who lost Iraq? is but a distraction from the more damning question, Who is losing the war on terrorism?

The record so far suggests that this White House has done so twice. The first defeat, of course, began in early December 2001, when we lost Osama bin Laden in Tora Bora. The public would not learn about that failure until April 2002 (when it was uncovered by The Washington Post), but it's revealing that the administration started its bait-and-switch trick to relocate the enemy in Iraq just as bin Laden slipped away. It was on Dec. 9, 2001, that Dick Cheney first floated the idea on "Meet the Press" that Saddam had something to do with 9/11. It was "pretty well confirmed," he said (though it was not), that bin Laden's operative Mohamed Atta had met with an Iraqi intelligence officer in Prague months before Atta flew a hijacked plane into the World Trade Center.

In the Scooter Libby trial, Mr. Cheney's former communications aide, Catherine Martin, said that delivering a message on "Meet the Press" was "a tactic we often used." No kidding. That mention of the nonexistent Prague meeting was the first of five times that the vice president would imply an Iraq-Qaeda collaboration on that NBC show before the war began in March 2003. This bogus innuendo was an essential tool for selling the war precisely because we had lost bin Laden in Afghanistan. If we could fight Al Qaeda by going to war in Iraq instead, the administration could claim it didn't matter where bin Laden was. (Mr. Bush pointedly stopped mentioning him altogether in public.)

The president now says his government never hyped any 9/11-Iraq links. "Nobody has ever suggested that the attacks of September the 11th were ordered by Iraq," he said last August after finally conceding that Iraq had nothing to do with 9/11. In fact everyone in the administration insinuated it constantly, including him. Mr. Bush told of "high-level" Iraq-Qaeda contacts "that go back a decade" in the same notorious October 2002 speech that gave us Saddam's imminent mushroom clouds. So effective was this propaganda that by 2003 some 44 percent of Americans believed (incorrectly) that the 9/11 hijackers had been Iraqis; only 3 percent had seen an Iraq link right after 9/11.

Though the nonexistent connection was even more specious than the nonexistent nuclear W.M.D., Mr. Bush still leans on it today even while denying that he does so. He has to. His litanies that we are "on the offense" by pursuing the war in Iraq and "fighting terrorists over there, so that we don't have to fight them here" depend on the premise that we went into that country in the first place to vanquish Al Qaeda and that it is still the "central front" in the war on terror. In January's State of the Union address hawking the so-called surge, Mr. Bush did it again, warning that to leave Iraq "would be to ignore the lessons of September the 11th and invite tragedy."

But now more than ever, the opposite is true. It is precisely by pouring still more of our finite military and intelligence resources down the drain in Iraq that we are tragically ignoring the lessons of 9/11. Instead of showing resolve, as Mr. Bush supposes, his botch of the Iraq war has revealed American weakness. Our catastrophic occupation spawned terrorists in a country where they didn't used to be, and to pretend that Iraq is now their central front only adds to the disaster. As Mr. Scheuer, the former C.I.A. official, reiterated last week: "Al Qaeda is in Afghanistan and Pakistan. If you want to address the threat to America, that's where it is." It's typical of Mr. Bush's self-righteousness, however, that he would rather punt on that threat than own up to a mistake.

That mistake — dropping the ball on Al Qaeda — was compounded last fall when Mr. Bush committed his second major blunder in the war on terror. The occasion was the September revelation that our supposed ally, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, president of Pakistan, had negotiated a "truce" with the Taliban in North Waziristan, a tribal region in his country at the Afghanistan border. This truce was actually a retreat by Pakistan, which even released Qaeda prisoners in its custody. Yet the Bush White House denied any of this was happening. "This deal is not at all with the Taliban," the president said, claiming that "this is against the Taliban, actually." When Dana Priest and Ann Scott Tyson of The Washington Post reported that same month that the bin Laden trail was "stone cold" and had been since Mr. Bush diverted special operations troops from that hunt to Iraq in 2003, the White House branded the story flat wrong. "We're on the hunt," Mr. Bush said. "We'll get him."

Far from getting him or any of his top operatives dead or alive, the president has sat idly by, showering praise on General Musharraf while Taliban attacks from Pakistan into Afghanistan have increased threefold. As The Times reported last week, now both bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, are believed to be "steadily building an operations hub" in North Waziristan. We know that last year's London plot to bomb airliners, like the bus-and-subway bombings of 2005, was not just the work of home-grown jihadists in Britain, but also of Qaeda operatives. Some of the would-be bombers were trained in Qaeda's Pakistan camps much as their 9/11 predecessors had been trained in Afghanistan.

All of this was already going on when Mr. Bush said just before the election that "absolutely, we're winning" and that "Al Qaeda is on the run." What's changed in the few months since his lie is that even more American troops are tied down in Iraq, that even more lethal weapons are being used against them, that even more of the coalition of the unwilling are fleeing, and that even more Americans are tuning out both the administration and the war they voted down in November to savor a referendum that at least offers tangible results, "American Idol."

Yet Mr. Bush still denies reality. Ten days ago he told the American Enterprise Institute that "the Taliban have been driven from power" and proposed that America help stabilize the Pakistan border by setting up "Reconstruction Opportunity Zones" (remember that "Gulf Opportunity Zone" he promised after Katrina?) to "give residents the chance to export locally made products to the United States, duty-free." In other words, let's fight terrorism not by shifting America's focus from Iraq to the central front, but by shopping for Taliban souvenirs!

Five years after 9/11, the terrorists would seem to have us just where they want us — asleep — even as the system is blinking red once again.

No, He Wasn't A Good Manager (WP)

By Andrew Cockburn

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Defending Donald H. Rumsfeld in the face of a furious critique by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Vice President Cheney paid tribute last week to the former defense secretary's "superb job in managing the Pentagon under extraordinarily difficult circumstances."

Cheney's is not a unique view. Even many of Rumsfeld's detractors tend to assume that he was an effective manager, however disastrous his decisions on Iraq may have been. Throughout his Pentagon tenure, he carried the useful reputation, bolstered by his well-advertised spell as a college wrestler and his experience as a corporate CEO, of being a tough executive who brooked no nonsense from trembling subordinates to get the job done.

"Let them hate me so long as they fear me," boasted the emperor Caligula. Rumsfeld appeared to profit by the same leadership principle.

Anyone doubting this had only to listen to generals lamenting their master's disregard for professional military opinion, his rudeness and the terrible things that happened to anyone who stood in his way. But an examination of his record reveals that, in fact, Rumsfeld was a very poor manager. Despite his gruff theatrics, he shirked the task of leadership at the Defense Department, failing to restrain the services in their pursuit of parochial agendas. Though he spewed ideas and injunctions daily, he routinely neglected to follow them up. Pledged to the "transformation" of the cold war military establishment in 2001, he left it six years later almost entirely untransformed, save for the wreckage wrought by the Iraqi adventure. Even in concept, his program for "transformation" amounted to little more than notions articulated as bumper stickers, and poorly thought out ones at that.

Although he inherited dead wood in the senior ranks of the military, Rumsfeld dismissed not a single general, either for poor performance or for defying his edicts. No Iraq commander was summoned home as punishment for the unfolding disasters there.

Civilians were slightly more vulnerable. Army Secretary Thomas White was ultimately fired for his egregiously mutinous behavior over the cancellation of the Army's Crusader gun program.

The case of former Army chief of staff Eric K. Shinseki is instructive. It is widely believed that he sacrificed his career by speaking the truth in public about the inadequate number of troops being sent to invade and occupy Iraq. The true story gives little credit to Rumsfeld, but it also doesn't exactly accord with the legend.

Shinseki made his remarks about "several hundred thousand soldiers" being required to occupy postwar Iraq as an offhand response to a question at a Senate hearing in late February 2003, less than a month before the invasion. Eight months earlier, Rumsfeld and then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz had agreed to a suggestion by adviser Steve Herbits that they leak the name of the next Army chief of staff, though Shinseki still had more than a year to serve.

The two officials, irked by Shinseki's opposition to their plan to cut Army force sizes -- and, it seems, by his personality -- saw the leak as undercutting the Army chief's authority. They expected that he would resign promptly rather than submit to the humiliation of lame-duck status. But Shinseki failed to oblige. He stolidly served out his term although, apart from that moment in front of the Senate, he took no apparent advantage of his eminent official position to contest the ongoing invasion plan.

The notion that Rumsfeld at least exercised tight control of the sprawling Pentagon bureaucracy is encapsulated in his well-known use of "snowflakes," short memos of injunction, query or complaint that he dictated and distributed in manic quantities. True, junior officials may have quaked at the sight of a Rumsfeld emissary approaching with the dreaded missive in hand. As often as not the note reflected some querulous Rumsfeld whim, such as the July 2001 complaint, notorious among his personal staff, regarding the width of the lemon slices served with the secretary's iced tea. Over time, subordinates came to realize that their fearsome chief seldom followed up on these memos. Once written (and there were often more than 100 a day) they were often forgotten.

The missives usually set a date, sometimes within a day, for confirmation that the assigned task had been completed. "In the beginning," said one formerly high-ranking individual who routinely received scores of snowflakes, "I'd work late to get the job done and respond by the set time. Then I started letting it slide for a week, and no one seemed to notice." Eventually he stopped responding altogether, and still heard nothing.

This striking contrast between the superficial aspects of Rumsfeld's management style, all sound and fury, and the lack of follow-through to ensure constructive results, was summed up for me by another veteran of the secretary's management team: " 'Stir the pot,' Don would tell us, 'Stir the pot.' But no one was making soup."

Why did the senior military apparently quiver in their boots in fear of Rumsfeld's wrath for so long? When Rumsfeld derided as "absurd" the military's initial recommendations on troop levels for Iraq in November 2001, Gen. Richard B. Myers, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Marine Gen. Peter Pace, then vice chairman; and Marine Lt. Gen. Gregory Newbold, then of the Pentagon's Joint Staff, made no effort to rebut his assertions, though they were all aghast at Rumsfeld's pronouncement. "Shame on us," Newbold commented to me ruefully in describing the session. (In November 2002, unable to stomach the misguided rush to war in Iraq, Newbold quietly resigned, the sole senior officer to do so on principle.) This sort of behavior may well emanate from a careerist culture increasingly discernable in the officer corps, in which the gratification of superiors is the surest path to promotion, while obdurate adherence to principle can end chances of higher rank.

Rumsfeld was crafty enough to advertise his close supervision of the promotions process, interviewing all candidates for three- and four-star rank. That, combined with an aggressive personal manner, may have been enough to earn him the appearance of dominance. Every bully needs quiescent victims, and Rumsfeld found plenty at the Pentagon.

Andrew Cockburn is a Washington journalist. His book, "Rumsfeld: His Rise, Fall and Catastrophic Legacy," will be published this week by Scribner.

DOJ:

Dismissed U.S. Attorneys Praised In Evaluations (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24 — Internal Justice Department performance reports for six of the eight United States attorneys who have been dismissed in recent months rated them "well regarded," "capable" or "very competent," a review of the evaluations shows.

The performance reviews, known as Evaluations and Review Staff Reports, show that the ousted prosecutors were routinely praised for playing a leadership role with other law enforcement agencies in their jurisdictions.

The reviews, each of them 6 to 12 pages long, were carried out by Justice Department officials from 2003 to 2006. Each report was based on extensive interviews, conducted over several days with judges, other federal law enforcement agencies and staff members in each office.

It had been known that the reports were mostly favorable, but the reports themselves had not been made public.

Over all, the evaluations, which were obtained from officials authorized to have them, appear to raise new questions about the rationale for the dismissals provided by senior Justice Department officials. The officials have repeatedly cited poor job performance to explain their decisions to oust the eight prosecutors, all of them Republicans appointed by President Bush in his first term.

On Saturday, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who has led a Congressional investigation into the dismissals and has been briefed on the evaluations, said the reports showed that new legislation was needed to keep the Justice Department from politically motivated firings.

"As we feared, the comprehensive evaluations show these U.S. attorneys did not deserve to be fired," Mr. Schumer said. "To the contrary, they reveal they were effective, respected and set appropriate priorities."

In response, a senior Justice Department official said the reviews, which focused on management practices within each United States attorney's office, did not provide a broad or complete picture of the prosecutors' performance.

The official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the confidential nature of personnel information, said, "The reviews don't take into account whether the U.S. attorneys carried out departmental priorities."

Referring to the 94 United States attorney's districts, the official said, "You can't have 94 different sets of priorities," suggesting that the dismissed prosecutors had failed to follow priorities set by the Justice Department in Washington.

However, each case report included a statement that each of the ousted prosecutors had established strategic goals set by the Justice Department in high priority areas like counterterrorism, narcotics and gun violence.

Of the dismissed prosecutors who have spoken publicly, all have said they were given no reason for their dismissal. At first, most appeared willing to leave quietly with the understanding that they were presidential appointees who could be replaced at any time.

But their willingness to step down without complaint changed abruptly when Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said at a Senate hearing earlier this month that most of the dismissals were carried out to correct performance problems, according to associates of several prosecutors.

In recent days, several of the prosecutors have described conflicts with the Justice Department over death penalty cases and pending political corruption investigations as a possible factor in their firings. Justice Department officials have denied such issues were a factor.

One of the most glowing evaluations was given to H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas, who was asked to leave last summer. Mr. Cummins was replaced temporarily by J. Timothy Griffin, a military and civilian prosecutor who also had close ties to Karl Rove, the senior White House political adviser. Mr. Griffin has since withdrawn his name from consideration as Mr. Cummins's permanent successor.

A report dated Jan. 23-27, 2006, said, "United States Attorney Cummins was very competent and highly regarded by the federal, judiciary, law enforcement and civil client agencies." It said Mr. Cummins's office had a "well-managed" antiterrorism program and "very successful" counternarcotics efforts.

Another report, dated Feb. 7-11, 2005 evaluating the performance of Carol C. Lam, who was dismissed as the United States attorney in San Diego, concluded that she was "an effective manager and respected leader in the district."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Options Scandal Ensnaring HR Executives (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Associated Press

AP, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As lawsuits and federal prosecutions mount over suspect timing of stock option awards at American public companies, corporate human resources executives are increasingly being caught in the gears of cases.

With stock options widely used as perks to attract talent, personnel staff regularly were brought into executives' machinations on options awards - often signing the relevant paperwork, such as memos to employees or letters making job offers. That means their fingerprints are on documents that can enter into the paper trails that prosecutors are using to build options-dating cases.

"HR people have to be careful," said John Gamble, a lawyer at Fisher & Phillips, an Atlanta firm specializing in labor and employment law. "Sometimes they get assignments that they need to think twice about."

Among the handful of executives who have been charged with fraud by federal prosecutors in the wave of options investigations is Stephanie Jensen, the former vice president for human resources at Brocade Communications Systems Inc. Jensen and Gregory L. Reyes, who was Brocade's chief executive, pleaded not guilty in August.

The Justice Department prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission allege that Reyes and Jensen regularly backdated minutes of board of directors' meetings so it appeared that the stock-options committee granted options on dates when Brocade's share price was relatively low. The two executives also are accused of having letters of job offers backdated so employees would receive options that were dated at low points in the company's share price that predated their first day of work.

Stock options allow the recipients to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price - and pocket the difference.

Options can be made more lucrative by backdating their exercise price to a historically low point in the stock's value.

Backdating options can be legal if disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board or shareholders. But unauthorized compensation from options is deemed illegal and can bring fraud charges if documents are falsified in a backdating scheme or information is concealed from the board. If companies backdate options without properly accounting for the move, it can cause profits to be overstated and taxes to be underpaid.

E-mails uncovered in court records in the case of Mercury Interactive Corp., one of the first Silicon Valley companies to acknowledge stock options manipulation, show exchanges between a payroll manager named Susie Fregoso and company executives concerning dating of options. At one point in August 2000, according to an account of the e-mails in Tuesday's Wall Street Journal, Mercury's assistant controller told Fregoso the company will use the "magic backdating ink" of Sharlene Abrams, a former chief financial officer.

A telephone message left for a Susie Fregoso in California by The Associated Press was not returned. An attorney representing Abrams has declined to comment, citing a confidentiality order the judge issued in the California court case.

About 130 public companies are under investigation by the Justice Department and the SEC in the affair, which has been roiling corporate America. More than $5 billion in company earnings has been erased by restatements necessitated by options-dating problems, and more than 60 senior officers and directors - including 18 chief executives - have lost their jobs.

In other situations touching on human resources executives:

Stephen Landry, who was the human resources director at Sycamore Networks Inc., alleges in a lawsuit that he was forced out of his job in 2000 because he complained about the company's options award practices to superiors. An internal company memo filed in his lawsuit showed employees discussing manipulating option grant dates to enrich themselves and ranking individuals' chances of being caught by auditors.

An internal audit at Broadcom Corp. found that executives bearing substantial responsibility for improper options-granting practices included Nancy M. Tullos, a former vice president of human resources. Tullos' attorney has said his client relied on others at the company for guidance and did not select any of the favorable grant dates.

BEA Systems Inc. announced earlier this month that after a review of its options practices, it will record a charge against earnings of $340 million to $390 million, restructure its general counsel office and human resources department, and find a new senior vice president of human resources.

Eight Volumes Speak Strategy (DENP)

DOJ_NMG_0136535

By Andy Vuong And Greg Griffin

Denver Post, February 25, 2007

Herbert Stern, author and lead attorney for the ex-Qwest CEO, will stress key points and try to get jurors to argue his case too.

Herbert Stern, Joe Nacchio's lead attorney, will come out firing in the criminal insider-trading trial of the former Qwest chief executive.

Stern will lay out his case early in his opening statement. He will move through his points quickly but will make sure the jury hears his most important material more than once. He'll "hitchhike" - or extract helpful information from the prosecution's witnesses during cross-examination.

And during closing arguments, he'll try to teach his "friends" - jurors who believe Nacchio is not guilty - how to argue against others in the jury room.

Stern offers those tips, and many others, in an eight-volume set of books titled "Trying Cases to Win." The first was published in 1991, the last in 2004.

Stephen A. Saltzburg, co-author of three of the books, said Stern will follow the framework outlined in his books.

"He's going to do exactly what he writes that you should do," said Saltzburg, a professor at George Washington University School of Law in Washington, D.C., who has known Stern for more than 25 years.

Stern declined to comment.

Nacchio's trial is set to begin March 19 in U.S. District Court in Denver. If convicted, he faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine on each of the 42 counts of illegal insider trading.

Saltzburg said prosecutors would gain an advantage by reading Stern's books before the trial.

"It's always a good idea to read what your adversary has written," he said. "It's kind of like having tried a case against somebody who you've known before. You have an idea how they approach litigation."

Department of Justice spokesman Jeff Dorschner declined comment when asked whether any of the attorneys on the Nacchio case has read Stern's books.

Ten- and four-hour-long videotaped lectures covering key points in Stern's books are available at the Justice Department's education facility in Columbia, S.C., which trains federal, state and local prosecutors.

Stern served as a federal prosecutor and judge in New Jersey for many years before going into private practice.

Attorneys who have read Stern's books give them high praise.

"The author's comments on direct and cross-examination are cogent, well-organized and practical," University of Florida law professor and former attorney Bob Dekle writes in a review on Amazon.com. "The rookie advocate would do well to heed his teachings, and the old warhorse could also pick up a thing or two to help hone his techniques."

"It's obvious he knew what he was talking about," Dekle added in an interview.

San Francisco attorney Robert Spanner said the books were helpful to him but are "not wildly popular."

"I don't think I recall a single person who has referred to those books in any context," said Spanner, who has practiced law for 30 years.

Swaths of testimony

Many of the books feature large swaths of testimony from old cases.

Stern begins one of the volumes with a 12-page prologue examining the 1820 adultery trial of Queen Caroline of England. The point? Lawyers should be careful about what they say in court. A verbal misstep by one of her lawyers nearly cost her the crown.

Many of the other trials Stern quotes at length were his own during his time as a federal prosecutor in New Jersey, where he put away corrupt politicians and mobsters.

In the fifth volume, the entire transcript of a case is printed and dissected.

Spanner said the most important tip he got from reading the books is to not "make your case a response to the other side's case because that puts you on the defensive."

Among other points, Stern writes that the opening argument is more important than the closing.

"If you have a defense, open on it," he writes. "Open on it fully, powerfully, proclaiming it as the truth."

Thus, Stern's opening argument in the Nacchio trial may serve as a billboard for the rest of his defense, Dekle suggests. "Listen to the first paragraph or two of his opening statement and you can probably glean his case theory from that," he said.

If he follows his own advice, Stern won't call any of the prosecution's witnesses liars during the opening argument because he fears he won't be considered a gentleman if he does so. He'll save that for the end of the trial.

"Most of us grow up in court with the advice to never call anyone a liar during your opening because you will not be considered a lady or a gentleman; wait until summation," Stern writes.

Stress key evidence

When dealing with jurors, Stern writes that attorneys should often repeat the significance of key evidence.

"It is essential that your jury, or for that matter your judge, hear your important material more than once," he writes. "Every seasoned trial lawyer knows not only that once is not enough but that even twice may be insufficient."

He stresses the importance of moving quickly and not calling a case complicated.

"Legend has it there are two kinds of trial lawyers: the quick and the dead," he writes.

Stern said closing arguments are not the end of the trial - but rather an important preface to deliberation of the client's fate in the jury room.

"The purpose of the summation, particularly after a trial of length, is to teach your friends on the jury how to successfully argue with your enemies on that same jury - because the 'final argument' will not take place in the courtroom but rather in the adjoining jury room," he writes.

The Nacchio trial could last up to eight weeks.

Stern gives quirky names to a number of his tips, such as the Wimbledon and Charlie Chaplin effects. Wimbledon encourages a smooth dialogue between attorney and witness during direct examination. Charlie Chaplin discourages questioning a witness from a prepared script.

"But remember that we all think, talk and write about the trial of cases much better than we could ever try them," Stern writes.

Staff writer Andy Vuong can be reached at 303-954-1209 or avuong@denverpost.com.

"Cases" excerpt

"When lawyers question from a prepared script of questions, they produce what I call the Charlie Chaplin Effect. ... In the earliest Charlie Chaplin silent films, you see a herky-jerky Chaplin who bounds across the screen in choppy steps. ... The viewer of the courtroom scene is similarly disconcerted by questioning from a script."

- from "Trying Cases to Win"

A lawyer's words to that effect

Some additional excerpts from Herbert Stern's eight-volume set of books titled "Trying Cases to Win."

The Wimbledon Effect

During direct examination, the goal is " ... to achieve the Wimbledon Effect as you argue your case right through your witness. By Wimbledon Effect I mean that the jurors' heads should be swinging back and forth between the attorney and his witness, as though the two figures were at each end of the well of the court - and the jurors were positioned between them much like spectators and, hopefully, fans in the viewer benches. ... If a lawyer on direct is standing at the end of a jury box ... with the jurors' heads swinging between him and his witness ... then this lawyer is making hay with that jury."

The Buster Keaton Effect

"Training witnesses to give long narrative answers, rather than short responsive ones to specific questions, leads to what I like to think of as The Buster Keaton Effect. In Keaton's films we see him take every step. But he takes them so quickly that we cannot comprehend them."

On lawyer and jury

"An advocate does best when he is perceived to be correct. Do not strive to be witty, or to be charming, or to be loving or even to be loved. Just be thought to be right! If you achieve that, the rest will invariably take care of itself."

On use of literary and Biblical quotations

"Analogies and quotations are always dangerous to those who invoke them, ... for nearly every such business can be turned around to bite one in the back."

On unpredictability of trial

"Once the trial is underway all our pretrial plans, predictions and stratagems are reshaped by an unfolding reality which is never even approximately predictable. ... Nothing ever happens exactly as planned. The courtroom contest is as much a place of constant readjustments as any other of life's playing fields."

Matador metaphor

"In every bullfight the matador enjoys one great advantage over the bull. It lies not in the matador's speed or agility, for the bull is faster. ... It lies in a piece of wood that stands close to the side wall of the bull ring. ... Whenever the matador finds himself in trouble, he runs as fast as he can behind this wooden barrier until the bull passes by. ... So, too, it is in argument. ... Whenever the advocate falls under attack ... he runs behind his strongest arguments ... and lets the bull go by."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ban On Prison Religious Program Challenged (WP)

By Peter Slevin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

U.S. Judge Ruled Evangelical Rehabilitation Effort in Iowa Is Unconstitutional

CHICAGO -- Interested inmates at Newton Correctional Facility in Iowa receive teaching material that declares: "Criminal behavior is a manifestation of an alienation between the self and God. Acceptance of God and Biblical principles results in cure through the power of the Holy Spirit. Transformation happens through an instantaneous miracle; it then builds the prisoner up with familiarity of the Bible."

Rooted in evangelical Christianity and supported by more than $1.5 million in public funds, the method of the rehabilitation program is clear enough. A key question is its constitutionality. A trio of appellate judges, including former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, is reviewing a lower court's decision that the program violates the separation of church and state.

People on both sides of the dispute say the outcome could influence the future of President Bush's faith-based initiative, which links government and religious institutions in efforts to solve social problems.

"This puts into jeopardy not just faith-based nonprofits in a prison setting," said Mark Earley, president of Virginia-based Prison Fellowship Ministries, whose affiliate, the InnerChange Freedom Initiative, runs the Iowa program. "I think you'd see a precipitous drop in the number of faith-based organizations willing to provide services to governments."

Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for the Separation of Church and State, which sued to stop the program, said a courthouse defeat for InnerChange "could well be the death knell for these kinds of programs, whether they're funded by state or federal money."

"Americans," Lynn said, "can't be required to submit to any religious indoctrination to get benefits, whether those people are behind bars or on the outside."

U.S. District Judge Robert W. Pratt sided with Americans United, ruling last year that the Iowa program is "pervasively sectarian." He heard testimony from prisoners of other faiths who felt unwelcome in a program that gives advantages to inmates who accept the intensive religious teachings.

Inmates deemed to be making sufficient spiritual progress live in better conditions than the general population, inhabiting cells with wooden doors and using toilets that afford privacy, a jailhouse rarity. They have more access to relatives and outside visitors and can fulfill prison requirements more quickly.

While in the program, prisoners are expected to pray daily, attend worship services and religious gatherings, and participate in weekly revival meetings. Inmates of other religions are asked "to compromise, if not completely abandon, their faiths in order to participate," Pratt ruled, citing "a constant tension" with Roman Catholic inmates.

Pratt ordered InnerChange to close its operations and repay $1.5 million to the Iowa government and prisoners whose telephone surcharges helped fund the program. He said he was careful not to pass judgment on the beliefs of the staff or the effectiveness of the religious approach, although he said he had received no credible data on recidivism rates.

His central concern, Pratt wrote, was whether the program violates the Constitutional prohibition on government showing a preference for any religious denomination.

Iowa "hopes to cure recidivism through state-sponsored prayer and devotion," wrote Pratt, 59, a Clinton appointee. "While such spiritual and emotional 'rewiring' may be possible in the life of an individual and lower the risk of committing other crimes, it cannot be permissible to force taxpayers to fund such an enterprise under the Establishment Clause."

Prison Fellowship's attorneys and witnesses told the judge that the Iowa program, located at the prison about 35 miles from Des Moines, was strictly voluntary and open to inmates of all faiths. They noted that much of the money came from private sources and reported that state money paid only for secular aspects of the program.

Pratt ruled, however, that the overtly religious atmosphere is not "a secondary effect of the program -- it is the program." He noted that the cost of all telephone charges were billed to the state under "nonsectarian items," along with 82 percent of the local director's salary. So, too, were "Jesus is Lord" key chains.

Prison Fellowship, founded in 1976 by Watergate figure Charles Colson, runs six similar programs in Texas, Kansas, Minnesota and Arkansas, and expects to open one soon in Missouri. All are funded privately.

When Americans United filed suit, the programs in Kansas and Minnesota also took government money, but the prison group shifted them to private backing, Earley said, "just to reduce the litigation profile until things could be resolved."

Pratt's ruling is on hold pending appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0136538

Among those supporting InnerChange is former attorney general John D. Ashcroft, who wrote shortly before this month's arguments before the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis that high recidivism rates prove that programs such as InnerChange, sometimes called IFI, are needed.

"Neither Judge Pratt nor Americans United offers a better way to stop the revolving door of prisons. They simply want to shut IFI down," Ashcroft wrote in the St. Louis Post Dispatch.

"Judge Pratt's opinion ties the hands of corrections officials who are trying to make our communities safer," Ashcroft wrote.

Anthony R. Picarello Jr., general counsel of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, argued the case on behalf of Prison Fellowship. He said that an affirmative ruling by the appellate panel or the Supreme Court -- particularly if the money must be repaid -- would deter faith-based organizations.

"We think Prison Fellowship did it right," Picarello said. "If at the end of the day the court agrees with them and not us, the way to resolve it is to make some clear rules about how to do it right, rather than banish and punish us."

Evidence In Inmate's Hand, Justice In His Sights (NYT)

By Ellen Barry

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

On a September afternoon in 2005, with a prison guard standing beside the operating table and another outside the door, a surgeon cut into the left hand of inmate No. 99A2254.

The doctor was trying to find fragments of a bullet among the tiny veins and ligaments of Napoleon Cardenas's middle finger. Mr. Cardenas had been warned that removing them could cause nerve damage. Another surgeon had balked at performing the operation, saying it could violate the Hippocratic oath.

But Mr. Cardenas did not care. He was convinced that under the pale scars lay evidence that would topple two convictions in a 1994 jewel heist: his and his younger brother's. Between them, they had already served 14 years in prison for the crime. Cut off my fingers if you need to, he said.

Mr. Cardenas's lawyers waited anxiously outside as the surgeon, using forceps, removed two pieces of metal. The results would not, in themselves, convince the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, that the brothers were innocent. But Mr. Brown's investigator was impressed by Mr. Cardenas's eagerness to have the operation. That and a growing pile of new evidence were enough to prompt the district attorney's office to start its own yearlong investigation.

On Jan. 18, Mr. Brown asked a judge to vacate the convictions of Napoleon Cardenas and his brother Carlos in the jewel heist. In a statement, Mr. Brown said his prosecutors were "always prepared to take a hard look at a case — even post-conviction — to make certain that justice has been done."

Steven Silberblatt, one of half a dozen Legal Aid Society lawyers who worked to overturn the Cardenas brothers' convictions, put it this way: "Sometimes circumstances provide their own lie-detector test. When someone is willing to lose the use of his hand, you get the feeling they're probably telling the truth."

The case began on the evening of July 21, 1994. Police officers all over Queens were looking for four Latino men suspected of snatching three cases of Tahitian black pearls from vendors returning to their hotel in Elmhurst from a gem show in Manhattan. The vendors estimated the jewels' value at $1.5 million.

As they escaped, the thieves rushed at a man in his driveway, demanding his car. The man was an off-duty police officer, and he managed to shoot his service weapon, a 9-millimeter Glock, before he was knocked unconscious. He told detectives later that he thought he had hit a robber who was grabbing at the barrel of the gun.

Within hours, police detectives converged on the emergency room at St. John's Queens Hospital, where one of the jewelry vendors and the off-duty police officer were being treated. Napoleon Cardenas, then 24, was there, too, with his brother Carlos, 23. It was hard to miss Napoleon; he was screaming. He was being treated for a gunshot wound.

When he was questioned about his injury that night, Mr. Cardenas answered haltingly, arousing a detective's suspicion. He had shot himself, he said, in his girlfriend's living room, while handling a .380-caliber semiautomatic pistol that he had been showing to two visitors. He had no license for the gun.

The detective put Mr. Cardenas in a lineup, but when none of the robbery victims made a positive identification, she released him. A friend cleaned up the blood in his girlfriend's apartment. The police never searched the site.

It took a few days for Mr. Cardenas to realize he might still be a suspect. He was due to serve a four-month sentence for credit-card fraud. Days before it was to begin, Mr. Cardenas fled to the Dominican Republic — a move that would damage his and his brother's defense.

"I got scared," he said recently. He had a seriously injured hand, he said, adding: "I was so skinny. I was watching these movies about what happens to people" in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0136539

In his absence, the case against him took on a new life. One of the vendors called a detective days after the crime, saying he could now identify Mr. Cardenas as one of the robbers. The police visited Carlos Cardenas to ask about his brother, and began to suspect that Carlos had been involved. When the jewelry vendors returned to New York from California a year later, the police put Carlos in a lineup. One of the vendors chose someone else. Another chose Carlos.

At Carlos's trial, one of the jewelry salesmen identified him as one of the robbers. There was no physical evidence linking Carlos to the crime. But the prosecutor noted dryly that Napoleon's injury had occurred "coincidentally, I guess — just a major coincidence — with the same people, about the same time, about approximately the same area."

In May 1996, Carlos Cardenas was found guilty of first-degree robbery, second-degree robbery and grand larceny. He was sentenced to 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison.

A year later, Napoleon Cardenas surrendered in Colombia to federal marshals and returned to the United States to serve his sentence for credit-card fraud. When he was released, he faced trial in the jewel theft. In court, the off-duty police officer and one of the jewelry salesmen identified Mr. Cardenas. As in his brother's case, no physical evidence linked him to the crime, but the prosecutor noted the gunshot wound.

"You don't have a fingerprint to say 'I was there,' but everything else tells you he was there, including the bullet that went through his hand," the prosecutor told jurors. He compared the wound to dye packets rigged to explode on bank robbers.

Although Mr. Cardenas insisted that he could prove his innocence with ballistics evidence and alibi witnesses, his lawyer, Michael C. Harrison, disagreed, and focused on discrediting the government's witnesses. In 1999, Napoleon Cardenas was convicted of first-degree robbery and second-degree assault, and sentenced to 15 to 30 years.

In 2002, with his legal remedies nearly exhausted, Mr. Cardenas wrote a stinging letter of introduction to Svetlana Kornfeind, a lawyer newly assigned to his case by the Legal Aid Society: he intended, he wrote, "to prove my claim in the courts as soon as I am given the opportunity. So, I want to ask you to be honest to yourself not to me but to yourself by telling me if you have the time or not to help me."

Ms. Kornfeind was taken aback. But she scheduled a meeting with him. "We had to investigate the possibility that he was right," she said.

Mr. Cardenas seemed to specialize in driving lawyers crazy. He wrote to his trial lawyer three times a week offering strategic advice. He placed calls from prison to the police in the 110th Precinct asking for documents; if they asked, he said he was a detective. He deliberately injured himself in prison to have X-rays taken of his hand, so he could be sure that the fragments of metal were still there, he said.

"I knew I had evidence in my hand," he said. "People would laugh at me. I'd sit there and proclaim I was a political prisoner."

Once in a while, he got a break. An old friend, Eddie Padilla, visited him as he was awaiting trial on the robbery charges. They were talking about friends from the neighborhood, Mr. Cardenas recalled, when Mr. Padilla brightened. Did Napoleon know he still had part of that bullet?

Mr. Padilla had helped clean up blood in the apartment where Mr. Cardenas, still in shock, had pulled the bullet jacket out of his wound. Mr. Padilla still had the jacket. At parties, he would take it out to show friends.

Ms. Kornfeind began to construct an argument to overturn the conviction, citing the newly discovered evidence and contending that Mr. Harrison, the trial attorney, had failed to investigate Mr. Cardenas's alibi. Mr. Harrison did not respond to a request for comment for this article.

Ms. Kornfeind had the bullet jacket analyzed, and contended that the results bolstered Mr. Cardenas's story: while the Police Department then issued full-metal, copper-jacketed ammunition, this jacket was aluminum, which peeled back on contact. Full-metal ammunition would have passed through the hand intact. The tissue that dotted the jacket was his, a DNA test showed.

The next challenge was to see whether the fragments in Mr. Cardenas's hand matched the bullet jacket.

Using a tourniquet, doctors at Bellevue Hospital Center cut off the flow of blood to the hand; a "bloodless field" allows surgeons to more easily locate foreign bodies, nerves and tiny veins, said Dr. David W. Friedman, who supervised the operation. It turned out to be an easy task, since the shards were lodged above the bone, like splinters. They were removed through a tiny incision, wrapped in cotton and put in an evidence tube. The wound required only two stitches.

Ms. Kornfeind remembers "just sailing" across town to a crime laboratory, where the fragments would be analyzed. Traces of aluminum would suggest strongly that Mr. Cardenas had been shot with the hollow-point bullet; copper would back up prosecutors' claim that he had been shot by a police service weapon.

In the end, the fragments were neither. They were shards of lead. Mr. Cardenas's lawyers contended that they still supported his innocence, since hollow-point bullets, unlike full-metal bullets, break apart on contact, said Thomas A. Kubic, an instructor at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice, who consulted on the case for the Legal Aid Society.

From the point of view of the district attorney, the ballistics evidence was inconclusive. At a hearing in 2005, a prosecutor said that the gunshot wound had not been at the center of the case against Mr. Cardenas, who was implicated by four witness identifications, "a series of lies he told hospital personnel on the night of the crime as to how he obtained the wound, and his flight from the country immediately after the crime." But Mr. Cardenas's eagerness to undergo surgery had made an impression.

The case wore on for months, while the district attorney's investigator tracked down informants. One of them convinced the investigator that others were responsible for the jewel theft. In January of this year, both brothers passed polygraph tests. That was the final hurdle.

At the hearing where the brothers were exonerated, their father, Napoleon Cardenas Sr., a 74-year-old carpenter originally from Colombia, thanked Ms. Kornfeind and Denise Fabiano, who represented Carlos.

"These are two beautiful persons," he said in an interview.

Steven Banks, attorney in chief for the Legal Aid Society, said the case showed how errors made early in an investigation get "compounded time and time again."

"It never ceases to amaze me how random it is that people get caught up in the judicial system and the related bureaucracy and can be swallowed up," Mr. Banks said.

On the day of the hearing, Ms. Kornfeind had been expecting "an explosion of something at the end," or at least the sight of her client with his handcuffs off, running into his mother's arms. But Napoleon Cardenas, now 36, would not be released for two days, while immigration officials cleared a deportation order. His brother Carlos, 35, like Napoleon a legal permanent resident, remains threatened with deportation, even though his conviction has been overturned.

Ms. Kornfeind woke up early the day after the hearing, planning to work on Napoleon Cardenas's immigration case. She pulled up the Web site for the Eastern Correctional Facility in Ulster County, and typed the familiar identification number, 99A2254. A message flashed: No such person exists.

She typed in his name, and got the same message: No such person exists.

That's when she realized what had happened. Her client was free.

Justice Dept. Starts Religious-freedom Plan (CLPD)

By Adelle Banks, Religion News Service

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, February 25, 2007

Washington- The Department of Justice has launched a "First Freedom Project" to draw more attention to protecting the religious liberties of Americans.

"Why should it be permissible for an employee standing around the water cooler to declare that 'Tiger Woods is God,' but a firing offense for him to say, 'Jesus is Lord,'?" Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday at a meeting of the executive committee of the Southern Baptist Convention in Nashville, Tenn.

"These are the kinds of contradictions we are trying to address."

The initiative includes a new Web site (www.firstfreedom.gov), an education program and a task force that will review religious freedom policies and cases.

Leaders of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, Family Research Council and Southern Baptist Ethics & Religious Liberty Commission applauded the initiative.

The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said it was a hypocritical action by an administration that he said has tried to merge church and state.

The Rev. Bob Edgar, general secretary of the National Council of Churches, welcomed the renewed focus on religious freedom but questioned why it was announced at a gathering of a single denomination. He invited Gonzales to present the project to the March meeting of the council's Committee on Religious Liberty, and suggested it also should be presented to Muslim groups.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to respond specifically to Edgar's criticism, but said, "I believe he [Gonzales] intends to talk about this to other groups."

Sorority Evictions Raise Issue Of Looks And Bias (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

GREENCASTLE, Ind. — When a psychology professor at DePauw University here surveyed students, they described one sorority as a group of "daddy's little princesses" and another as "offbeat hippies." The sisters of Delta Zeta were seen as "socially awkward."

Worried that a negative stereotype of the sorority was contributing to a decline in membership that had left its Greek-columned house here half empty, Delta Zeta's national officers interviewed 35 DePauw members in November, quizzing them about their dedication to recruitment. They judged 23 of the women insufficiently committed and later told them to vacate the sorority house.

The 23 members included every woman who was overweight. They also included the only black, Korean and Vietnamese members. The dozen students allowed to stay were slender and popular with fraternity men — conventionally pretty women the sorority hoped could attract new recruits. Six of the 12 were so infuriated they quit.

"Virtually everyone who didn't fit a certain sorority member archetype was told to leave," said Kate Holloway, a senior who withdrew from the chapter during its reorganization.

"I sensed the disrespect with which this was to be carried out and got fed up," Ms. Holloway added. "I didn't have room in my life for these women to come in and tell my sisters of three years that they weren't needed."

Ms. Holloway is not the only angry one. The reorganization has left a messy aftermath of recrimination and tears on this rural campus of 2,400 students, 50 miles southwest of Indianapolis.

The mass eviction battered the self-esteem of many of the former sorority members, and some withdrew from classes in depression. There have been student protests, outraged letters from alumni and parents, and a faculty petition calling the sorority's action unethical.

DePauw's president, Robert G. Bottoms, issued a two-page letter of reprimand to the sorority. In an interview in his office, Dr. Bottoms said he had been stunned by the sorority's insensitivity.

"I had no hint they were going to disrupt the chapter with a membership reduction of this proportion in the middle of the year," he said. "It's been very upsetting."

The president of Delta Zeta, which has its headquarters in Oxford, Ohio, and its other national officers declined to be interviewed. Responding by e-mail to questions, Cynthia Winslow Menges, the executive director, said the sorority had not evicted the 23 women, even though the national officers sent those women form letters that said: "The membership review team has recommended you for alumna status. Chapter members receiving alumnae status should plan to relocate from the chapter house no later than Jan. 29, 2007."

Ms. Menges asserted that the women themselves had, in effect, made their own decisions to leave by demonstrating a lack of commitment to meet recruitment goals. The sorority paid each woman who left $300 to cover the difference between sorority and campus housing.

The sorority "is saddened that the isolated incident at DePauw has been mischaracterized," Ms. Menges wrote. Asked for clarification, the sorority's public relations representative e-mailed a statement saying its actions were aimed at the "enrichment of student life at DePauw."

This is not the first time that the DePauw chapter of Delta Zeta has stirred controversy. In 1982, it attracted national attention when a black student was not allowed to join, provoking accusations of racial discrimination.

Earlier this month, an Alabama lawyer and several other DePauw alumni who graduated in 1970 described in a letter to The DePauw, the student newspaper, how Delta Zeta's national leadership had tried unsuccessfully to block a young woman with a black father and a white mother from joining its DePauw chapter in 1967.

Despite those incidents, the chapter appears to have been home to a diverse community over the years, partly because it has attracted brainy women, including many science and math majors, as well as talented disabled women, without focusing as exclusively as some sororities on potential recruits' sex appeal, former sorority members said.

"I had a sister I could go to a bar with if I had boy problems," said Erin Swisshelm, a junior biochemistry major who withdrew from the sorority in October. "I had a sister I could talk about religion with. I had a sister I could be nerdy about science with. That's why I liked Delta Zeta, because I had all these amazing women around me."

But over the years DePauw students had attached a negative stereotype to the chapter, as evidenced by the survey that Pam Propsom, a psychology professor, conducts each year in her class. That image had hurt recruitment, and the national officers had repeatedly warned the chapter that unless its membership increased, the chapter could close.

At the start of the fall term the national office was especially determined to raise recruitment because 2009 is the 100th anniversary of the DePauw chapter's founding. In September, Ms. Menges and Kathi Heatherly, a national vice president of the sorority, visited the chapter to announce a reorganization plan they said would include an interview with each woman about her commitment. The women were urged to look their best for the interviews.

The tone left four women so unsettled that they withdrew from the chapter almost immediately.

Robin Lamkin, a junior who is an editor at The DePauw and was one of the 23 women evicted, said many of her sisters bought new outfits and modeled them for each other before the interviews. Many women declared their willingness to recruit diligently, Ms. Lamkin said.

A few days after the interviews, national representatives took over the house to hold a recruiting event. They asked most members to stay upstairs in their rooms. To welcome freshmen downstairs, they assembled a team that included several of the women eventually asked to stay in the sorority, along with some slender women invited from the sorority's chapter at Indiana University, Ms. Holloway said.

"They had these unassuming freshman girls downstairs with these plastic women from Indiana University, and 25 of my sisters hiding upstairs," she said. "It was so fake, so completely dehumanized. I said, 'This calls for a little joke.' "

Ms. Holloway put on a wig and some John Lennon rose-colored glasses, burst through the front door and skipped around singing, "Ooooh! Delta Zeta!" and other chants.

The face of one of the national representatives, she recalled, "was like I'd run over her puppy with my car."

The national representatives announced their decisions in the form letters, delivered on Dec. 2, which said that Delta Zeta intended to increase membership to 95 by the 2009 anniversary, and that it would recruit using a "core group of women."

Elizabeth Haneline, a senior computer science major who was among those evicted, returned to the house that afternoon and found some women in tears. Even the chapter's president had been kicked out, Ms. Haneline said, while "other women who had done almost nothing for the chapter were asked to stay."

Six of the 12 women who were asked to stay left the sorority, including Joanna Kieschnick, a sophomore majoring in English literature. "They said, 'You're not good enough' to so many people who have put their heart and soul into this chapter that I can't stay," she said.

In the months since, Cynthia Babington, DePauw's dean of students, has fielded angry calls from parents, she said. Robert Hershberger, chairman of the modern languages department, circulated the faculty petition; 55 professors signed it.

"We were especially troubled that the women they expelled were less about image and more about academic achievement and social service," Dr. Hershberger said.

During rush activities this month, 11 first-year students accepted invitations to join Delta Zeta, but only three have sought membership.

On Feb. 2, Rachel Pappas, a junior who is the chapter's former secretary, printed 200 posters calling on students to gather that afternoon at the student union. About 50 students showed up and heard Ms. Pappas say the sorority's national leaders had misrepresented the truth when they asserted they had evicted women for lack of commitment.

"The injustice of the lies," she said, "is contemptible."

Jump In Minority Bids To Join FDNY (NYDN)

By Jonathan Lemire, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, February 25, 2007

More than 4,500 more minority applicants took the FDNY written entrance exam this year than in 2002, giving fire officials hope that a multimillion-dollar campaign to start diversifying the department will end in success.

Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta believes the jump from 3,730 to 8,297 minority candidates proves the department is making progress.

"All the hard work we put into this campaign has paid off," said Scoppetta. "We hope once we begin hiring from this list next year, we'll have the most diverse group of candidates joining the world's greatest fire department."

But critics warned the promising numbers would be rendered meaningless if the minority applicants weren't hired.

The FDNY recruits new members only once every four years and the department's hiring process has been closely scrutinized by Justice Department investigators. Currently, the department is 91% white.

The written test was offered at several sites across the five boroughs on Jan. 20 and 21,549 applicants sat down to take the several-hour exam, officials told the Daily News.

Of those candidates, 38.5% identified themselves as being black, Hispanic, Asian or Native American, officials said. This marks a significant increase from 2002, when 21.5% of the 17,348 applicants deemed themselves persons of color.

Though the number of white candidates dropped slightly from 13,618 in 2002 to 13,252 in January, applications from minority groups rose across the board, officials said.

Most strikingly, the number of Hispanics jumped from 2,088 to 4,026 while the number of blacks rose from 1,357 to 3,776, the statistics show. The number of women who took the test also increased, rising to 814 from 549.

DOJ_NMG_0136543

FDNY officials gave credit to their outreach programs in communities of color to explain the jump in minority test-takers: Five years ago, firefighters held fewer than 300 events, a far cry from the more than 2,300 that recruiters staffed in 2006.

But the head of the Vulcan Society, the fraternal organization of black firefighters, attributed the rise in minority applicants to the FDNY altering its "exclusionary" hiring practices.

"Finally, they realize they need to reach out to all communities," John Coombs said. "We don't want to roll out the red carpet yet, for this is only one step toward the goal. What matters is who actually gets on the job."

The results of the written test have not yet been released, according to a spokesman for the Department of Citywide Administrative Services, which administers the exam. The physical test - which will be scored pass/fail for the first time - will start being offered in the coming months.jlemire@nydailynews.com

Democrats In Congress May Threaten California Redistricting (LAT)

By Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

SACRAMENTO — The new dynamic in Washington, with Californian Nancy Pelosi as House speaker, threatens to thwart an effort by state political leaders to overhaul the way voting districts are drawn.

Fresh from their victories in the November election, Democrats in Congress don't want to risk their fragile majority. Many Republicans don't want their relatively safe seats threatened either.

Their opposition promises to crimp an effort by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, state Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) and others to change how California draws political boundaries every 10 years to accommodate population shifts.

Nuñez said he thinks he will have to exempt Congress from legislation he is crafting to have California's political boundaries drawn by a nonpartisan panel, rather than by politically driven state lawmakers.

Then only state legislative districts would be drawn independently.

Otherwise, Nuñez said, opposition from the powerful Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and others would be enough to derail his efforts.

"The best way to secure its passage is to not have a $10-million campaign against it," Nuñez said. "And Congress will wage a $10-million campaign against it."

California could threaten the slim Democratic majority by giving up the ability to draw districts advantageous to Democrats, said Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose), chairwoman of California's Democratic delegation.

"We're finally about to deal with the Iraq war issue, we're finally taking on global climate change, energy independence — things we've been stonewalled on for a dozen years — and there's great interest that these efforts not be short-circuited," Lofgren said.

Redistricting is crucial to politicians. It determines the ratio of Democrats and Republicans in each district and thus how hard politicians will have to work for reelection.

Sometimes the process shapes their futures: The district in which someone hopes to run can be drawn to exclude his or her home. And the mapmaking can have far-reaching effects on the balance of power in state legislatures and Congress.

Nuñez said Pelosi didn't tell him directly that she would fight a redistricting initiative if it included Congress. He said he "heard it from many other people" that she and other members of Congress would campaign to kill it.

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill said the speaker prefers a national overhaul of the redistricting process and would need more details than Nuñez has offered before she could consider his plan.

Lofgren is writing legislation that would require every state legislature to yield redistricting authority to an independent group of citizens, as several states including Arizona and Idaho already do. Lofgren carried similar, unsuccessful legislation last year that was backed by Pelosi.

Nuñez said he understood Pelosi and Lofgren's position: "They've got to have a national view on this."

But in appeasing those powerful potential opponents, Nuñez may create another much closer to home.

Schwarzenegger spokesman Aaron McLear said the governor believes that districts for Congress, not just the Legislature, should be drafted by people who are not lawmakers.

"That's what his goal is right now," McLear said. "Comprehensive redistricting reform."

McLear said it was unclear whether the governor would support a redistricting measure that did not include Congress.

Schwarzenegger's backing is critical. He has said he would endorse a relaxation of term limits — a pet project of the speaker's that could stretch his stay in office — only if the Legislature comes up with a redistricting overhaul.

DOJ_NMG_0136544

The governor ran into resistance from Washington in 2005, when his special election agenda included a ballot initiative that would have used retired judges to draw districts. Many of Schwarzenegger's fellow Republicans in Congress urged him to abandon the measure because it could have jeopardized their party's control of Congress.

Some Democrats, including Pelosi and Rep. Howard Berman Valley Village, also opposed the measure.

They joined with a Republican, Rep. John Doolittle of Roseville, to urge the Federal Elections Commission to allow them to raise unlimited amounts of money to fight the proposal.

Voters rejected the initiative, as they have rejected four other redistricting proposals since 1982. Any overhaul the Legislature passed this year would also be subject to voter approval.

But the governor has not given up. In December, he announced support for a proposed constitutional amendment that would use an 11-member panel of politically diverse citizens to draw boundaries.

At the time, Schwarzenegger noted that in the last three general elections, only four of 459 congressional and legislative seats up for grabs in California changed party hands.

That is partly because the last time the Legislature redrew boundaries, in 2001, Republicans and Democrats agreed to maintain the existing ratio of power.

"To me that is evidence of a system that has become unresponsive and is stuck in the status quo," Schwarzenegger said last year. "We must bring competition back into the political process."

Meanwhile in Washington, not all members of the California delegation seek a congressional exemption from a redistricting change.

Rep. Kevin McCarthy, a Bakersfield Republican who pushed unsuccessfully for nonpartisan redistricting while he was in the Legislature, said voters would reject any redistricting measure that excluded Congress.

"It would be so obvious that it's self-serving," he said.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Los Angeles) said it's time to take the politics out of what has traditionally been a partisan exercise.

"It's gotten so political," he said. "It's become an effort to deprive the voters of the chance to express their view."

Will voters care one way or the other?

"Redistricting is something that matters a great deal to the people who hold office," said Democratic political consultant Darry Sragow, "but it's arcane. It's very much an insider issue."

"If Congress is exempt," he said, "I'm not sure it matters much to voters."

ANTITRUST:

In Big Buyout, Utility To Limit New Coal Plants (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

Under a proposed $45 billion buyout by a team of private equity firms, the TXU Corporation, a Texas utility that has long been the bane of environmental groups, will abandon plans to build 8 of 11 coal plants and commit to a broad menu of environmental measures, according to people involved in the negotiations.

The roster of commitments came through an unusual process in which the equity firms asked two prominent environmental groups what measures could be taken to win their support. The result is an about-face from the company's earlier approach to climate-change issues, and includes a goal of returning the carbon-dioxide emissions by TXU to 1990 levels by 2020.

Environmental groups said yesterday that they had never known of a financial deal with such an ambitious built-in environmental component.

Two private equity firms, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group, have proposed to buy TXU in what would become the largest leveraged buyout ever.

The transaction will be put to the TXU board for a vote on Sunday.

People involved in the negotiations said that Goldman Sachs, an adviser and lender to the buyers, helped broker peace with environmental groups and sought their support for the transaction. Goldman Sachs has been one of the most aggressive firms on Wall Street about taking action on climate change; the company sends its bankers home at night in hybrid limousines.

For the investor groups, the effort was as much about making a sound business decision to ensure the deal's completion as it was about any environmental concerns.

By bringing the environmental groups into the process, the buyers may have helped avert years of costly litigation over emissions from their plants. But they may also have raised new questions about how they will meet the energy needs that TXU intended to address by building all 11 plants; the company is said to be examining ways to expand in cleaner forms of energy. None of the parties interviewed was able to provide details.

Environmentalists said they hoped that the TXU deal would represent a turning point in the attitude of energy businesses as they adjust to what many anticipate will be a new regulatory and public-relations landscape in an era of climate change.

"We have history's largest purchase of a power company, with the new owners wanting to move the company in a direction that is consistent with a world that takes global warming seriously," said David Hawkins of the Natural Resources Defense Council, one of the two environmental groups invited to the negotiations. That group, and the other participant, Environmental Defense, which often use the courts to confront businesses, are persistent critics of TXU.

The commitments come at a time of uncertainty for utilities that are considering building coal-fired plants. They do not know if such plants will be grandfathered by Congress and excluded from future restrictions on carbon-dioxide emissions, or whether anything they build now will have to operate in a starkly different regulatory environment.

TXU will discard plans to build eight of 11 proposed new coal plants, which would have been major new sources of emissions. Those plants — which would have added more than 9,000 megawatts of new capacity, the equivalent of 3.5 percent of the nation's current coal-fired power — had been part of a planned $10 billion expansion of coal-fired electricity.

TXU, which is based in Dallas, also intends to expand the renewable energy portion of its portfolio and reduce or offset its emissions significantly, said people who were familiar with the plans.

Less than a week ago, according to Fred Krupp, the president of Environmental Defense, the two environmental groups were approached by representatives of the private-equity buyers. He said he received a call from William K. Reilly, the former Environmental Protection Agency administrator, who is advising the Texas Pacific Group.

Mr. Hawkins, who runs the climate-change program for the Natural Resources Defense Council, said that the investment team was essentially asking "what would it take" to gain environmentalists' support.

James D. Marston, who runs the Texas energy program for Environmental Defense, yesterday called TXU's plans "a turning point in the fight against global warming."

Mr. Marston had led an intense advertising campaign painting TXU as an environmental outlaw pursuing a strategy that would hurt the climate and perhaps its own bottom line, if federal policy changed and companies were charged for the carbon dioxide they emitted.

But people familiar with the investors' thinking took pains to say that the investors brought the measures to the environmental groups, and were not acting out of any fear of the groups' potential to wage a legal and public-relations campaign against them.

Young Lawyers Sue, And Little Changes (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

COMPETITORS say that a leading company ripped down their posters and used deceptive marketing tactics; former customers say that the same company paid business rivals to close their doors. And one competitor says he fears that he was the victim of outright theft.

This is how the business of training aspiring lawyers to pass the bar exam is conducted, according to documents and testimony that have surfaced as a result of a federal lawsuit in Los Angeles. It is a business dominated by a single company that expanded, depending on whom you believe, either by squashing its competitors or by simply offering a superior product.

That company is BAR/BRI. And students who took its courses filed a class-action lawsuit two years ago contending that the company operated an illegal monopoly and overcharged them by about $1,000 each. The students, seeking hundreds of millions of dollars in damages, also said that BAR/BRI cut illegal deals with potential competitors to protect its market. But earlier this month, lawyers in the case reached a tentative settlement agreement for $49 million, which could net each student in the class about $125.

The deal, which still requires court approval, has infuriated some of the original plaintiffs in the case, who harbored such anger against BAR/BRI that they wanted to see the company broken up. BAR/BRI is a unit of the Thomson Corporation, the large information services concern, and Thomson says the accusations in the lawsuit against BAR/BRI involve activities that occurred before it bought the company in 2001. BAR/BRI's lawyers say the company has done nothing wrong and that the students' claims are meritless.

It is hard to gauge the strength of the case against BAR/BRI, because many of the filings are sealed — at the request of the defendants, the plaintiffs' lawyers say. But depositions and other court documents that have become publicly available during the course of the litigation have been laced with accusations that BAR/BRI engaged in unsavory conduct. Other claims that have emerged in the case also suggest just how petty and cutthroat the entire bar review market can be.

In a deposition for the Los Angeles case, one former competitor, Hugh Reed, contended that BAR/BRI representatives tore his company's posters off of law school walls; both he and James J. Rigos, a current competitor, contended that the company exaggerated its students' success rate on the bar exam. And Mr. Rigos said in court filings that he believed that his offices might have been repeatedly burglarized because he was a potential witness in the Los Angeles antitrust litigation.

Lawyers for BAR/BRI have denied Mr. Rigos's accusations.

Bar review programs like BAR/BRI thrive because of the tremendous anxiety provoked by the bar exam. The exam, a prerequisite to practicing law in most states, is the last major hurdle to a legal career and comes after years of legal education that can leave students with bills of more than $100,000. The exam can stretch over two or three days and requires mastery of law throughout the country and in a particular state.

More than 80,500 people took a state's bar exam in 2005, according to the National Conference of Bar Examiners; just under two-thirds — 64 percent — passed. And BAR/BRI sells at least 40,000 bar review courses annually, according to a judge hearing one of the antitrust lawsuits against the company.

BAR/BRI's review program consists of about two months of intensive pre-exam classes, given five days a week for three to five hours a day. Some students take the courses in a classroom, while others watch a video recording or listen to a podcast.

The courses are not cheap. For its review course this summer for the New York bar exam, BAR/BRI charges $2,700 a student. The company offers courses for exams in 43 states and the District of Columbia, according to court filings, and it generates about $125 million a year in revenue. Nearly half of that is profit.

The precursor of BAR/BRI, a program called the Bar Review Institute, was founded in 1967 in Illinois by Richard Conviser, who is now the chairman of the company. (Thomson declined to make Mr. Conviser available for an interview.) The Bar Review Institute was acquired in 1974 by Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, which combined it with Bay Area Review, a California bar review program, to create BAR/BRI. At first the company faced competitors in several states, but over time it has cemented its position as the dominant provider.

BAR/BRI has been caught up in antitrust litigation at least five times over the years. A suit was filed in federal court in Manhattan in 2005 by a student contending that BAR/BRI illegally tied together two course offerings — one for the state law portion of the bar exam, the other for the uniform nationwide or "multistate" portion — so that rivals offering courses covering just one area could not compete effectively. In its court filings, BAR/BRI has defended its program, which it characterized as a "full-service, integrated course."

It is the Los Angeles case, which has progressed further, that has angered some of the young lawyers who sued BAR/BRI. They complain that the proposed settlement lets the company off the hook too lightly.

"This suit said, we're going to fight for monetary damages, but we're also going to fight to keep this from happening to the people who are coming up after you, for those people who are next year's class," said Lisa Gintz, a lawyer in Baton Rouge, La., who is one of the lead plaintiffs opposed to the settlement. "With this settlement agreement, really, BAR/BRI hasn't made one change. Not one."

John Shaughnessy, a spokesman for Thomson, declined to comment in detail for this article but provided a brief statement about the settlement: "We are pleased to bring a close to this matter as the alleged actions that formed the basis of the suit occurred years prior to Thomson acquiring the business."

A SETTLEMENT must be approved by Judge Manuel L. Real of United States District Court in Los Angeles, who is hearing the case. A settlement would mean that Thomson and its co-defendant, the test preparation giant Kaplan Inc., would not have to address in open court the most serious accusation against them: that the two companies agreed in 1997 to stay out of each other's market.

The students' complaint asserted that Kaplan agreed not to compete in the bar review market and that BAR/BRI agreed not to compete in the LSAT preparation market. Both Kaplan and BAR/BRI have strongly denied this contention.

"As Kaplan has consistently stated in the litigation, our only agreement with BAR/BRI was to market BAR/BRI services to Kaplan students," Melissa Mack, a Kaplan spokeswoman, said in a statement.

Over the course of the litigation, other contentions have been made specifically about BAR/BRI.

Mr. Reed, who was interviewed by lawyers for the Los Angeles case, said he worked for BAR/BRI for about 16 years and now owns a Chicago firm that offers individualized bar exam preparation.

Shortly after he left BAR/BRI in 1989, he tried to start a company that would compete against it. In a deposition for the case last summer, he said that BAR/BRI representatives pulled down his posters on several campuses between 1991 and 1993.

"We had information and caught people red-handed tearing down our fliers," Mr. Reed said in the deposition.

DOJ_NMG_0136547

Mr. Reed, who has been involved in litigation against BAR/BRI at least three times over the years (he said that each case settled), also accused BAR/BRI of having exaggerated its "pass rate," that is, the percentage of students who took its class and passed the bar. Mr. Shaughnessy, the Thomson spokesman, declined to comment on that contention.

One of the most unusual accusations was made by Mr. Rigos, who runs a bar review course in Washington state. It is one of BAR/BRI's few remaining competitors. Mr. Rigos submitted a statement in federal court in Seattle last summer in an effort to avoid having to produce evidence and possibly having to serve as a witness for either side in the Los Angeles case. If he did so, he said, his business would incur significant costs and would reap little benefit.

Here is what he told the court: Late one evening in the fall of 2005, someone broke into his offices on Fifth Avenue in downtown Seattle. The burglar (or burglars) bypassed a laptop and made for Mr. Rigos's desktop computer, which was taken. Someone on the staff discovered the break-in the next morning and called the police. It was, Mr. Rigos said in a court filing, the office's first robbery in more than 25 years.

The second robbery came just two weeks later. Two people were caught on camera: a woman and a man in a baseball cap, Mr. Rigos said. Again, they took his computer, which this time was secured to his desk. Again, the police were called. The investigating officer, Linda K. Dolane, wrote that she found it odd that the computer had been removed despite the locks holding it in place, which were undamaged. She observed in a report, "This is suspicious because unless a person knows how to install and uninstall them there would be damage to the equipment that was being removed."

No one has been charged in the burglaries. Mr. Rigos said that it was after the robberies that he learned that he could be called as a witness by the plaintiffs in the Los Angeles antitrust case. After all, he was a competitor to BAR/BRI who possibly had evidence showing how the company did business, which could conceivably benefit one side or the other.

BAR/BRI's lawyers asked to see documents that Mr. Rigos might have and to interview him, to learn what his testimony might be. Mr. Rigos immediately suspected that BAR/BRI might somehow be behind the burglaries, and said so in a document he filed in federal court in Seattle.

"Since we haven't been broken into in 25 years, or that server stolen, you can read your own inferences there, but I know what my own inference was," Mr. Rigos said in an interview.

BAR/BRI's lawyers responded rapidly and strongly to Mr. Rigos's contention. Alan S. Gruber, a lawyer at the New York law firm of Shearman & Sterling, said in a court filing that Mr. Rigos's contention "has no basis in fact and is outrageous."

"Neither BAR/BRI nor its counsel burglarized Mr. Rigos's office to obtain the documents it seeks," Mr. Gruber added in the filing.

Mr. Gruber went on to say that Mr. Rigos's suggestion that the burglaries were somehow intended to intimidate him was "preposterous."

In his court filing, Mr. Rigos leveled other accusations against BAR/BRI.

Like Mr. Reed, he contended that BAR/BRI overstated its pass rates. He said that BAR/BRI used the threat of lawsuits to try to intimidate Mr. Rigos's company.

But, Mr. Rigos said in his statement, he wanted nothing to do with the current litigation against BAR/BRI. Costly litigation would hurt his business, he said. Besides, he said in the statement: "The students' lawsuit will probably settle, producing some refund. However, it will not likely change the industry domination and predatory practices" of BAR/BRI, he said.

THE prospect that Mr. Rigos's prediction could come true, in that the settlement with BAR/BRI could leave its market position unchanged, has led some of those students to take on the same law firm that was representing them. Ms. Gintz and two more named plaintiffs representing former BAR/BRI students in the antitrust case fired off a strongly worded 10-page memorandum to their lawyers earlier this month, accusing them of an "apparent breach" of their fiduciary duties to the class.

The law firm handling the case for the plaintiffs is McGuireWoods, whose largest offices are in Richmond, Va., and in Chicago. William Allcott, a partner speaking on behalf of the firm, said the decision to settle was made with the best interests of the class in mind, and added that if the case were to go to trial, the firm would aggressively pursue that direction, too.

"We believe that when the court hears the evidence, it is going to conclude that this is a fair, reasonable and adequate settlement for the members of the affected class," Mr. Allcott said. "If for some reason the court didn't agree with that, we're prepared to go to trial."

McGuireWoods is in a sensitive spot. The firm inherited the BAR/BRI case last year when it acquired Van Etten Suzumoto & Becket of Los Angeles.

The proposed settlement puts Eliot G. Disner, who filed the BAR/BRI case, in an even more awkward spot. Mr. Disner, a former Van Etten Suzumoto lawyer, is now a McGuireWoods partner. According to the former BAR/BRI students objecting to the settlement, Mr. Disner told them that he would seek to break up the company. Yet as a partner at McGuireWoods, Ms. Gintz said, he cannot criticize the deal his colleagues have negotiated.

DOJ_NMG_0136548

But a settlement would not be a surprising outcome. BAR/BRI has fended off other antitrust attacks. A former California competitor, American Professional Testing Service Inc., contended that BAR/BRI offered courses below cost, bribed law school administrators and tore down posters advertising its course, called Barpassers. The case, which was handled on appeal by a gifted lawyer — John G. Roberts Jr., now chief justice of the United States — was not successful.

Ms. Gintz and her fellow dissenting plaintiffs say that the case against BAR/BRI is strong, and that it is significant that the judge hearing the case denied a summary judgment motion by Kaplan, which sought to end the litigation after the evidence-gathering phase, or discovery.

"What that says is, on the surface of these pleadings, there were triable issues there," Ms. Gintz said.

Mr. Disner declined to answer questions about the current case or the settlement, deferring to Mr. Allcott, the law firm's spokesman.

Mr. Rigos, whose company was the victim of the Seattle burglary, sounded sad as he considered the state of the bar review business.

"When I got into this, when I was going to law school in Boston, back then it was really a fun business," he said, adding, "I don't know that I'm just getting older and this thing has worn me down, but it doesn't seem as much fun as it was in those days."

Hospitals Find Merger Positive (CINE)

By Peggy O'farrell, Pofarrell@enquirer.com

The Cincinnati Enquirer, February 25, 2007

Anti-trust fears downplayed

The president and CEO of St. Elizabeth Medical Center doesn't see much potential for anti-trust concerns to block a proposed merger with St. Luke Hospital.

While the proposed merger, announced Thursday, would consolidate Northern Kentucky's hospitals - one each in Covington, Edgewood and Grant County under the St. Elizabeth flag, plus two in Florence and Fort Thomas under St. Luke - consumers and insurers would still have plenty of providers to choose from, said Joseph Gross.

"There's an awful lot of competition here," Gross said. "It's a very large market."

Administrators for the hospital groups have already taken a look at potential anti-trust issues, he said, and so far, the signs are positive.

"We, and St. Luke's, are part of a larger Cincinnati health-care market, and many of the Cincinnati hospitals, the bigger ones, compete aggressively for Northern Kentucky patients," Gross said. "In the past three weeks, mailings from two Cincinnati hospitals competing for patients over here have been received throughout Northern Kentucky."

Rick Laib, chairman of St. Luke's board of trustees, pointed out that 20 percent of consumers in Northern Kentucky already go outside the region - either to Greater Cincinnati or other Kentucky providers - for health.

"We're really pretty confident there won't be an issue," Laib said.

In announcing their intention to merge, officials from the two hospitals pledged to keep all five facilities open and continue all current services.

The announcement is just the latest in an ongoing shake-up in health care in the region.

St. Luke now operates under the umbrella of the Health Alliance, the region's largest health-care group. Its board, along with trustees from Christ Hospital in Mount Auburn, are in court, seeking a judge's permission to leave the group.

The alliance, in turn, wants the judge to force the two hospitals to remain in the group.

Trustees from the two hospitals argue the alliance defaulted on the joint operating agreement that governs the network.

They further argue that operating under the alliance's control jeopardizes their charitable missions in their respective communities and takes away local control of their hospitals and health-care services.

Gail Myers, an alliance spokeswoman, said the proposed Northern Kentucky merger "doesn't change the legal case. There is no event of default that would allow these hospitals to withdraw, and we are proceeding with the case."

Gross is confident the merger will go through.

"I'm optimistic that St. Luke's will be able to convince the judge that they've met the test to get out," he said. "If that doesn't happen, I think it's just a matter of time before they get out of the alliance, even if they lose the court action, because there are a lot of factors that come in to play to make it more likely that they won't stay in the Health Alliance. They're very unhappy, for good reasons, in the alliance. Their charitable mission is being challenged. They've lost local control by being in the alliance. They've lost their support services by being in the alliance. They've lost the ability to control their destiny as a Northern Kentucky hospital."

Doctors at St. Luke and St. Elizabeth favor the merger, Gross said.

The trial is under way in Hamilton County Judge Fred Nelson's court.

DOJ_NMG_0136549

Nelson will decide the case without a jury.

The merger has been under consideration for quite some time, Laib and Gross said.

Can Video Help Save The Satellite Radio Business? (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

If the plan to merge XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio is approved, one result may be less music and less talk radio beamed into cars around the country.

The reasons for that, however, will have nothing to do with regulators.

Washington will take its first look at the proposed merger on Wednesday when the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed antitrust task force meets. Besides the scrutiny of the proposed combination, the satellite radio business is facing huge changes.

The first phase of the business — beaming dedicated music, sports and talk-radio stars like Howard Stern and Opie and Anthony directly to consumers — has not proved to have a clear advantage over old technology like free radio and newer ones like the iPod. So now satellite companies are looking into what other services they can offer to make them appealing to motorists.

"The question they have to ask now is: what problems haven't been solved in the car?" said Michael Urlocker, a former wireless analyst with UBS Securities who is now the chief executive of The Disruption Group, a Toronto-based consulting company. "The lack of customer sign-ups on a profitable basis should be a sign that trying to create a better iPod than Apple is a losing proposition."

Although XM and Sirius offer radio, in theory, the systems could be adapted to distribute any kind of data. And, indeed, both companies have made limited steps in that direction. Subscribers can already choose to have selected stock quotes, as well as news and sports headlines, beamed to the tiny screens on their receivers.

Both companies beam weather data to aviators and boaters through services that cost upwards of $50 a month. Later this year, XM will extend that by beaming weather information to a hand-held unit for hikers and hunters.

But Sirius has also made tentative steps toward offering video. At trade shows, Sirius has displayed prototype systems for sending video to back-seat displays like those now used by in-car DVD players. And the company recently, if vaguely, outlined plans to deliver some form of video programming aimed at children later this year.

Late last week, a specification sheet on the Web site for DaimlerChrysler indicated that such a system would be an option on the 2008 Dodge Magnum, a station wagon. A spokesman for the automaker, however, said that the information was incorrect and would be removed. A spokesman for Sirius, Patrick Reilly, declined requests for comment.

The big question, however, is: what will be the quality of a television signal dropped from a satellite into a car moving at 60 miles an hour?

Here, a merger of XM and Sirius could actually help. Assuming that duplicate channels would be eliminated — for example, there would be no reason to continue separate channels of, say, music hits from the 1940s — a combined company would be able to open up capacity on the systems' satellites and the ground-based antennas that increase signals in urban areas. While that space could be filled with additional radio channels, several empty radio channels could be combined to transmit video.

XM's chairman, Gary M. Parsons, said that he was not willing to promise much in the way of satellite video. As he sees it, satellite radio systems would most likely be able to provide only "a minimal amount of streaming video." It may be preferable, he said, to simply download video from satellites to in-car hard drives for later viewing.

"People relate to video, so maybe they make too big a deal of it," he said. "We are not in the video business."

He does concede, however, that the combined company's future would mean more than just talk and music.

"Our view has been that we are in the business of audio entertainment," Mr. Parsons said. "But we look at how we can improve the listeners' experience in ways that flow very naturally from the high-quality data platform we have."

The future services Mr. Parsons foresees are more modest. One, invisible to users, involves using the satellites to keep the data on in-car navigation systems constantly and automatically up to date. Another is a trick the iPod learned long ago: displaying album cover art when songs are playing.

But there are limits to what even a combined satellite radio company can do. Satellite systems effectively do not allow two-way transmissions, ruling out services such as e-mail.

And without enormous reinvestment, the systems are not likely to approach the transmission speeds of WiMax, a new wireless technology being developed by Nortel Networks and others that will probably start operating within the year.

DOJ_NMG_0136550

Those systems, like cellphone networks, will pass moving users from tower to tower and offer transmission speeds comparable to high-speed, wired connections in homes. Susan Kevorkian, an analyst with IDC, said that the satellite radio connections with automakers would give them a significant advantage over WiMax, at least in the short term.

But she added that the new company might find more immediate benefits from changing the structure of radio pricing. Currently, subscribers are tied to receivers, not users. Ms. Kevorkian said that limits the willingness of people to own more than a single receiver as well as the time they spend listening to the systems.

"Satellite radio is in and of itself a compelling service," she said. "The way it's been sold to date has demonstrated that value to consumers."

Mexico Puts Conditions On Cable TV Buy (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, February 25, 2007

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's antitrust agency said Sunday it has placed a series of conditions on media conglomerate Grupo Televisa in order for it to acquire a stake in Monterrey cable TV operator Television Internacional, or TVI.

The Federal Competition Commission, or CFC, said in a news release that among the conditions, Televisa would have to offer its broadcast channels on all pay TV systems in the country, and carry the broadcast signals of others on its pay TV systems.

Televisa sought antitrust clearance last year to acquire a 50 percent stake in TVI as the country's telecommunications companies prepare for the implementation of "triple play," or the bundling of phone, Internet and television service on the same network.

Televisa is Mexico's largest broadcaster, operating four of the country's six national networks, with a roughly 70 percent share of the broadcast market.

It also runs the only satellite TV service under the Sky brand, and owns one of the largest cable systems, Cablevision, which operates in Mexico City.

Televisa Gets Conditional Approval To Buy Cable Stake (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Adriana Arai

Bloomberg, February 25, 2007

Feb. 25 (Bloomberg) -- Grupo Televisa SA, Mexico's largest broadcaster, obtained conditional approval from antitrust regulators to buy a stake in a cable company in northern Mexico it plans to use to offer telephone services.

Televisa will be allowed to buy 50 percent of Television Internacional de Monterrey on the condition that it offers its free channels to all pay-TV providers nationwide, Mexico's Federal Competition Commission said in an e-mail today. Televisa, based in Mexico City, also must carry free channels from other companies, the commission said.

``With this decision, Televisa cannot use its content as a mechanism to displace competitors," said Eduardo Perez Motta, president of the Federal Competition Commission, on a conference call. ``This will create competition in this industry."

The conditions are ``too tough" and Televisa will study what measures it can take, the company said in an e-mail today. A spokesman for Televisa in Mexico City declined to comment beyond the statement.

Televisa wants to buy cable companies to offer packaged television, phone and Internet services and compete with telephone carriers. The company owns a Mexico City-based cable operation with 497,000 subscribers and planned to buy more operators in other parts of Mexico, Executive Vice-President Alfonso de Angoitia said on a conference call last week.

Cablemas Purchase

The commission said the rules announced today will apply to any future cable acquisition and will guide its analysis of Televisa's plan to buy Mexico's second-largest cable company, Cablemas SA.

In a Feb. 21 statement, Televisa said it agreed in November to buy 49 percent of Cablemas for $258 million. The commission said today it will issue a separate ruling on the transaction.

Televisa hadn't previously disclosed the purchase of a stake in Television Internacional de Monterrey. Perez Motta said Televisa agreed to buy 50 percent of the company.

Televisa, the bigger of two broadcasters that operate in Mexico, reported 20.97 billion pesos ($1.9 billion) of broadcasting revenue for 2006. Rival TV Azteca SA had 9.58 billion pesos in revenue.

Mexican regulators published regulations in 2006 allowing cable companies to offer phone services later this year. Telephone carriers also will be allowed to provide television services.

DOJ_NMG_0136551

Shares of Televisa have risen 12 percent this year, compared with a 7.8 percent increased in the benchmark Mexican stock index. The stock rose 0.5 percent to 65.68 pesos in Mexico City trading on Feb. 23.

EU Antitrust Watchdog Silences 'pussy Cat' Criticism By Baring Teeth (AFP)

AFP, February 25, 2007

BRUSSELS (AFP) - Shortly after taking office as Europe's top competition watchdog in November 2004, Neelie Kroes vowed in the face of detractors that she would not be the "pussy cat" of big business.

Nearly half way through her five-year term, Kroes has silenced early criticism that she was too cuddly with the corporate world by not hesitating to bite business titans that squash their rivals.

Last Wednesday, the Dutch competition commissioner once again bared her teeth when she imposed the biggest fine ever in a EU cartel case by bringing an illegal club of lift makers crashing down with a penalty of 992 million euros (1.3 billion dollars).

In a typically hard-worded statement, she said the consumers would suffer from the effects of the "outrageous" cartel for years and vowed that the "the memory of this fine should last just as long" in the members' boardrooms.

The crushing fine was the latest move in a "no-tolerance" crackdown on cartels that Kroes has made a top priority of her tenure during which she has built up a team of 60 regulators devoted to trustbusting.

It also came less than a month after she hit 10 companies with a fine of 750 million euros --- the third biggest ever imposed in a cartel case -- for fixing prices and carving up the market in power generating equipment.

After busting the power equipment club, Kroes stormed that she "will not tolerate cartels in Europe and the damage that they do in any area of business."

But Kroes has not only been busy fighting cartels as she has also repeatedly taken a hardline in the European Commission's long-standing battle against Microsoft.

Kroes, a Rotterdam native and former Dutch transport minister, is no stranger to high profile showdowns.

Indeed her nomination as EU competition commissioner did not come without controversy, with EU lawmakers alleging conflict of interest due to her extensive business contacts.

Kroes, who holds a doctorate in economics and is a boardroom veteran, quickly cut her ties with the likes of big firms like Thales, Volvo and mm02 in Europe and Lockheed Martin, McDonald's and Lucent in the United States.

And as promised the 65-year-old did not hesitate "to blow the whistle," as she called it, when barely a month into the job she blocked the merger of Portuguese energy groups EDP and GDP in December 2004.

Although the commissioner has made crusading against cartels a priority, the Microsoft dossier has never strayed far from her desk.

Under her predecessor, Mario Monti, the commission fined Microsoft nearly 500 million euros for abusing its dominant market position in what became the biggest competition case ever to come before EU regulators.

But in a test of the commission's authority, Kroes' services have struggled ever since then to get Microsoft to respect the ruling.

Microsoft challenged the 2004 decision in the EU's second-highest court in April 2006 and the judges are expected to hand down a decision in the first half of the year.

Frustrated with Microsoft's defiance of some of its demands, the commission in July slapped daily fines adding up to 280.5 million euros over the six-month period of the penalty. Microsoft is appealing against the charges.

Meanwhile, the threat of further fines remains as the commission has not yet decided whether Microsoft is meeting its demands.

In a further sign the antitrust battle is far from over, Kroes' regulators are looking at a complaint from Microsoft's rivals that its new Vista operating system also threatens competition.

On the legislative front, Kroes has targeted energy sector which she says suffers from a lack of competition because gas and electricity markets are concentrated in the hands of a few companies that control supply, generation and infrastructure.

She has championed the controversial solution of "unbundling," or forcing big integrated energy companies to separate their networks from their supply and generation businesses.

An Alternative Fuel Advocate, Jimmy Carter Feels Vindicated

Plains — As president, Jimmy Carter installed solar panels atop the White House. He championed coal and nuclear power. He taxed oil company profits. He created the U.S. Department of Energy. He introduced America to ethanol.

Oil imports plummeted during the Carter administration. Renewable energy research skyrocketed. Cars got more miles per gallon of gas. Thermostats were lowered to 55 degrees at night.

On Feb. 2, 1977, Carter donned a wool cardigan and asked a national TV audience to conserve energy. Two months later, he likened America's struggle to reduce Middle Eastern oil imports to the "moral equivalent of war."

Was it all for naught?

Today, the United States imports almost twice as much oil as it did during Carter's final year in office. Ethanol, biodiesel, solar and other alternative fuels supply no more energy than they did in 1980. Americans drive Hummers that get 10 miles per gallon.

Pollution from cars, trucks, factories and power plants is widely blamed for endangering the climate. Conservation, according to a dismissive vice president, "may be a sign of personal virtue." U.S. troops are involved in a war in oil-rich Iraq.

The Bush administration has given "no consideration that I've ever detected for taking any sort of substantive action that would correct our growing crisis of energy," Carter said in an interview last week at his home in Plains. "Even in Iraq, there's no indication of this administration's willingness to call for sacrifice, except among the families who have servicemen and women in Iraq."

Carter spoke an hour before groundbreaking in Plains for an alternative fuel factory that will turn soybean oil into biodiesel to help lessen America's dependence on imports and, in the process, clean the environment.

He feels vindicated that energy policies he pushed 30 years before are now accepted as mainstream.

"I went into the White House with two determinations: to cut down our dependence on foreign oil; [and] to remove the unwarranted influence of oil-producing countries on our foreign policy," Carter explained. "I spent more time on the energy issue while I was president than any other thing I addressed."

The peanut farmer and globe-trotting statesman is resigned, yet chagrined that Reagan, Clinton and the two Bushes didn't do more to wean America of its oil addiction. But a generation later, Carter, 82, is finally getting his due.

"He was ahead of his time," said Joseph Romm, an energy expert at the Center for American Progress, a think tank in Washington. "Even President Bush now talks about the need to save energy. Bush is no Jimmy Carter, but at least he has been forced to pay rhetorical homage to him. Carter has been vindicated."

'Sacrifice' theme

Carter was Georgia's governor in 1973 (and "secretly planning to run for president," he said) when Arab states restricted the amount of oil sent to the United States and drivers waited hours to get gas at the pumps. It only took him two weeks upon reaching Washington in 1977 to put on the five-button, camel-colored sweater (on display at the Carter museum on Freedom Parkway), sit by the White House library fireplace and deliver the first of a half-dozen speeches on energy policy.

It wasn't his most famous speech, but it laid out the populist politician's four-year strategy to revitalize an America demoralized by war, inflation and joblessness. It also mentioned "sacrifice," a theme Carter would return to again and again.

"We must face the fact that the energy shortage is permanent," he said. "There is no way we can solve it quickly."

On April 18, 1977, Carter again gathered the electronic nation for an "unpleasant talk" vowing "painful sacrifices" in the "moral equivalent of war." The president predicted that without action world demand for oil would outstrip supply by 1980.

He laid out a series of goals to be reached by 1985: reduce the annual growth rate of energy consumption to less than 2 percent; cut gasoline consumption by 10 percent; slash oil imports from 9 million to 6 million barrels a day; increase coal production by two-thirds; insulate 90 percent of America's homes; and bring solar energy into 2.5 million households.

"The most important thing about these proposals is that the alternative may be a national catastrophe," Carter intoned. "Further delay can affect our strength and our power as a nation."

Two days later, the president submitted a 104-page energy plan to Congress with 113 specific proposals. Carter sought steep taxes — as high as $2,500 per vehicle — on the sale of cars that didn't get 27.5 mpg by 1985. He requested greater enforcement of the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit and incentives for carpooling.

Builders were required to use more insulation. Appliances, refrigerators in particular, became more energy-efficient. Homeowners received tax credits to heat water with solar power.

The president faced powerful, deep-pocketed adversaries. He eventually sought partial decontrol of all natural gas prices.

Carter also called for a tax increase on crude oil prices. He wanted U.S. prices to match OPEC's to reduce oil consumption (and imports) and increase domestic production.

DOJ_NMG_0136553

The tax increase angered consumers and the oil industry and delayed passage of his ambitious energy package for 18 months. Finally, in November 1978, Carter signed the National Energy Act. It was a major victory despite Congress' rejection of the crude-oil tax.

"Congress responded mostly favorably because there was still the specter of another oil interruption," said Jay Hakes, an expert on energy policy who directs the Carter Presidential Library. "The lessons of Carter's energy package were that there were no silver bullets. But Carter had 113 bullets."

First to mention ethanol

Carter relished last Tuesday's groundbreaking ceremony in Plains. He labeled construction of a 30-million-gallon-a-year biodiesel factory "a major step forward." An admirer called Carter "one of the founding fathers of alternative fuel."

In the early years of his presidency, though, Carter didn't seek big dollars for the development of alternative fuels. Hakes, who's writing a book on the energy policies of Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford and Carter, notes that Carter's 104-page energy plan devoted just three pages to alternatives, mostly solar energy.

Nonetheless, Carter became the first president to mention ethanol — "gasohol," actually — at a town meeting in Pennsylvania in September 1978, according to Hakes. And the president's 1979 budget requested, and received, a huge increase in alternative fuel spending from Congress. (Congress was also keen on photovoltaic cell research.) A 4-cent-per-gallon tax break also encouraged ethanol production.

Carter, an environmentalist, signed the Alaska land conservation act in 1980, protecting 100 million acres of land. It seems contradictory, then, that Carter also touted climate-harming coal as a remedy for America's addition to imported oil.

Equally confounding to environmentalists was Carter's embrace of nuclear power, even after the partial meltdown of a reactor at Three Mile Island in March 1979. The president, with wife Rosalynn and "a lot of reluctant TV cameras" in tow, visited Middletown, Pa., the day after the accident "to prove to the world that nuclear power was safe."

"I thought then, as I do now, that it's absolutely a good alternative supply of electricity," said Carter, who trained as a nuclear engineer in the Navy, while seated underneath an Ansel Adams photograph. "I feel that nuclear power is completely safe if proper safety precautions are enforced."

Carter had bigger problems that spring. High gas prices and long gas lines returned in the aftermath of the Iranian revolution. American, again, faced an unsettled energy future.

On April 5, Carter rolled out another energy plan. By executive order, the president phased out oil price controls to dampen demand for imported crude. Congress eventually passed Carter's "windfall profits tax" to recover the additional money Mobil, Exxon and other companies would've earned with higher prices.

"So the oil companies didn't profit as the price of oil went up," Carter said, with relish. "That's quite different from what it has been lately where oil companies are shaping our national policy."

Carter's tax cost oil companies $227 billion — the largest tax increase on any single U.S. industry. The revenue financed mass transit projects, coal research, loans for ethanol production and renewable-energy incentives for homeowners.

"There's no question Carter had an impact. Unfortunately, most of it was bad," said John Felmy, the American Petroleum Institute's chief economist. "It was an abuse of power to demand that companies owned by shareholders somehow should not be entitled to their hard-earned savings."

Low approval rating

On July 15, 1979, Carter delivered the most important speech of his career — the "crisis of confidence" speech — to another televised audience. Critics dubbed it "the malaise speech."

Another series of oil price boosts and gas shortages combined with a lousy economy had unsettled the nation. Carter's approval rating hovered around 25 percent. Americans were looking to Washington for guidance and hope. Apparently, they didn't get it.

"In a nation that was proud of hard work, strong families, close-knit communities and our faith in God, too many of us now tend to worship self-indulgence and consumption," Carter told the nation. "Human identity is no longer defined by what one does but by what one owns."

The president's brief uptick in the polls belied the impression that he was blaming Americans for the nation's troubles and that Washington was without answers.

"It was one of the best speeches I ever made," Carter said last week. "I was reluctant to make a speech that controversial, but I was discouraged that we couldn't get Congress to move on my major energy legislation."

In early 1980, with the caucus in corn-rich Iowa upcoming, Carter called for $1 billion to stimulate ethanol production.

But Ronald Reagan, with his "morning in America" mantra, won the election. His administration soon began killing off many of Carter's energy initiatives.

DOJ_NMG_0136554

Reagan halved the Energy Department's conservation and alternative fuels budget, according to Hakes. Spending on photovoltaic research dropped by two-thirds. Yet tax breaks for ethanol actually increased, prompting a surge in ethanol plant production.

Reagan's anti-tax, anti-government credo kicked into high gear during his second term. Energy tax credits for homeowners disappeared. With oil prices dropping, more than half of the nation's ethanol producers foundered.

Reagan rolled back fuel-efficiency standards for cars. And, in the summer of 1986, the solar panels atop the White House were taken down.

Reagan "ignored, even derogated, everything I had done," Carter said. "He spent eight years convincing people every problem in the country was my fault and that I was foolish and naive."

Despite the dismantling of many Carter's initiatives, Hakes, Romm and others credit the former president with major energy successes. Oil imports — Carter's energy crucible — dropped significantly during his administration, from 6.6 million to 5.3 million barrels a day, although higher prices and the recession played a role.

Carter boosted renewable fuel usage from 6 percent to 7 percent of the nation's energy demands. He decontrolled oil prices. Oil used to generate electricity disappeared.

Buildings, particularly in the cold Northeast, were insulated. Conservation entered the everyday lexicon. Tax incentives for renewable energy remain.

"We would be in much worse shape today without Carter, especially [regarding] the level of oil imports, greenhouse gas emissions and research on alternative fuels," Hakes said. "But we live in an age now where people want something for nothing. It remains to be seen whether we have the stomach to make the hard [energy] choices."

The United States today imports 12 million barrels of oil daily, or 60 percent of the amount consumed. Gas prices are again on the rise. Renewables still account for only 6 percent of energy use, although Bush has recently promised to boost spending on alternative fuels.

Carter said the White House won't ever ask Americans to sacrifice.

"I haven't seen this administration do anything that would dramatically reduce demand for oil in this country," the ex-president said.

What should Bush do?

"Abandon Exxon and Halliburton and do what's good for this country and good for the American people," Carter responded.

And the likelihood of that happening?

"Zero."

The Truth About Coal (NYT)

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

Last Wednesday, members of the Rainforest Action Network, a scrappy little advocacy group, assembled in New York outside the Citigroup Center, where Merrill Lynch has a branch office. Dressed in top hats, carrying bags of coal and calling themselves “Billionaires for Coal,” the group was protesting what it felt was the hypocrisy of a giant investment bank that proclaims a devout commitment to “environmental excellence” even as it provides financing for dirty power plants.

Merrill is a lead underwriter for TXU, a Dallas-based utility that plans to build a dozen coal-fired power plants in Texas that will add significantly to atmospheric concentrations of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas. Though Merrill was the protesters’ target, Citigroup must have been feeling queasy. It has also trumpeted its environmental virtues and is among TXU’s lead underwriters.

There are at least two points to be made here. One, obviously, is there is a difference between talk and reality. Much of corporate America now appears to be out in front of the Bush administration in facing up to global warming. Some big players like Pacific Gas and Electric and DuPont seem seriously committed to mandatory controls on carbon dioxide emissions — in sharp contrast to the administration’s voluntary approach.

Others, notably big investment banks, are still doing what comes naturally: seizing opportunities, whether or not those opportunities fit their green posturing. TXU can fairly claim that its plants, outfitted with the latest technology, will emit fewer pollutants that cause smog and acid rain than the clunkers that have been around for 50 years. But these plants will still be using the same basic technology — burning coal, with no ability to capture and dispose of immense amounts of carbon dioxide. That’s distressing from a global warming perspective. It is also distressing because cleaner, if costlier, technologies are available that could capture greenhouse gases before they enter the atmosphere (that is, if TXU or the private equity group that is negotiating to buy the utility were willing to make the investment).

Which leads to the second point: There is a need to put a price on carbon to force companies to abandon older, dirtier technologies for newer, cleaner ones. Right now, everyone is using the atmosphere like a municipal dump, depositing carbon dioxide free. Start charging for the privilege and people will find smarter ways to do business. A carbon tax is one approach. Another is to impose a steadily decreasing cap on emissions and let individual companies figure out ways to stay below the cap.

Barbara Boxer and Jeff Bingaman, the two senators who will have the most to say about climate change legislation, warned in a recent op-ed piece in The Dallas Morning News that companies like TXU that are racing to complete conventional coal-fired plants (nearly 150 are on the drawing board) will not be grandfathered under any new emissions law. Like any other company, they will be forced to meet their assigned carbon targets — which could be an expensive proposition. A surer way to prevent the construction of these plants is not to warn about such a law, but to pass it.

Navy Pursues Dolphin, Sea Lion Patrols in Puget Sound

BAINBRIDGE ISLAND, Wash. -- If they are allowed to police parts of Puget Sound, this is how Navy-trained dolphins and sea lions are expected to nab terrorists in wetsuits:

Using its sonar, a dolphin locates a swimmer approaching Naval Base Kitsap-Bangor, where Trident submarines with long-range nuclear missiles are based. Swimming through the water in spurts of up to 30 mph, the dolphin seeks out and bumps the swimmer with a "nose cup." The device releases a strobe that rises to the surface. An armed Navy security team speeds toward the flashing light.

Alternatively, a sea lion collars swimmers around the piers of the naval base. Sea lions have excellent underwater hearing and, with their large eyes, can see underwater five times as well as people. Carrying a C-shaped leg cuff in its mouth, a sea lion dives, approaches the swimmer from behind and snaps the cuff around one ankle.

Swimmers participating in the training exercises often do not know where the cuff came from and almost never see the sea lion, the Navy says. After the cuffing, the sea lion darts away and a security officer uses a rope to haul in the swimmer.

"This is a mature technology and has been used on a bunch of occasions," said Tom LaPuzza, a spokesman in San Diego for the Navy's Marine Mammal Program, which announced last week that it wants to deploy dolphins and sea lions in Puget Sound.

To bring its technology north, however, the Navy must finesse its way around climatological, legal and political obstacles.

The water in Puget Sound is at least 10 degrees cooler than Atlantic bottlenose dolphins are used to in San Diego or in their native Gulf waters. So when the Navy tried to bring the dolphins north in 1989 and 1993, judges in Seattle agreed with animal rights groups that the dolphins might be harmed. One judge ordered the Navy not to move the dolphins until it studied the health consequences.

And public attitudes in the area toward the use of marine mammals for military purposes are downright icy.

"It is a cruel absurdity," said Jan Bailey, a licensed wildlife rehabilitator who met with a dozen concerned friends and neighbors recently at a community center on Bainbridge Island.

Hoping to embarrass the Navy, Bailey and her group are deploying their own "silly absurdity." They are knitting sweaters and mittens for the dolphins and preparing to deploy the dolphin-loving masses in the Pacific Northwest to attend public hearings next month on the Navy's plan.

Concern generated by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks has compelled the Navy to give the Puget Sound plan another try, LaPuzza said. He said Defense Department studies make it clear that the Navy must improve its water-based defenses for the Bangor base, home port for 12 submarines.

The Navy considered using combat swimmers and computer-controlled remote vehicles, LaPuzza said, but human swimmers can't match dolphins and sea lions. Comparable machines have not yet been configured, although the Navy is working on it.

The Navy has been training dolphins since the Vietnam War. Dolphins patrolled San Diego harbor in 1996 during the Republican National Convention. Sea lions and dolphins were sent in 2003 to stop swimmers off Bahrain. The Navy has about 100 dolphins and sea lions, most of them in San Diego. About 20 protect Naval Submarine Base Kings Bay in Georgia.

To comply with the federal judge's order to study the effect of cold water on bottlenose dolphins, the Navy has in recent years transported them to waters off Maine, Alaska and Scandinavia.

"The animals did fine," LaPuzza said, but he noted that they spent most of their time in heated enclosures. In Puget Sound, the animals would have heated pens and would be exposed to cold water in short shifts.

DOJ_NMG_0136556

But skeptics such as Naomi A. Rose, a marine mammal scientist for the Humane Society of the United States, said that dolphins, a highly social and intelligent species, should not be held captive for any reason. She particularly objects, on ethical grounds, to their being used for military purposes.

"They are not reliable soldiers," she said. "They think they are just having fun."

Rose said the Navy's marine mammal center in San Diego provides the best veterinarian care in the United States. But keeping dolphins in captivity in a noisy harbor and transporting them around the world causes too much stress, she said. Citing a U.S. government database, she said captive dolphins live about as long as their wild cousins, but no longer. Given that Navy dolphins have medical care, abundant food and protection from predators, Rose said it is worrisome that they do not live longer. She blames stress. The lifespan of a dolphin in the wild is about 30 years.

The Navy says that Rose is wrong and that its dolphins do live considerably longer than creatures in the wild. Everyone agrees that sea lions live longer in the Navy program, mostly because they are protected from sharks and killer whales.

In the four decades that the Navy has been training dolphins -- and taking them on periodic "open ocean walks" where they are free to escape -- nine dolphins have done just that. Rose suggests that the dolphins went AWOL because they preferred life in the wild. The Navy disagrees.

"The way we look at it is they got lost and they are trying to find us as hard as we are trying to find them," LaPuzza said. The disappearances stopped 10 years ago when the Navy outfitted its dolphins with electronic tracking devices called pectoral fin pingers.

A decision on whether Navy dolphins and sea lions will come to Puget Sound is expected to take at least a year. While they wait, dolphin admirers on Bainbridge Island will knit.

"We are looking for neoprene yarn," Bailey said.

Murder On Indian Reservation Offers Glimpse At Broader Violence (LOMPREC)

By Kim Curtis

Lompoc (CA) Record, February 25, 2007

MANCHESTER-POINT ARENA RANCHERIA, Calif. - Marcos Escareno's neighbors say he was raised amid a culture of violence on this tiny American Indian reservation. And residents say the disportionate number of shootings, stabbings and other incidents often go unreported because of a mistrust of law enforcement and a fear of retribution.

At 14, Escareno is the youngest person ever charged as an adult with murder in Mendocino County after he allegedly pointed a hunting rifle into a van window on Feb. 6 and shot Enoc Cruz Salgado, his sister's 21-year-old boyfriend. He has not entered a plea and is being held on $550,000 bail.

Some of the roughly 250 people who make up the Manchester-Point Arena band of Pomo Indians say it was merely an extreme example of the violence that has plagued their tribe. Tribal Chairman Nelson Pinola blames drug and alcohol abuse, combined with a lack of social services on the rugged North Coast where the rancheria is located.

"How do you fix that?" said Pinola, a sheriff's lieutenant in neighboring Sonoma County. "If we could fix it on a reservation, I'd sure like to copyright it."

Although the shooting death of Cruz Salgado was the first homicide at Manchester-Point Arena since 1992, the earliest year for which records were available, violent crimes such as assault, battery, child abuse and shootings occurred here at a higher rate than in the surrounding county.

On the rancheria, the rate of violent crime was about 26 per 100 residents between 2001 and 2006 _ 2 1/2 times that of the surrounding county, where the violent crime rate was 10.3 per 100 people, according to records from the Mendocino sheriff's office, whose jurisdiction excludes the county seat of Ukiah.

Nationally, American Indians experienced a per capita rate of violent crime twice that of the U.S. population as a whole, according to a 2004 report from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Despite the high crime rate, residents insist violence on the reservation is underreported because of suspicion of outsiders, fear of reprisal attacks and concerns about alienating themselves in the community.

One of Escareno's neighbors told The Associated Press he heard gunshots and witnessed other elements of Cruz Salgado's slaying, but he did not tell police because of the tight-knit culture of silence that prevails here.

The man was one of several tribal members who spoke only on condition of anonymity because they fear retribution in the form of attacks on their families or being ostracized by tribal leaders. Each described it as a place where drug abuse, alcoholism and child neglect are rampant, while stabbings and fights occur regularly without ever being reported to authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0136557

Lisa Poupart, an associate professor of American Indian studies at the University of Wisconsin, Green Bay, said the reluctance to report crimes is not unusual among native tribes and may stem from a fear of reinforcing stereotypes of "the drunken Indian ... the savage Indian."

"I think there's reluctance among American Indian people to talk about our social problems," said Poupart, a member of the Ojibwa tribe who has studied violence among American Indian families and the unwillingness to report it. "A large part of that silence is about American Indian people not wanting to reinforce an already damaging opinion of Indians."

The Manchester-Point Arena Rancheria (rancheria is California's designation for a small Indian reservation), is just a few miles off Highway 1, where thousands of sightseers cruise the rugged coastline and admire towering redwoods. But the settlement, a mix of modest single-family homes and decrepit trailers, is hidden from tourists' view.

The median household income is just $23,000 and nearly 30 percent of families live below the poverty level, according to U.S. Census figures. Trash and abandoned cars litter vacant lots near a long-neglected tangle of rusted playground equipment.

Escareno has lived most of his life here, about 140 miles north of San Francisco. His street, Garcia Court, is a cul-de-sac of simple, wooden houses with small yards.

Authorities were already familiar with the family. In 2004, Escareno's mother, Mary Logan, pleaded guilty to beating one of her daughters with a strap, according to court records. The girl, who was wearing a heavy coat, was unharmed, but the incident was reported to Mendocino County Sheriff's deputies.

Escareno, who was 12 at the time, and his two older sisters were removed from their mother's house by Child Protective Services. It's unclear how long the children were in foster care. A CPS spokeswoman refused to comment, citing confidentiality requirements.

Logan received probation and was ordered to attend parenting classes, but she got into another scrape with the law just four months later. She was accused of knocking a man to the floor at a community center dance and hitting him with a beer bottle, according to court records. No charges were filed in that case.

While police won't discuss his criminal history, Marcos was already scheduled for a court appearance on an undisclosed juvenile matter at the time of Cruz Salgado's murder. Several acquaintances also recall violent run-ins with the boy, including one neighbor who said Escareno kicked out her taillights for no apparent reason.

Its part of a pattern on the reservation say neighbors, including the man who says he witnessed the crime: Small, unreported acts of violence multiply and magnify.

"If you let the little things go, it builds up to this," he said, "shootings and stickings."

Poupart said stemming the violence requires that members of the community speak up without fear of being attacked or ostracized themselves.

"This signifies an imbalance and that community has to find balance again," Poupart said. "If not, it perpetuates the cycle that brought about this violence in the first place."

During a court appearance earlier this month in Ukiah, Escareno, who turns 15 in March, shook his head, cried and wiped his face with his shirt sleeve as a judge read the charges. His mother refused to comment outside court, except to say that her son had never been in trouble and she had no idea what happened.

As of Thursday, the family still had not hired a lawyer. Escareno qualified for prosecution as an adult under a 1995 law that lowered the age limit for such prosecutions from 16 to 14.

Pinola, the tribal chairman who lives off the rancheria, in Santa Rosa, said he's optimistic Cruz Salgado's killer will be brought to justice.

"I have the utmost confidence they'll do an adequate investigation," he said. "My job as chairman is to ensure they follow through, solve the crime and make the reservation safe."

A service of the Associated Press(AP)

One of Escareno's neighbors told The Associated Press he heard gunshots and witnessed other elements of Cruz Salgado's slaying, but he did not tell police because of the tight-knit culture of silence that prevails here.

All Aboard Air Force 2 Reported OK (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney's plane from Sydney headed for Singapore today, with the White House saying it was a scheduled refueling stop and that Air Force Two had not been diverted.

DOJ_NMG_0136558

Australian Prime Minister John Howard had said earlier that the plane was being diverted to Singapore because of unspecified problems.

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said there was a problem with a generator but it posed no safety threats and the aircraft and everyone on board were fine. Cheney had been visiting Australia as part of a trip to thank war allies Japan and Australia. She would not say whether Cheney was U.S. bound.

Cheney Wraps Up Japan, Australia Visit (AFP)

AFP, February 25, 2007

US Vice President Dick Cheney wrapped up a week-long visit to Japan and Australia, a mission to reassure two strong allies buffeted by Washington's strategies for Iraq and North Korea.

Amid a growing chorus calling for the withdrawal of US-led troops from Iraq, Cheney assailed unnamed critics he described as wanting the allies to "turn our backs" on Iraq and Afghanistan and allowing them to become terrorist havens.

In Tokyo, Cheney met with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and in Sydney with staunch Iraq war ally Australian Prime Minister John Howard and opposition leader Kevin Rudd, who has called for Australian troops in Iraq to come home.

In Sydney on Saturday, Cheney also issued a warning to Iran, saying that Washington favours a diplomatic approach to resolving concerns over Tehran's atomic programme but refusing to rule out the use of force to prevent the Islamic republic from obtaining nuclear weapons.

"It would be a serious mistake if a nation like Iran were to become a nuclear power," Cheney warned during a joint press conference with Howard. "All options are still on the table."

During the six-day trip, the vice president also defended a landmark nuclear pact with North Korea but insisted the United States was not blindly trusting Pyongyang to abide by its terms.

He pulled out all the stops to allay Japanese concerns about the deal and used his only speech in Australia to soothe worries that Washington was blindly trusting the Stalinist member of US President George W. Bush's "axis of evil" to implement the agreement.

"We go into this deal with our eyes open. In light of North Korea's missile tests last July, its nuclear test in October and its record of proliferation and human rights abuses, the regime in Pyongyang has much to prove," he said.

"Yet this agreement represents the first hopeful step towards a better future for the North Korean people," Cheney said.

Cheney also coupled praise for China's role in securing the accord with a stark warning that Beijing's swift military build-up and its satellite-killer test last month clashed with its hoped-for image as a peaceful world power.

"Last month's anti-satellite test, and China's continued fast-paced military build-up are less constructive, and are not consistent with China's stated goal of a 'peaceful rise'," Cheney said.

China shot down one of its own orbiting weather satellites in space with a ballistic missile, provoking an international outcry amid fears that the rising power could potentially target satellites used for defence.

In Tokyo, Cheney promised US help to Japanese families whose loved ones were abducted by North Korea -- a volatile issue many cite to explain Japan's refusal to fund the new nuclear accord with Pyongyang.

"I know it means a great deal to the Japanese people," Cheney told the parents of Megumi Yokota, who was whisked away on a North Korean ship in 1977 when she was 13.

"I can identify, in fact the whole world can identify, with the emotion of this tragedy. We will do what we can to help," he added, according to a senior aide travelling with the vice president.

Cheney used the trip to make a full-throated defense of the war in Iraq and the new US plan to pacify Baghdad, which has drawn opposition in the United States, as key ally Britain announced a troop draw-down.

With Democrats in Washington and a majority of the US public pushing for a US withdrawal, Cheney warned that hastily quitting Iraq would unleash terrorists and sectarian violence on the Middle East and the world.

"The notion that free countries can turn our backs on what happens in places like Afghanistan, Iraq, or any other possible safe haven for terrorists is an option we simply cannot indulge," said Cheney.

Governors Worry Over Money For Child Health Program (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24 — As the National Governors Association began its winter meeting, 13 governors expressed alarm on Saturday that they were about to run out of federal money for a popular program that provides health insurance to children.

DOJ_NMG_0136559

They appealed to Congress and the Bush administration for swift action to protect hundreds of thousands of children who could lose benefits. The full association is poised to endorse that appeal.

In a letter to the Democratic and Republican leaders of Congress, the 13 governors said that "health insurance for some of our states' most vulnerable citizens is in jeopardy."

"Without quick Congressional action," the letter said, "our states, all facing federal shortfalls, will be forced to make harsh decisions affecting the lives of thousands of families."

Such decisions could include freezing enrollment, restricting eligibility, increasing premiums charged to low-income families or reducing benefits like dental and vision care.

Seven of the 13 governors who signed the letter were Republicans. They included Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, chairman of the Republican Governors Association; Gov. Tim Pawlenty of Minnesota, vice chairman of the National Governors Association; and Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

The Democrats warning of shortfalls in their states were Govs. John Baldacci of Maine, Rod R. Blagojevich of Illinois, Chet Culver of Iowa, James E. Doyle of Wisconsin, Martin O'Malley of Maryland and Deval Patrick of Massachusetts.

The program in question, the State Children's Health Insurance Program, covers more than six million children in families that have too much income to qualify for Medicaid but not enough to buy private insurance.

Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona, a Democrat, noted that "many states have expanded, or have proposals to expand, eligibility" for the child health program. "The president's budget is problematic in that regard," Ms. Napolitano said.

In his budget this month, President Bush proposed reducing federal payments to the states for coverage of children with family incomes exceeding twice the poverty level. By contrast, Ms. Napolitano is trying to expand eligibility by raising the income limit in Arizona to 300 percent of the poverty level, from 200 percent.

In New York, Gov. Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, wants to increase the limit to 400 percent, from 250 percent. (A family of four is considered poor if its annual income is less than $20,650.)

Congress is conducting a comprehensive review of the program, which was created in 1997 with bipartisan support and is up for renewal. By most accounts, the program has been effective, reducing the number of uninsured children by about 25 percent, to 8.3 million in 2005.

The 13 governors said their states needed immediate short-term assistance and could not wait for Congress to revamp the program.

Georgia has announced it will "discontinue enrollment" in its program, known as PeachCare for Kids, on March 11.

In an interview, Dr. Rhonda M. Medows, commissioner of the Georgia Department of Community Health, said the state had a federal allotment of $165 million this year and would need $131 million more to continue serving the 273,000 children on the rolls.

Senator Saxby Chambliss, Republican of Georgia, said these children could "have the insurance safety net jerked out from under them" unless Congress acts.

The federal government spends $5 billion a year on the Children's Health Insurance Program. Mr. Bush wants to continue that level of spending, and he is seeking an "additional allotment" of $4.8 billion over the next five years.

That is considerably less than what states would need to continue their programs with current eligibility rules and benefits. New estimates from the Congressional Budget Office show that the states face shortfalls of $700 million this year and a total shortage of $13.4 billion from 2008 to 2012.

To eliminate these shortfalls, the federal government would need to increase payments to the states by $14.1 billion. But the budget office said 40 percent of the new spending would be offset by savings elsewhere — specifically, in Medicaid.

Karen A. Smigielski, a spokeswoman for the Minnesota Department of Human Services, said her state had a federal allocation of $48.6 million this year, would run out of money in July and would need $15 million to continue the program as it is.

Francis X. Rullan, a spokesman for the Mississippi Division of Medicaid, said his state would exhaust its federal allocation this summer.

In a separate letter to Congress, the National Governors Association criticized a Bush administration proposal to cut federal Medicaid payments to public hospitals and nursing homes. The White House says the changes are needed to ensure the "fiscal integrity" of Medicaid and to curb "excessive payments."

The association denounced the proposal, saying it "will result in cuts of approximately $5 billion in federal Medicaid spending over five years." Moreover, governors said the proposal usurped the states' authority to decide how to finance their share of Medicaid.

Citizenship Requests Soar Before Changes (LAT)

By Anna Gorman, Jennifer Delson

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

Citizenship applications are skyrocketing in Southern California and across the nation, as green card holders rush to avoid a proposed fee increase, a revised civics test and possible changes in immigration law.

Applications filed in Los Angeles and six surrounding counties shot up to 18,024 in January from 7,334 in the same month last year, a 146% increase, according to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. Nationwide, the number hit 95,622, up from 53,390, a 79% increase.

The jump — both locally and nationwide — is the largest in a decade, officials said. The numbers of applications first spiked last March with mass immigrant rights rallies and saw the most dramatic increase after the new year.

The filings are expected to continue as Congress prepares to restart the debate on immigration reform.

"Every time we have this much talk of immigration in the news and on the Hill, we get a lot more interest," said CIS spokeswoman Marie Sebrechts. "We tend to see a surge in applications."

After last year's marches, immigrant rights advocates launched a campaign to produce 1 million new citizens and registered voters. They fell far short of their goal by the November election, but advocates said they were pleased with the number of immigrants who are applying for naturalization.

"People are really invested in the entire debate," said Angelica Salas, executive director of the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. She said many immigrants have asked themselves, "How am I going to protect myself in this country if I am not a U.S. citizen?"

There are an estimated 8 million permanent legal residents who are eligible to apply for citizenship. An additional 12 million illegal immigrants are believed to reside in the United States.

This month, community groups and faith-based organizations are gearing up for another citizenship drive before the proposed new fees and exam would take effect.

The new effort is called, "Ya Es Hora. ¡Ciudadania!" (It's time. Citizenship!) and features media blitzes and workshops to help educate immigrants about the process.

Citizenship application and fingerprint fees would increase from $400 to $675 in June under the CIS proposal, Sebrechts said. And a new test, which would require a better understanding of the nation's history and democratic principles, is set to take effect next year.

"There is a new urgency in the community," said Arturo Vargas, executive director of the National Assn. of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials. "Folks are saying, 'I'd better apply now.'"

William Ramirez, a legal resident from El Salvador, has been eligible to apply for citizenship since last February. When he heard about the new fees, he immediately sought help from the immigrant rights organization, Hermandad Mexicana, in Los Angeles to complete his application.

"If I can do it now, why wait?" said Ramirez, 44, of La Puente. "It's going to save me a lot of money."

Ramirez said he planned to seek legal residency for his wife and young child, now in the country on tourist visas, and is eager to cast his first ballot. "I can do better for my people," he said. "I can help with my vote."

Rancho Cucamonga resident Irene Gonzalez, 32, emigrated with her parents from Mexico when she was 6. After two decades as a green card holder she filed her application for citizenship last week.

When she was younger, Gonzalez said, she felt as though becoming a U.S. citizen would be a betrayal of her native Mexico. Now, she says, "I want to have that peace of mind that I am a citizen and I have every right to be in this country."

Who may apply

Green card holders — legal permanent residents — can apply for citizenship after living five years in the United States, or three years if they are married to a U.S. citizen. They must pass civics and English tests, be of "good moral character" and take an oath of allegiance.

CIS must raise application costs because it does not have a regular budget allocation. Rather, it relies almost entirely on fees to support itself and is facing a budget shortfall, Sebrechts said. The agency plans to switch from paper to electronic filing, which she said would make the application process more efficient and secure.

DOJ_NMG_0136561

On Saturday,potential citizens throughout Southern California went to schools, community colleges and other locations, including a Mexican restaurant in Lynwood, for help in completing their applications. Kidworks, a Santa Ana faith-based community center, sponsored one of the workshops.

"In light of the climate right now," said Ava Steaffens, chief executive officer, "it's necessary to give people the tools to become full-fledged citizens."

Some local colleges have seen citizenship class attendance more than double in the last six months. For example, at Los Angeles Southwest College, class attendance has jumped from 180 to 400 since the fall, said Marian Ruane, a program coordinator at the school.

Garden Grove resident Mariana Garcia, 34, who marched for immigrant rights in Santa Ana last year, has been eligible to apply for citizenship for more than two decades after emigrating from Mexico. She said the desire to vote was the main reason she wanted to become a citizen.

"We've seen so many people say that immigrants contribute nothing and take too much," she said. "We need to be voters to make a statement to the contrary."

Media campaign

Spanish-language media is also playing a part in encouraging citizenship and registering voters. La Opinion, a Los Angeles newspaper, recently ran a full-page advertisement explaining how to apply. Univision's KMEX television station has dedicated significant airtime to promoting citizenship workshops.

Popular radio deejay Eddie "El Piolin" Sotelo began an on-air contest called "Who Wants to be a Citizen?" Listeners from around the country can win trips and cash prizes by answering questions from the citizenship exam: What are the three branches of the U.S. government? Who signs bills into law? What is the Fourth of July?

With disco music playing in the background, Sotelo stood in Univision's Glendale studios last week and talked with Pedro, a Mexican immigrant in Phoenix. He directed Pedro to choose from four envelopes, each containing a question and a prize, and told him he could call a friend for help.

Pedro chose #2, and Sotelo recited the question in Spanish: What is the head executive of a state government called? A. President. B. Governor. C. Mayor.

When Pedro responded, Sotelo teased him. "D? I only gave you three: A, B and C," Sotelo said.

"B — de Burro," Pedro repeated loudly.

"Correct!" Sotelo cheered, his arms waving. "Congratulations!"

Then Pedro opened the envelope to see what he had won.

"Three-hundred dollars!" Sotelo cheered. "You won a day's work!"

Pedro laughed and corrected him: "Two days."

Influencing the future

Increased citizenship could influence politics nationally and locally if the new citizens register to vote and get to the polls, said Leo Chavez, a political anthropology professor at UC Irvine.

"As more immigrants vote, it will be harder to attack immigrants," Chavez said. "They will be the constituency."

Anti-illegal immigration groups, however, say they are not especially concerned about the surge in citizenship applications and what influence it might have on the national debate.

"It's not clear that the impact is what some immigrant rights advocates think it might be," said Steven Camarota, director of research for the conservative Center for Immigration Studies in Washington, D.C. "On a policy issue like immigration, there is a lot of diversity of views.... The group does not speak with one voice on this issue."

How To Keep America Competitive (WP)

By Bill Gates

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

For centuries people assumed that economic growth resulted from the interplay between capital and labor. Today we know that these elements are outweighed by a single critical factor: innovation.

Innovation is the source of U.S. economic leadership and the foundation for our competitiveness in the global economy. Government investment in research, strong intellectual property laws and efficient capital markets are among the reasons that America has for decades been best at transforming new ideas into successful businesses.

The most important factor is our workforce. Scientists and engineers trained in U.S. universities -- the world's best -- have pioneered key technologies such as the microprocessor, creating industries and generating millions of high-paying jobs.

But our status as the world's center for new ideas cannot be taken for granted. Other governments are waking up to the vital role innovation plays in competitiveness.

This is not to say that the growing economic importance of countries such as China and India is bad. On the contrary, the world benefits as more people acquire the skills needed to foster innovation. But if we are to remain competitive, we need a workforce that consists of the world's brightest minds.

Two steps are critical. First, we must demand strong schools so that young Americans enter the workforce with the math, science and problem-solving skills they need to succeed in the knowledge economy. We must also make it easier for foreign-born scientists and engineers to work for U.S. companies.

Education has always been the gateway to a better life in this country, and our primary and secondary schools were long considered the world's best. But on an international math test in 2003, U.S. high school students ranked 24th out of 29 industrialized nations surveyed.

Our schools can do better. Last year, I visited High Tech High in San Diego; it's an amazing school where educators have augmented traditional teaching methods with a rigorous, project-centered curriculum. Students there know they're expected to go on to college. This combination is working: 100 percent of High Tech High graduates are accepted into college, and 29 percent major in math or science. Contrast that with the national average of 17 percent.

To remain competitive in the global economy, we must build on the success of such schools and commit to an ambitious national agenda for education. Government and businesses can both play a role. Companies must advocate for strong education policies and work with schools to foster interest in science and mathematics and to provide an education that is relevant to the needs of business. Government must work with educators to reform schools and improve educational excellence.

American competitiveness also requires immigration reforms that reflect the importance of highly skilled foreign-born employees. Demand for specialized technical skills has long exceeded the supply of native-born workers with advanced degrees, and scientists and engineers from other countries fill this gap.

This issue has reached a crisis point. Computer science employment is growing by nearly 100,000 jobs annually. But at the same time studies show that there is a dramatic decline in the number of students graduating with computer science degrees.

The United States provides 65,000 temporary H-1B visas each year to make up this shortfall -- not nearly enough to fill open technical positions.

Permanent residency regulations compound this problem. Temporary employees wait five years or longer for a green card. During that time they can't change jobs, which limits their opportunities to contribute to their employer's success and overall economic growth.

Last year, reform on this issue stalled as Congress struggled to address border security and undocumented immigration. As lawmakers grapple with those important issues once again, I urge them to support changes to the H-1B visa program that allow American businesses to hire foreign-born scientists and engineers when they can't find the homegrown talent they need. This program has strong wage protections for U.S. workers: Like other companies, Microsoft pays H-1B and U.S. employees the same high levels -- levels that exceed the government's prevailing wage.

Reforming the green card program to make it easier to retain highly skilled professionals is also necessary. These employees are vital to U.S. competitiveness, and we should welcome their contribution to U.S. economic growth.

We should also encourage foreign students to stay here after they graduate. Half of this country's doctoral candidates in computer science come from abroad. It's not in our national interest to educate them here but send them home when they've completed their studies.

During the past 30 years, U.S. innovation has been the catalyst for the digital information revolution. If the United States is to remain a global economic leader, we must foster an environment that enables a new generation to dream up innovations, regardless of where they were born. Talent in this country is not the problem -- the issue is political will.

Christian Right Labors To Find '08 Candidate (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24 — A group of influential Christian conservatives and their allies emerged from a private meeting at a Florida resort this month dissatisfied with the Republican presidential field and uncertain where to turn.

The event was a meeting of the Council for National Policy, a secretive club whose few hundred members include Dr. James C. Dobson of Focus on the Family, the Rev. Jerry Falwell of Liberty University and Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform. Although little known outside the conservative movement, the council has become a pivotal stop for Republican presidential primary hopefuls, including George W. Bush on the eve of his 1999 primary campaign.

But in a stark shift from the group's influence under President Bush, the group risks relegation to the margins. Many of the conservatives who attended the event, held at the beginning of the month at the Ritz-Carlton on Amelia Island, Fla., said they were dismayed at the absence of a champion to carry their banner in the next election.

Many conservatives have already declared their hostility to Senator John McCain of Arizona, despite his efforts to make amends for having once denounced Christian conservative leaders as "agents of intolerance," and to former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York, because of his liberal views on abortion and gay rights and his three marriages.

Many were also suspicious of former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts; members have used the council as a conduit to distribute a dossier prepared by a Massachusetts conservative group about liberal elements of his record on abortion, stem cell research and gay rights. (Mr. Romney has worked to convince conservatives that his views have changed.)

And some members of the council have raised doubts about lesser known candidates — Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Representative Duncan Hunter of California, who were invited to Amelia Island to address an elite audience of about 60 of its members, and Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who spoke to the full council at its previous meeting, in October in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Although each of the three had supporters, many conservatives expressed concerns about whether any of the candidates could unify their movement or raise enough money to overtake the front-runners, several participants in the meetings said.

Finally, in a measure of their dissatisfaction, a delegation of prominent conservatives at Amelia Island tried to enlist as a candidate Gov. Mark Sanford of South Carolina, a guest speaker at the event. A charismatic politician with a clear conservative record, Mr. Sanford is almost unknown outside his home state and has done nothing to prepare for a presidential run. He firmly declined the group's entreaties, people involved in the recruiting effort said. A spokesman for Mr. Sanford said he would not comment.

"There is great anxiety," said Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation. "There is no outstanding conservative, and they are all looking for that."

Mr. Weyrich, a longtime member of the council, declined to discuss the group or its meetings. The council's bylaws forbid members from publicly disclosing its membership or activities, and participants agreed to discuss the Amelia Island meeting only on the condition of anonymity.

For eight years and four elections, President Bush forged a singular alliance with Christian conservatives — including dispatching administration officials and even cabinet members to address council meetings — that put them at the center of the Republican Party.

But in the aftermath of the stinging defeats in the midterm elections, and with discontent over the Iraq war weighing heavily on the public, some Christian conservatives worry that they may find themselves on the sidelines of the presidential race.

Both Mr. McCain and Mr. Romney have worked hard to pitch themselves to Christian conservatives — Mr. McCain by delivering speeches at venues like Mr. Falwell's Liberty University or a recent abstinence-promotion event, Mr. Romney by leading the charge for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. But neither has won over many of the movement's leaders.

The conservative concern may also be an ominous sign for the Republican Party about the morale of a core element of its political base. Conservatives warn that the 2008 election could shape up like 1996, when conservatives faced a lesser-of-two evils choice between a Republican they distrusted, former Senator Bob Dole, and a Democrat they disdained, President Bill Clinton. Dr. Dobson of Focus on the Family later said in a speech to the council that he voted for a conservative third-party candidate that year rather than pull a lever for Mr. Dole.

The Council for National Policy was founded 25 years ago by the Rev. Tim LaHaye as a forum for conservative Christians to strategize about turning the country to the right. Its secrecy was intended to insulate the group from what its members considered the liberal bias of the news media. In recent years the group has brought together a cross-section of the right from Edwin J. Feulner to Wayne LaPierre of the National Rifle Association.

In addition to doubts about their ability to generate enough money and momentum, each candidate who addressed the group also faces initial skepticism from one faction or another on issues like immigration, trade, taxes and foreign affairs.

"Right now there is still a vacuum among conservative Republicans," said Gary Bauer, a Christian conservative who was a Republican primary candidate in 2000. Conservatives, he said, "want a more provable conservative who also is demonstrating that they can put together the resources necessary to prevail." He declined to comment on the Amelia Island meeting.

A spokesman for Mr. Brownback said he would not comment on the senator's presentation to the council, citing its rules about strict confidentiality. Several others who attended his speech said he received heavy applause for his emphasis on restricting abortion and amending the Constitution to ban same-sex marriage. But foes of illegal immigration objected to his support for a temporary guest worker program, and some faulted him for touching only briefly on the threat of Islamic terrorists, an increasingly central focus of the council and many social conservative groups since the Sept. 11 attacks.

(People who attended the Amelia Island event said Rick Santorum, the former senator from Pennsylvania, delivered a well-received address to the council about what he called the gathering threat of radical Islam.)

In an interview, Mr. Hunter, the ranking Republican on the House Armed Services Committee and a supporter of Mr. Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, said the need for a strong national defense was the centerpiece of his speech. That defense, he argued, should include cracking down on illegal immigration, building a wall along the Mexican border and renegotiating foreign trade deals to protect American manufacturing. "We are losing the arsenal of the democracy," he said.

But several people at the council meeting said his stance on trade alienated the business wing of the Republican Party, compounding his substantial fund-raising challenges.

Mr. Huckabee, a Southern Baptist minister who was the head of the Arkansas Baptist convention before becoming governor, has the advantage of strong personal ties to many council members. Many prominent evangelical Christians consider him a friend, and he has appeared several times as a guest on Dr. Dobson's popular Christian radio program.

In an interview, Mr. Huckabee said he believed his roots in the evangelical world helped set him apart from his rivals. "I am not going to them," he said. "I am coming from them." He said he did not remember speaking about his opposition to abortion or same-sex marriage, "although I am sure that I must have." He said he emphasized education, among other issues, and talked about a continuing war "with a radical form of Islamic fascism," which he called "a bastardization of religion."

But many conservatives, including several participants in the Amelia Island meeting, said Mr. Huckabee faced resistance from the limited-government, antitax wing of their movement. Some antitax activists fault Mr. Huckabee for presiding over tax and spending increases. (He says the only tax increase resulted from a public referendum.)

In the interview, though, Mr. Huckabee said he was now leaning toward signing a pledge not to raise income taxes that is presented to all the candidates by Mr. Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform.

Mr. Norquist said he remained open to any of the three candidates who spoke to the council or to Mr. Romney. He argued that with the right promises, any of the four could redeem themselves in the eyes of the conservative movement despite their past records, just as some high school students take abstinence pledges even after having had sex.

"It's called secondary virginity," Mr. Norquist said. "It is a big movement in high school and also available for politicians."

Romney Misstates Past Bush View On Abortion (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 24, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney said this week that President Bush "was pro-choice before he became pro-life," an assertion the Romney campaign now acknowledges was inaccurate. The remark was based on a magazine article Romney had read, his campaign said.

The comment came as Romney struggled to explain to Republican presidential primary voters the evolution of his views on abortion since he described himself as "pro-choice" when he ran for U.S. Senate in Massachusetts in 1994. Now, Romney says on his campaign Web site: "I am pro-life. I believe that abortion is the wrong choice except in cases of incest, rape, and to save the life of the mother."

In interviews and speeches, Romney has said that his view changed after the question of stem-cell research came to the fore in the Massachusetts legislature in 2004. His advisers point out that he has not tried to have it both ways or weasel on his stance.

Romney made the comment about the president during a 15-minute interview on Thursday with the Spartanburg (S.C.) Herald-Journal. Here is the exchange, which was recorded and is posted on the Campaign 2008 blog on the newspaper's Web site:

Question: "Bloggers like to call it 'flip flopping,' the way you've changed your views on issues like abortion over the years. I've heard the story about stem cell research that caused you to change your mind on abortion and come to your current position. But will conservatives here buy that? Doesn't that give off the impression that you'll do whatever it takes to win?"

Romney: "Ronald Reagan was pro-choice, and became pro-life. I understand that George W. Bush was pro-choice before he came pro-life. Zell Miller was pro-choice before pro-life. And I was effectively pro-choice before I became pro-life. I don't think anyone questions the commitment on the part of those other gentlemen for pro-life principles. And, in my case, you don't have to take my word for it. You can look at my record as governor, because I made the move to pro-life some time ago. I've been governor. I've had several bills that came to my desk that raised the question of abortion or life, and I came down on the side of respecting the sanctity of human life every time."

The White House said Bush has always been "pro-life." During the presidential race of 2000, Dan Bartlett – then a spokesman for the Bush campaign, now the White House counselor – was asked about a quotation from a Texas newspaper in 1978 suggesting Bush's position had been unclear. Bartlett told The Washington Post: "The governor was pro-life before he ran for Congress, during his run for Congress and after he ran for Congress." A White House official said Friday that Bartlett's quote is still accurate today.

Romney's campaign said the comment was off the cuff and was based on a National Review article, which remained on Romney's Web site Saturday morning, asserting that "George W. Bush ran as a pro-choice politician in his 1978 congressional campaign."

Organizers for Romney have criticized Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of his opponents in the primary, for being insufficiently zealous in opposing abortion.

Romney has been working to retool his image on the issue since at least 2001, when he came to Salt Lake City as president of the organizing committee for the 2002 Winter Olympics. The Salt Lake Tribune reported in July 2001 that he wrote in a letter to the editor of the paper: "I do not wish to be labeled pro-choice. … I have never felt comfortable with the labels associated with the abortion issue. Because the Olympics is not about politics, I plan to keep my views on political issues to myself." Romney was objecting to an earlier article in the paper reporting that he might seek office in Utah after the games. It included the sentence: "Romney is pro-choice."

Romney Family Tree Has Polygamy Branch (AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, Glen Johnson

AP, February 24, 2007

While Mitt Romney condemns polygamy and its prior practice by his Mormon church, the Republican presidential candidate's great-grandfather had five wives and at least one of his great-great grandfathers had 12.

Polygamy was not just a historical footnote, but a prominent element in the family tree of the former Massachusetts governor now seeking to become the first Mormon president.

Romney's great-grandfather, Miles Park Romney, married his fifth wife in 1897. That was more than six years after Mormon leaders banned polygamy and more than three decades after a federal law barred the practice.

Romney's great-grandmother, Hannah Hood Hill, was the daughter of polygamists. She wrote vividly in her autobiography about how she "used to walk the floor and shed tears of sorrow" over her own husband's multiple marriages.

Romney's great-great grandfather, Parley Pratt, an apostle in the church, had 12 wives. In an 1852 sermon, Parley Pratt's brother and fellow apostle, Orson Pratt, became the first church official to publicly proclaim and defend polygamy as a direct revelation from God.

Romney's father, former Michigan Gov. George Romney, was born in Chihuahua, Mexico, where Mormons fled in the 1800s to escape religious persecution and U.S. laws forbidding polygamy. He and his family did not return to the United States until 1912, more than two decades after the church issued "The Manifesto" banning polygamy.

"When you read the family's history, you realize how important polygamy was to them," said Todd Compton, a Mormon and independent historian who wrote a book about the polygamous life of the church's founder, Joseph Smith. "They left America and started again as pioneers, after they had done it over and over again previously."

B. Carmon Hardy, a polygamy expert and retired history professor at California State University-Fullerton, said polygamy was "a very important part of Miles Park Romney's family."

Hardy added: "Now, very gradually, as you moved farther away from it, it became less a part of it. But during the time of Miles Park Romney, it was an essential principle of the Romney family life."

Other Mormons have run for the White House, including Romney's father in 1968 and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, in 2000. But Mitt Romney's stature as a leading 2008 contender has renewed questions about his faith and its doctrines.

At the same time, polygamy remains a part of current events.

HBO is airing a television series, "Big Love," that features a man in Utah — where the Mormon church is based — with three wives. Self-proclaimed "Mormon fundamentalist" Warren Jeffs, formerly on the FBI's 10 most wanted list, is facing multiple felony charges for sex crimes related to underage marriages among members of his breakaway church's 10,000 members in Utah and Arizona, who openly practice polygamy.

DOJ_NMG_0136566

Romney has joked about polygamy, saying in various settings that to him, "marriage is between a man and a woman ... and a woman and a woman." But in serious moments he has called the practice "bizarre" and noted his church excommunicates those who engage in it.

An introductory film played at his fundraisers and campaign appearances features his wife, Ann, talking about their 37-year marriage. Romney himself notes they started as high school sweethearts.

This month, Ann Romney tried a different tack, taking a lighthearted jab at her husband's main Republican competitors, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, as she introduced Romney at a Missouri GOP dinner.

The biggest difference between her husband and the other candidates, Ann Romney said, is that "he's had only one wife."

McCain has been married twice; Giuliani three times.

The Romney campaign had no comment for this story.

Joseph Smith, who founded the Mormon church in 1830, quietly introduced polygamy. He believed it had roots in the Old Testament and was necessary to reach the highest salvation in heaven. Smith is believed to have had 33 wives.

Brigham Young expanded the practice after the church's migration from the Midwest to Utah, which began in 1846. He is said to have had 55 wives. Historical texts show Young also asked Orson Pratt to publicly proclaim the church's belief in polygamy in 1852.

In 1862, while Utah was a territory, President Abraham Lincoln signed the Morrill Anti-Bigamy Act, banning plural marriage. In 1882, Congress also passed the Edmunds Act, an anti-polygamy law. That was followed in 1887 by the Edmunds-Tucker Act, which disincorporated the church and threatened to seize its nonreligious real estate as part of the crackdown on polygamy.

In 1890, Mormon President Wilford Woodruff issued "The Manifesto," in which he declared the church no longer taught or permitted plural marriages.

Nonetheless, the law of polygamy — Smith's revelation that God authorized polygamy — remains in Article 132 of the church's Doctrine and Covenants. In addition, Mormon widowers who remarry today believe they will live in eternity with their multiple wives.

Mormon genealogical records, among the most detailed and complete of any religion, show that two of Mitt Romney's great-great grandfathers, Miles Romney and Parley Pratt, had 12 wives each.

Compton, the polygamy scholar, disputes that. He believes Miles Romney only had one wife because the records do not show the dates for his other 11 marriages or any offspring from them.

Miles Romney and his one clearly documented wife, Elizabeth Gaskell, had 10 children. Among them was Miles Park Romney, one of Mitt Romney's great-grandfathers.

Miles Park Romney had five wives. With his first wife, Hannah Hood Hill, he had 11 children. Among them was Gaskell Romney, Mitt Romney's paternal grandfather.

Hannah Hood Hill's autobiography offers an eyewitness account of the Romney family's polygamous past. Hardy, the Cal-State historian, found it amid research for his upcoming book, "Doing the Works of Abraham: Mormon Polygamy."

Hood Hill wrote of Miles Park Romney: "I felt that was more than I could endure, to have him divide his time and affections from me. I used to walk the floor and shed tears of sorrow. If anything will make a woman's heart ache, it is for her husband to take another wife. ... But I put my trust in my heavenly father, and prayed and pleaded with him to give me strength to bear this great trial."

Miles Park Romney's final marriage, to Emily Eyring Smith, came in 1897, more than six years after "The Manifesto."

Gaskell Romney, Mitt Romney's grandfather, was not a polygamist. He married Anna Amelia Pratt, the daughter of polygamists and the granddaughter of Parley Pratt, the apostle with 12 wives. Their marriage took place Feb. 20, 1895, in Dublan, Mexico.

Gaskell Romney had moved to Mexico with his parents in 1884 amid the proliferation of U.S. laws prohibiting "unlawful cohabitation." Anna Pratt was born in Utah, but had emigrated to Mexico and lived in one of nine Mormon colonies established over the border.

Gaskell Romney and Anna Pratt had seven children, including George Wilcken Romney, the former Michigan governor. He lived with his parents in Mexico until 1912, when the family returned to the United States.

George Romney married Lenore LaFount, who does not appear to have polygamy in her family tree. The couple, now deceased, had four children, including Mitt Romney.

Clinton Fights To Keep Impeachment Taboo (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

After Spat, Campaigns Know to Expect Swift Reprisal for Any Hint of the Scandal

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has a new commandment for the 2008 presidential field: Thou shalt not mention anything related to the impeachment of her husband.

With a swift response to attacks from a former supporter last week, advisers to the New York Democrat offered a glimpse of their strategy for handling one of the most awkward chapters of her biography. They declared her husband's impeachment in 1998 -- or, more accurately, the embarrassing personal behavior that led to it -- taboo, putting her rivals on notice and all but daring other Democrats to mention the ordeal again.

"In the end, voters will decide what's off-limits, but I can't imagine that the public will reward the politics of personal destruction," senior Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Friday, when asked whether the impeachment is fair game for Clinton's opponents. Earlier in the week, Wolfson dismissed references to President Bill Clinton's conduct as "under the belt."

But the reality, of course, is that the impeachment was conducted very much in public.

As Clinton aides spent several days batting down insults made by David Geffen, the Hollywood mogul who raised questions about the former president's personal behavior and praised Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) in a provocative interview, the intra-party brawl suggested that the scandal remains something of a tripwire for Clinton.

Although she has spent the past seven years establishing her own identity as a public servant, Clinton has been embracing the more popular aspects of her husband's presidency more widely as she mounts her own campaign, with frequent references to their time together in the White House and their joint legacy.

And as she has invoked the good Bill Clinton, she has risked invoking the bad, several Democratic strategists said.

"She's using him in this campaign, so why can't somebody else use him?" asked a veteran of Democratic presidential politics who is not currently aligned with a candidate but who, like numerous other Democrats, spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of angering the Clintons. "She's just made him fair game. He's part of her strategy, so why can't he be part of one of her opponents'?"

The turmoil of the later Clinton years has been a theme of national politics since it occurred: George W. Bush ran in 2000 on a promise to "restore honor and dignity to the Oval Office," while Vice President Al Gore campaigned as a solid family man, distancing himself from the impeachment ordeal.

For the 2008 campaign, it is an automatic subtext of the Obama candidacy. Presenting himself as a relative political newcomer untainted by the warfare that culminated in Clinton's impeachment, Obama in his most recent book, "The Audacity of Hope," described the battles of the 1990s as "the psychodrama of the Baby Boom generation." Without specifically mentioning the Monica Lewinsky scandal in an interview last October, Obama praised Bill Clinton for bridging party divides on certain issues but said the former president was in other ways "trapped by his own biography."

Still, the entire episode had been largely airbrushed from the public Democratic dialogue about the 1990s -- particularly Hillary Clinton's -- until last week.

And Clinton advisers express confidence that any explicit attempt to revive the scandal would instantly backfire, particularly among Democratic primary voters who were outraged by the Republican investigation into her husband when it first occurred. (One Clinton official said donations to her campaign spiked when the Geffen interview was published.) The former first lady's popularity ratings have never been higher than when her husband's affair with a young intern burst into the open and cast her in the role of victim. After a successful Senate bid, she became a colleague, and even an ally, with some of the Republicans who had sought to unseat her husband -- seemingly putting the whole thing to rest.

But the issue has lingered at the edges of the nomination battle, starting with Clinton's quip about her experience with "evil and bad men" at a forum last month in Iowa on her debut trip to the early-caucus state. While many in the audience assumed she was referring to her husband, several Clinton advisers said it was more likely a dig at Kenneth W. Starr, the independent counsel in the inquiry into Bill Clinton, or Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who as House speaker vigorously pursued impeachment -- in either case still a reference to that rancorous time.

In his interview with Maureen Dowd of the New York Times, Geffen, a onetime Clinton fundraiser, gave voice to fears privately held by some Democrats that Republicans intend to revisit past Clinton issues and try to dig up new ones.

"I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Geffen said. Speaking of Republicans' view of the former first lady, he said: "I think they believe she's the easiest to defeat."

Geffen also attacked Hillary Clinton on other fronts, including her vote to authorize the war in Iraq and subsequent refusal to apologize for it, and he described the Clintons as deceitful.

The Clinton campaign's response was fast and unyielding: Advisers issued a statement demanding that Obama renounce his ties to Geffen, who had just thrown the Illinois senator a $1.3 million fundraiser. When Obama refused, and an Obama spokesman issued a statement pointing out that Geffen had once been the Clintons' guest in the Lincoln Bedroom of the White House, Clinton officials pushed back once more. They accused Obama of failing to live by the principles of positive campaigning he proclaimed. Obama later said he had not authorized his campaign's statement.

Advisers to both Clinton and Obama spent the latter part of last week deconstructing the tussle; each camp publicly argued that its candidate had won the round and that the other side had suffered.

But privately, both sides admitted to "learning lessons" from the brawl. One Clinton adviser said that some outside supporters had expressed misgivings about helping to keep the story alive, even though the senator and her inner circle of aides signed off on a forceful response from the start. On the Obama side, advisers expressed regret for running with a response from which the candidate later distanced himself.

Supporters of both Obama and Clinton indicated that they had little appetite for keeping the debate alive.

Greg Craig, a prominent Washington lawyer who represented Clinton during the Senate's inquiry and is now supporting Obama, declined to echo Geffen's concerns about the Clintons as a reason for his defection.

"You're not going to get me to talk about Hillary in any kind of negative way -- I know that's the topic of the day," Craig said in an interview last week. "I think Obama is uniquely qualified by temperament and experience, as well as by judgment, to lead the country and to bring us together."

Former senator Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.), who was minority leader in 1999 when Clinton was acquitted in that chamber, also endorsed Obama, in an announcement last week. But Daschle, too, limited himself to a citation of Obama's credentials in explaining his decision, comparing Obama to the Kennedys of the 1960s and saying in an interview that he hoped to have found a "new leader that will have that kind of effect on young people."

And on the Clinton side, one adviser expressed confidence that "attacking Bill Clinton is a losing strategy," borrowing a phrase from the 1990s. The adviser noted that Clinton remains highly popular among Democratic activists. Close supporter James Carville said that mentioning the impeachment would be tantamount to political suicide. "Nothing is off-limits, but it would be awfully stupid," Carville said. "What do you think attitudes among Democrats are about impeachment and Ken Starr? This is not a Washington dinner party here. This is an election, a nominating process, among Democrats."

Beware The Dreaded 'Clinton Machine' (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

IT IS AN odd article of faith among conservatives that Hillary Clinton is a sure-fire lock to win the Democratic presidential nomination. You can hardly turn on Fox News without hearing some pundit assure viewers that Clinton is the runaway favorite. But this belief says more about them than it does about her. The belief in her invincibility is a product of their deepest fears.

After all, it's not as though conservatives think that Clinton is a brilliant, natural politician. Nobody does — as a backslapper and as a public speaker, she's decidedly average. When they try to talk about why Clinton inevitably will roll over her primary competition, they usually invoke the dreaded "Clinton machine." A recent Wall Street Journal editorial, for instance, asserted that Clinton is the clear favorite but offered little evidence to support this other than the existence of "those Clinton legions — of fundraisers, union chiefs, party bosses, think tank operatives, media consultants."

Conservatives rarely make clear exactly how this dreaded machine is supposed to mow down the competition. Other candidates have fundraisers, union supporters, media consultants and the like.

Is the idea that Clinton's team is so battle-tested from her husband's presidency that it knows how to play the game far better than the competition? It's a plausible theory, but so far it doesn't seem to be working out that way.

A week ago, South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford, a Clinton supporter, declared that having a black man at the top of the Democratic Party would doom the entire ticket. That, of course, was just the thing Barack Obama wanted — a chance to stand up for the right of African Americans to run for president. "When folks were saying, 'We're going to march for our freedom,' they said, 'You can't do that,' " he said in his next speech. "When somebody said, 'You can't sit at the lunch counter…. You can't do that.' " It was the highlight of Obama's speech, all thanks to a blundering attack by a Clinton surrogate.

Then there is the continuing controversy surrounding Clinton's 2002 vote to authorize the Iraq war. Clinton's advisors have apparently decided that she will never apologize for the vote, as doing so would make her look weak in the general election. Which may be true, except that her war vote is hounding her everywhere she goes, the first primaries are nearly a year away and the war keeps getting worse.

So Clinton looks extremely vulnerable. Why do so many conservatives insist that she's a lock to get the nomination?

A few of them have a strong vested interest in the Hillary Clinton boogeyman. There's an enormous amount of money to be made in scaring the pants off of conservatives about Clinton. Last year, conservative pundit John Podhoretz published the fear-mongering screed "Can She Be Stopped?" "Hillary Rodham Clinton will become the next president of the United States unless you Republicans can find a way to stop her," he warned. I'm guessing the way of stopping her involved, among other things, buying Podhoretz's book.

The bigger factor, I think, is that conservatives are spooked by the Clintons. They had Bill Clinton on the ropes when they took control of Congress after the 1994 elections. He beat back their revolution. They had him again a few years later when they caught him with his pants down and made his misbehavior a theme of the 1998 midterm elections. Instead, Democrats won seats.

In the Republican mind, there must have been some sort of Clinton voodoo at work. The public was on their side, they believe, yet through some sort of nefarious dark political art, he turned the tables on them.

The conservative hatred of the Clintons has always had around the edges a certain fear of the supernatural. A famous 1993 American Spectator cover story depicted Hillary Clinton as a witch. A witch is an object of hatred, of course, but also a creature with dark and frightening powers.

In reality, the public never really was on the Republicans' side. Yes, they gave them control of Congress in 1994, but a majority of Americans opposed the deep cuts in popular social programs that the GOP agenda required. And yes, the public was disgusted by Bill Clinton's adultery, but a majority likewise opposed impeachment all along. Stopping these wildly unpopular things didn't require magic or even a fearsome political machine.

And Then There Was One (WP)

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

More presidential candidates agree to reveal their big fundraisers. Still missing: Sen. Clinton.

THIS COULD be the first presidential campaign since Watergate to be financed entirely with private funds. The two major--party nominees alone may raise and spend $1 billion combined. Under these circumstances, the inadequacy of campaign finance disclosure rules becomes even more glaring.

While campaigns are required to report the names of individuals who contribute the maximum $2,300, they don't have to provide the really important information: Who are the well-connected fundraisers helping them bring in big bundles of cash? That's why we've been suggesting that the presidential candidates should release voluntarily the identities of their big bundlers and, within some range, the amounts they raised. In the past few days, two leading contenders, Democrat John Edwards and Republican Rudolph W. Giuliani, agreed to provide such disclosure. They join Democrat Barack Obama and Republicans John McCain and Mitt Romney, who had already made that promise.

You may have noticed one prominent figure absent from this picture: Hillary Rodham Clinton. Ms. Clinton, who raised almost $40 million for her Senate reelection campaign, has assembled a formidable fundraising machine. Her campaign is tasking its biggest bundlers with bringing in $1 million or more. Her campaign solicits "Hillraisers" to enlist online and set their own fundraising goals. In other words, the campaign is fully aware of how much individual fundraisers collect on its behalf. But voters remain in the dark about the identities of those to whom candidate Clinton -- or President Clinton -- might be beholden.

To ask for this information is not to suggest malfeasance or corruption on the part of Ms. Clinton's campaign or any other. It is simply to reassert the fundamental premise of campaign finance disclosure: that it is essential to a healthy, transparent system to know the identities of those underwriting political candidates. No one would accept a system in which donors could secretly write $1 million checks to candidates. No one should accept a system in which fundraisers can secretly send candidates $1 million they've collected in other people's checks.

During the 2000 campaign, when George W. Bush developed what seemed at the time like an audacious system of fundraisers known as Pioneers, who collected at least $100,000, his campaign balked for a time at releasing the names, then agreed to disclose them. This is one area in which Ms. Clinton would be wise to follow the model of the president she hopes to succeed.

Edwards Draws Packed House In Salem (NHUL)

By Jim Devine

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 25, 2007

SALEM – More than a hundred supporters packed the home and living room of a Corinthian Drive home yesterday to pose questions and hear more about John Edwards' Presidential primary run.

Edwards described his plan for universal health care as a solution to make health care spending more effective in the country while making it available for all Americans by repealing Bush tax cuts made for Americans earning more than $200,000 a year.

DOJ_NMG_0136570

"Universal health care is not cheap," Edwards said. "I'm not saying it isn't. But I think it's critical for America to remain strong in the long run."

Edwards said his plan would cover preventative care, chronic care and long-term care while driving down administrative costs that account for 40 cents on every dollar spent on health care in America.

Joan Crimlisk of Derry said she was familiar with Edwards from his 2004 run but his plan for health care reform has attracted her attention as she's begun looking at different candidates trying to make themselves known in the Granite State.

"I'm interested in how he defines universal health care," she said. "I'm more interested in him this time around."

Fielding questions in a living room packed with curious citizens as well as ardent supporters, Edwards told voters the one thing they can expect from him would be firm positions in areas of health care reform, renewable energy sources and the country's Iraq policy.

"There will not be a voter in America that doesn't know where I stand on anything," Edwards said while answering a question on how his campaign will differ from the Kerry-Edwards campaign of 2004.

"They will know exactly what I think we should do in Iraq ... They will know exactly what I think America needs to do to re-establish itself as a force of good in the world," Edwards said.

Mark Brockmeyer of Windham said the defined message speaks volumes over other candidates in the race.

"He's got definitive positions. That's refreshing," Brockmeyer said.

Although he still had open questions of Edwards' future tax policies and how he'll manage to push major issues like universal health care and energy reform through a Senate with at least 40 Republicans, Brockmeyer said Edwards' driven and defined platform is an attractive feature as a candidate.

Edwards Pushes Universal Health-care Plan (NTEL)

By Kevin Landrigan

Nashua Telegraph, February 25, 2007

NASHUA – Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards fired back at primary rival Hillary Clinton, who questions the need for raising federal income taxes to pay for universal health care.

Edwards is the only major candidate to present a comprehensive plan that requires employers to offer coverage or pay into an insurance fund. Government-run health-care markets would guarantee coverage to individuals who can't afford private insurance.

He didn't mention the New York senator by name, but his remarks followed those of Clinton, who recently said Americans already spend 16 cents of every dollar on health care and that more revenue may not be necessary.

"If somebody comes in here and says they are going to give universal health care and it's not going to cost anything, they may have a bridge in Brooklyn they want to sell you,'' Edwards said during a house party at the home of Nashua Democratic Sen. David Gottesman and his wife, Jean.

Edwards would repeal the Bush tax cuts for those making more than $200,000 a year to finance his proposal, which economists say would cost up to $120 billion a year.

"I have worked on this for a long time," Edwards said. "You cannot do universal health care and not have it cost money. It can't be done. It will cost money. It has to come from somewhere.''

Edwards later told reporters the only other option is putting the nation deeper into deficit, and he said he isn't willing to do that.

Clinton said while campaigning two weeks ago she's listening to ideas on how best to extend health coverage to the 47 million Americans who lack it.

"I find it hard to believe we can't use the money we already spend to insure everybody,'' Clinton said at a town hall-style forum in Berlin. "Yet everybody comes out with these plans and say we need more money to pay for it.

"I am not ready to concede that.''

During an interview Saturday, Edwards said Americans want to begin leaving war-torn Iraq and Congress must aggressively use its power of the purse to bring that about.

"They want us to start leaving Iraq,'' Edwards said. "There are probably differences in views in America about how we do it, what period of time, but I think it's clear Americans want us to start leaving Iraq.

"It actually is the best policy.''

Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, urges Congress to cap funding of U.S. troops in Iraq at 100,000, which would force the removal of up to 50,000 soldiers.

Complete withdrawal of all troops in Iraq could occur in a year, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0136571

"I would use all the constitutional power that Congress has; no more non-binding resolutions, no more speeches, no more debate," Edwards said.

"Let's stop this president from making an number of horrible mistakes."

Edwards finished fourth in the 2004 presidential primary in New Hampshire and later became nominee John Kerry's running mate.

The candidate's wife, Elizabeth, made a surprise appearance Saturday. Days after the 2004 race ended, she was diagnosed with breast cancer.

"These conversations over the next 11 months are going to be really important," Elizabeth Edwards told the group.

Gottesman and fellow Nashua Democratic Sen. Joseph Foster were with Edwards in 2004 and are sticking with him.

"You see, I'm not shopping," Gottesman said. "I am committed to a mission to make this man the next president of the United States."

Edwards became the third major Democratic candidate to begin house-party campaigning in the first-in-the-nation-primary state.

Clinton hosted two in Nashua and Manchester, and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama followed the next day with one in Nashua.

Battling a stubborn cold, Edwards, 53, weathered parties at the homes of lawyers in Nashua, Concord and Salem.

An hour before Edwards arrived, the Gottesman home on Indian Rock Road was crammed with more than 100 people.

Edwards dodged television cameras and endured a few ill-timed, cell-phone calls in between answering six questions on the war in Iraq, health care, energy, the federal budget, aid for the homeless and U.S. policy toward Iran.

"What I like best about that phone call is it was timed perfectly with what my health care was going to cost," Edwards joked.

Under the Edwards plan, individuals would have the choice of taking the employer's coverage or the government-managed care.

Taxpayer subsidies would support health coverage for families making up to $100,000 a year.

He would mandate lower administrative costs and greater use of technology, including medical billing.

Edwards said all plans would include preventive, catastrophic and long-term health-care coverage to include parity for mental and physical conditions, dental and eye-care benefits.

Edwards kept up a whirlwind pace of campaigning, and at the Nashua home, he struggled to remember where he had been while speaking to a cleaning woman who lived in a homeless shelter.

"This is embarrassing," Edwards said. "I've been to too many places. I'm sorry."

A few moments later, Edwards came up with the locale himself.

"Nashville, Tennessee," he said, laughing.

Oscar Hopeful May Be America's Coolest Ex-Vice President Ever

LOS ANGELES -- In the annals of vice presidential history, tonight will be something different. In his black tux, the man known to his most fervent fans as "The Goracle" will arrive by hybrid eco-limo and, surrounded by fellow Hollywood greenies Cameron Diaz and Leonardo DiCaprio, will stroll down the red carpet at the Academy Awards to answer the immortal question: "Al, who are you wearing?"

What a year it has been for Al Gore and his little indie film.

"An Inconvenient Truth," the 100-minute movie that is essentially Gore giving a slide show about global warming, is the third-highest-grossing documentary ever, with a worldwide box office of $45 million, right behind blockbusters "Fahrenheit 9/11" and "March of the Penguins."

"AIT," as Team Gore calls it, is also the hot pick tonight for Best Documentary, and if its director, Davis Guggenheim, wins an Oscar, he plans to bring Gore along with him to the stage to accept the golden statuette and perhaps say a few words about . . . interstitial glacial melting? (More likely, Gore will deliver a favorite line about "political will being a renewable resource.")

In the year since his film premiered at the Sundance Film Festival, to a standing ovation, Gore has gone from failed presidential contender -- and a politician who at times gave new meaning to the word cardboard -- to the most unlikely of global celebrities.

Incredible as it may seem, Al Gore is not only totally carbon neutral, but geek-chic cool. No velvet rope can stop him. He rolls with Diddy. He is on first-name basis, for real, with Ludacris. But what does this mean? And how did it happen? Did Gore change? Or did the climate -- political, cultural, natural -- change around him?

DOJ_NMG_0136572

In an e-mail exchange with The Goracle himself, "AG" typed to The Washington Post that the Oscar craziness and pageantry of the film premieres has been fun (his word) "but I'm old enough to know that a red carpet is just a rug, so I've been able to enjoy that part of it without losing perspective."

Just a rug, people. Because, Gore continued (this was on Friday during a break from his tux fitting): "Actually, for me, the most moving moments have been in conversations with people who have told me that the movie had a big impact on the way they think and feel about our moral responsibility to protect the Earth."

"He is more popular now than he ever was in office, and he knows it," says Laurie David, one of the producers of "Inconvenient Truth" and a Hollywood environmental activist (and wife of "Seinfeld" co-creator Larry David) who has traveled around the world promoting the film with Gore. "He's a superhero now."

Before the film? He was more Willy Loman than Green Avenger. After his loss in 2000, a battered Gore began to schlep around the country, often solo, flying coach, giving his ever-evolving slide show about climate change, a threat that Gore, now 58, says he has felt strongly about since his Harvard days.

After the film? Says director Guggenheim, "Everywhere I go with him, they treat him like a rock star."

Guggenheim is not being hyperbolic. Take the Cannes Film Festival: Al Gore was mobbed. By French people. He was a presenter at the Grammy Awards, alongside Queen Latifah, where he got one of the biggest welcomes of the night. "Wow. . . . I think they love you, man. You hear that?" the current Queen asked the former veep. Earlier this month, the ticket Web site at the University of Toronto crashed when 23,000 people signed on in three minutes to get a seat to hear Gore do his thing on the oceanic carbon cycle. At Boise State, Gore and his slide show sold out 10,000 seats at the Taco Bell Arena, reportedly "faster than Elton John."

Remember that this is the same Al Gore who even today interrupts himself to explain that while he supports the use of ethanol to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, please, he is not talking about regular ethanol; he is talking about "cellulosic ethanol" (made from wood chips rather than cornstarch).

Also remember that "An Inconvenient Truth" was not on anybody's short list for theatrical release, let alone an Oscar. "I think I was the only person crazy enough to want it," says John Lesher, president of Paramount Vantage, which purchased the film at Sundance. "Everybody else had already passed on it, to be honest, but I thought if we do our job right, this could be a zeitgeist moment."

The film distributor's greatest challenge? "To convince people that it wasn't going to be boring," he says. "We didn't want to sell spinach." His greatest asset? "Al Gore. There was no hiding him."

Lesher explains that, from a marketing and branding perspective, Gore was lugging some very heavy baggage. "Democrats felt disappointed in him, and Republicans didn't like him," he says. "But it worked." How come? What comes through in the film, Lesher says, "is here is this person who has gone through this incredible adversity" -- Florida recount, Supreme Court decision, bye-bye White House -- "and this is what he decides to do," the one-man slide show, "and so you see this massive integrity."

And nobody worked for the film harder than Al Gore, Lesher says: "He was an amazing collaborator, and unlike everyone else in Hollywood, he did everything he said he would do, which is unique in my experience."

Gore worked the premieres in Edinburgh, Helsinki, Oslo, Stockholm, Sydney, Hong Kong, Amsterdam, Zurich, Brussels, Berlin and Tokyo. In France, he not only attended the film opening, but presented his 90-minute Apple Keynote lecture to the National Assembly. He did the slide show at the United Nations, the American Geophysical Union, and before conservative activist Grover Norquist's regular Wednesday meeting.

"I am trying to reach out to people in every effective way that I can find," Gore wrote in his e-mail. "In the process, I have had the chance to work with really interesting people from all walks of life." Meaning: eggheads and rappers, movie moguls and prime ministers, and, recently, Bon Jovi. "So, pop culture is an important part of the message delivery system, but far from the only part."

Gore's book, based on the film, has sold 850,000 copies worldwide and translation rights for 24 languages. In Spain, Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero told Gore that the DVDs of the film would be shown in the public schools, following similar proclamations in Scotland and Norway. And speaking of Norway, earlier this month Gore was nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize for his work to alert the world to the dangers of climate change.

"People ask him all the time what does he attribute his recent success to and Gore tells them 'reality,' " says Larry Schweiger, a friend and president of the National Wildlife Federation, who is a leader of Gore's Alliance for Climate Protection, a foundation that seeks to bring evangelicals, hunters, farmers and entrepreneurs to the cause. "They used to ridicule him. They called him a tree-hugger. They don't do that anymore."

Guggenheim explains: "People say to me that Al Gore is so different now. Why wasn't he like this when he ran for president?" Meaning that Gore now appears relaxed, confident, happy, and not stiff, robotic, pinched. "They say Al has changed. But I don't think so. We've changed. The setting has changed. He's the same. When you're running for office, you're a target every moment you are in front of the camera. Now, he's in a different place and we see him in a different way."

There might be something to this. Earlier this month in Los Angeles, accompanied by booming house techno bass beat, Gore announced his plan for a global "Live Earth" day of mega-concerts this summer, to be held simultaneously on all seven continents, with 100 of the world's most popular musical acts -- Snoop Dogg, Kelly Clarkson, Bon Jovi, Korn -- to promote awareness about climate change. Gore was surrounded by a grinning Cameron Diaz (she hugged him) and a nodding Pharrell Williams, the rap-producing impresario, and though Gore perhaps went on for a few paragraphs too long about how many tons of carbon a day are entering the oceans, the riser of international press and paparazzi were clearly gorging on the glamorama. Gore was his usual earnest self. A nerd? Maybe, but he was the nerd with Cameron and Pharrell, talking about the carbon cycle and the Red Hot Chili Peppers. It was the mixology -- high-wattage celebrity and energy-efficient light bulbs -- that helps the medicine go down.

"Is being president better than this?" muses Simon Rosenberg, head of the New Democratic Network. "I think what Gore's figured out how to do is something that a lot of people want to do. He's living a life of great freedom and pursuing his interests, and he's having an impact on public policy. He's been able to start a bunch of companies and do the movie and he's got this great life right now."

"I agree" Gore typed, "that the Zeitgeist has begun to change. I think it reflects the increased popular will to confront and solve this crisis. It's an extraordinary experience to see this issue -- which the conventional wisdom used to say was politically marginal -- become central for so many people. As it should. I also think that people see candidates through a different lens, and that is a factor. But I also think there is at least a grain of truth to the old cliche that 'what doesn't kill you makes you stronger.' So maybe I've gotten a little stronger in the last six or seven years."

Gore is escaping the fate of most former politicians, says Matt Bennett, a consultant for Democrats who worked closely with Gore during his vice presidency. "Usually defeated -- or allegedly defeated -- party nominees become pariahs. Look at Mike Dukakis or John Kerry. Or they just go out to pasture like Bob Dole. Gore has pulled off a feat unknown in modern times, which is to completely rehabilitate his image in the public mind very quickly."

Bennett credits savvy handling by people around Gore, including the documentary-makers. And he says the world is catching up with Gore. "Look, this guy was a visionary. He was right about everything, even the stuff he was ridiculed for," Bennett says. "He was right about the Internet, he was right about the first Gulf War, he was sure as hell right about the Iraq war. And he was right about global warming."

At the "Live Earth" press conference, Gore once again affirmed that he is not planning to enter the 2008 presidential fray, though this has not stopped the lefty blogosphere from imagining the jaw-dropping holy cow if The Goracle announces his run on Oscar night. That, say Gore's most intimate insiders, is most definitely not going to happen.

As for whom Gore will be wearing, his people reveal: It'll be Ralph Lauren.

For Gore, Acceptance Speech 101: Keep 'Em Laughing (POL)

By Helena Andrews

The Politico, February 24, 2007

Former Vice President Al Gore just might win an Oscar Sunday for his documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth." If he does, that means an acceptance speech – and let's face it, Gore's no Billy Crystal.

So before Al uncrumples and reads from a dinner napkin outlining a dissertation on climate change, a few of Washington's funniest phrase-turners offer this prudent advice:

Keep it short, keep it light and keep 'em laughing.

Given the enormous spotlight, Gore could have more at stake than just bombing before the crowd of Prius-driving, energy-saving-bulb-using, Versace-swathed starlets in Hollywood.

After all, he hasn't completely ruled out a 2008 presidential run.

So The Politico polled several of Washington's best-known wordsmiths to ask what Gore should say in an acceptance speech.

For openers, how about: "It's nice to be handed a statue that's as animated as I am," suggested Amy Kramer, a freelance Democratic writer.

Or: "I'm just grateful they didn't recount the votes," emailed Ben Clarke, a writer for Republican political strategist Frank Luntz who was also on former majority leader Sen. Bill Frist's speech squad.

DOJ_NMG_0136574

The jokes about missing ballots didn't stop there.

"I'd like to thank everybody who voted for me. But I have one question: Where the hell were you people seven years ago?!" joked Michael Long, a director at the White House Writers Group, a Washington-based political strategy firm.

"Thank yous" are a prerequisite for any acceptance speech, especially at the granddaddy of them all, when everyone wants to claim 2.3 milliseconds of fame. But journalist Matt Labash of the conservative Weekly Standard put a new twist on the traditional acknowledgements.

"He should thank us, the polluters," wrote Labash in an email. "If I wasn't leaving my car on while running into Safeway, doing my small part to melt the polar icecaps, where is Al Gore?"

Mark Katz, the former commander of Bill Clinton's "comedy war room," wasn't too busy to offer instruction to his "old friend" Al.

He said that whatever happens on Sunday, Gore should build up to the following scene:

While holding his hard-won golden man overhead, Gore bellows, "So if James Baker wants to take this victory away from me, he will have to pry it from my COLD, DEAD HANDS!!"

Katz was referring, of course, to Baker's role in the 2000 presidential election recount in Florida, and actor and former NRA president Charlton Heston's defiant words to Gore about gun rights.)

Meanwhile, no one can resist the global warming jokes.

Radio producer Buckley Carlson sent The Politico this gem:

"Apologies for being late, Tipper and I were held hostage on a JetBlue flight out of Washington. A blizzard kept us on the tarmac for 18 hours. I'm telling you, this global warming stuff is really wreaking havoc on our transportation system."

Whether or not Gore will "get too political" on Sunday remains to be seen. But either way, he should avoid the embarrassing your-time-is-up violins and go the way of Jane Fonda.

As she told the Academy in 1972, "There's a great deal to say, but I'm not going to say it tonight."

Beware Of Celebrities Bearing Gifts (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

FOR presidential hopefuls, the Hollywood fund-raiser used to be as smooth as an A.T.M. withdrawal: duck in at night, after the East Coast news cycles have closed. Leave in the morning with a hefty check and the soft reflected glow of a few Oscar winners.

The events did not, typically, result in headlines about the "brawl," "throwdown," or "rumble in the Hollywood jungle" that greeted Barack Obama's first foray onto the scene last week.

You can't begrudge the movie-loving public a great story line. David Geffen, an entertainment industry billionaire power broker and onetime cheerleader for Bill Clinton, not only herds big Hollywood names to a hot-ticket fund-raiser for Mr. Obama, but insults Hillary Rodham Clinton and the former president on the eve of the party. And, as though they were obliging the celebrity tabloids, the Clinton and Obama campaigns jump in the mud right after him.

It was not a happy ending for anyone. Mr. Obama's reputation for being above politics was soiled. And Mrs. Clinton came off as quick to fight.

But, really, can anyone be surprised? Given the well-known potential downside, presidential candidates might be expected to treat Hollywood stars the way studios now treat Tom Cruise — with a bit more distance.

But for candidates, especially those competing for the Democratic nomination, Hollywood is too important to put at arm's length.

There is the deep pockets factor. But there is another key consideration: There is no better place than Hollywood to attain that magical aura of Superstardom. Hollywood money helps encourage other sources of money, which leads to bigger campaign chests, which leads to an aura that the candidate is invincible.

The only problem: keeping big, independent-minded personalities like Mr. Geffen from putting a rip in that superstar image.

Ten years ago, the Hollywood Women's Political Committee disbanded. The members said they were tired of being treated like cash machines and were enraged at how much money had corrupted the political process.

That group may be no more, but the Hollywood cash dance lives on. In fact, celebrities now pay political consultants to advise them on candidates.

In 2004, John Kerry took in $3.5 million from people identifying themselves as in television, movies or music, up from the $1 million that Al Gore took in when he was the Democratic nominee in 2000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. While

Republicans have traditionally done worse in Hollywood, President Bush also earned more from those donors in 2004 than he did in 2000 — $1.4 million up from about $830,000.

That money becomes a kind of early election return. “There are all sorts of invisible primaries going on here,” said Stuart Stevens, a Republican consultant working for John McCain who has also been a producer and writer for television. “One of them is for money, and one of them is for inevitability. Hillary Clinton wants to be inevitable.”

A high-profile fund-raising event for Mr. Obama seriously dents that aura of invincibility.

“This hurts her in the money primary and in the inevitability primary,” said Mr. Stevens of Mr. Obama’s reception. “The fact that they’re in love with her husband and not doing it for her is not a good sign. It gives other people permission to do the same — Wall Streeters, hedge-fund types. They figure, if the hip, cool people aren’t doing it, I don’t have to do it.”

Indeed, some believe the support for Senator Obama is probably not deep, wide or even informed.

“A lot of these Hollywood donors are measuring prospects for box office success, if you will,” said Eli Attie, a former chief speechwriter for Mr. Gore who was also a writer and producer on “The West Wing.” “It’s not that they know Obama’s record or know what he’d do as president or think he’d be better or smarter than Hillary Clinton. It’s more that he seems like he could be a tough contender. ”

Outside the Hollywood bubble, however, this conceit — that money and celebrity may be enough to crown The Nominee — can seem like, well, a conceit.

“The voters almost feel like they have a duty to reject that kind of endorsement,” said Art Torres, the chairman of the California Democratic Party and a former state senator. “They’re thinking, ‘What do I care what that movie star thinks?’ I’m going to make up my own mind.”

A CBS News poll taken this month before the Geffen remarks found the public evenly split on the question of whether celebrities should get involved in politics: 48 percent said they should stay out; 47 percent said they should get involved.

“One of the problems Democrats have had,” said Mr. Stevens, the Republican consultant, “is not being able to manage this.”

In 2004, the Democratic Party sent celebrities to swing states like Ohio to canvass voters. “People in Ohio, just like people in New Jersey, don’t want somebody from California to come tell them how to vote — ‘I’m here to save you,’ ” said Mr. Attie. “It has a negative missionary arrogance.”

Of course, some stars do add some measure of credibility. Celebrities like Tom Hanks and Denzel Washington are considered all-American enough to help any candidate.

Other stars realize that they have limitations.

“George Clooney, you don’t ever see him hit a wrong note,” Mr. Stevens says. “He understands he can help raise money, but he also understands there’s a line to cross where he’s not going to be telling people how to vote.”

Then again, some stars get involved unwillingly. Stephen Rivers, who has worked for politically active stars including Jane Fonda, recalled the 1988 Senate campaign in New Jersey, where the Republican, Pete Dawkins, was under fire for exaggerating his war record, and successfully changed the topic by invoking Ms. Fonda as the ultimate liberal antiwar bogeywoman. Mr. Dawkins’ campaign demanded that the Democrat, Frank Lautenberg, return $5,000 from a women’s group in Hollywood that the Republicans insisted was “controlled” by Ms. Fonda. Soon, Republicans warned, Mr. Lautenberg would be taking foreign policy advice from the woman whom some on the right deride as Hanoi Jane.

Not that it worked. Mr. Dawkins lost.

In any case, celebrities may not care much about their affect on a politician’s future. They may just want to act altruistically. Or, like so many donors everywhere, it might be all about them.

“People want to say, ‘Oh, just because they have all this money, who are they to act like they know what they’re talking about,’ ” said Ken Sunshine, a public relations consultant who has represented Ms. Streisand and Leonardo DiCaprio.

“But they have rights, like any citizen, to speak their minds.”

Hope Outrunning Experience In Primary Race (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — Michelle Obama bristled at charges that her husband was not experienced enough for the presidency.

"We've heard this spewed from the lips of rivals every phase of our journey: He is not experienced enough, he should wait his turn," she recently told supporters of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who at 45 is serving his first Senate term. Only political insiders, she said, would look at his life accomplishments "and dare to have the audacity to say he is not ready."

Experience — and how to measure it — has become one of the first big debating points of the 2008 presidential race.

In one of the curiosities of the Democratic primary, some of the candidates with the most experience in national politics are at the bottom of the early popularity surveys. By contrast, Obama, with a mere three years on the national stage, is this year's campaign-trail sensation.

And so Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut (with 33 years in the House and Senate) has been trying to heighten the importance of Washington knowledge, making a constant refrain of his claim that President Bush proves the dangers of on-the-job training in the White House. "I think people do care about experience," Dodd said.

Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico (15 years in the House, two years as U.N. ambassador, three years as energy secretary) touts his "unparalleled experience." And Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (35 years in the Senate) has said of his campaign rivals: "It's not so much whether I can compete with their money, but whether they can compete with my ideas and my experience."

Even former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who served a single term before opening a White House bid in 2004, has brought his twist to the issue. Asked at an event last month how he differed from Obama, Edwards said: "Experience. I've been through a presidential campaign."

Advocates for Obama, as for other candidates who are positioning themselves as outsiders to Washington's political culture, like to say that the range of their life experiences makes them more fit for office than those who have spent their careers in government. In Obama's case, that resume includes stints as a community organizer, law professor, civil rights attorney and eight-year member of the Illinois state Senate.

Obama's allies also assert that a wealth of government experience did not make Vice President Dick Cheney or former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld any wiser in confronting the nation's problems. And Obama launched his campaign from Springfield, Ill. — a city identified with Abraham Lincoln — perhaps to remind voters that one of the country's greatest presidents had little Washington experience before he reached the White House. (Lincoln had served one House term and 12 years in the Illinois Legislature.)

Among conservative voters, experience is prized. "Republicans generally believe, particularly conservatives, that we are electing a wartime president, so experience will be critical," said GOP political consultant Christopher Barron. "It's one of the reasons you continue to see someone like Rudy Giuliani over-performing among conservatives who disagree with him on a litany of social issues."

Giuliani, a former New York City mayor and federal prosecutor, built a national reputation as a steady leader after the Sept. 11 attacks. He leads in several early polls of Republican voters.

Democratic voters have been more willing to sacrifice experience for other qualities, such as a candidate's ability to inspire the public, some analysts say. "The essential tension in the race is between hope and experience," Jennifer Duffy of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report said of the Democratic primary campaign. "Every 25 years or so, we elect a president who gives us hope."

With the latest CBS News poll showing that only 26% of Americans think the country is moving in the right direction, Duffy said, this may be an election in which inspirational candidates triumph.

To some degree, history bears out the idea that too much Washington experience can harm a candidate's image. "The irony is that the longer you serve in the U.S. Congress, the lower odds are you can get elected president," said UCLA political scientist Mark A. Peterson. "Nobody since John F. Kennedy has gone from the legislative branch to the White House."

Members of Congress sometimes talk in an arcane language of amendments, earmarks and resolutions that makes them less than approachable to voters. Ross K. Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers, says Sen. John F. Kerry, who had represented Massachusetts for 20 years, lost his audience at a 2004 Democratic primary debate in the first moments when he trumpeted the fact that he had introduced an amendment to a Biden bill.

Still, some historians argue that prior Washington experience is helpful to a president, even though several who had limited contact with the federal bureaucracy did well.

"With Lincoln as the exception, what you find is that the experienced do perform better," said Bruce Schulman, a political historian at Boston University.

The willingness even to entertain selecting an outsider for the nation's highest office may be a trait that the United States shares with few other countries. "If you go to England or France or Germany, rarely is it conceivable to see heads of government and ministerial positions without extensive government experience," Peterson said. "This is deeply rooted in the nature of modern American politics."

"There's a schizophrenia of the American political mind," said Jamie McKown, political scientist at the College of the Atlantic in Bar Harbor, Maine. "We want to have a beer or a cup of coffee with the candidates, but if they can't point out Tajikistan on a map, we're suspicious. We want them to be everyday people and superhuman."

DOJ_NMG_0136577

Bill Clinton, a former governor and attorney general of Arkansas, won the White House in 1992 running against more-seasoned political resumes with his formidable communications skills — an ability to act both as just "one of the guys" and a policy-loving Rhodes scholar.

"Either you prove to be an effective or ineffective campaigner," Baker said. "That's the difference: the extent to which you can connect with voters."

Some think that Obama's fresh face will help him on that front.

"Most voters want something new," said Democratic consultant Donna Brazile, who managed then-Vice President Al Gore's presidential campaign in 2000. "They want less D.C. experience and more good values."

Governors See Influence Wane In Race For Presidency (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Despite Trend of Success, Not One Is a Front-Runner

In one of the fastest-starting presidential campaigns in history, one group of politicians has not kept pace: the nation's governors.

The most successful route to the White House in recent elections has run through the governors' mansions, but in the 2008 campaign, state chief executives are struggling to fight their way into the top tier of candidates in both the Republican and Democratic races.

This weekend, two events highlighted the lack of gubernatorial influence in the opening stages of the 2008 campaign. The first was Friday's announcement by former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack that he was dropping out of the Democratic race less than three months after formally launching his campaign.

The other was yesterday's opening of the winter meeting of the National Governors Association, where few attendees expressed any desire to get involved on behalf of a presidential candidate.

Pennsylvania Gov. Edward G. Rendell (D) said that because of the heavily front-loaded nomination calendar, he and others may have more to lose than gain by picking a candidate now.

"Why risk ticking off the eventual nominee when there's no value to it?" Rendell asked.

One Republican governor, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to talk more freely about the GOP race, said that in the absence of a strong front-runner in the traditional sense, any of the leading candidates could end up faltering, making an early endorsement far riskier than it was when Republican governors got behind the candidacy of George W. Bush in the 2000 campaign.

"They realize those guys running for president need you just as much in October as they need you now," he said. "So if you think this is a very fragile playing field, then it would be smart to wait."

Governors from states with early contests where endorsements might count heavily are, for now, staying neutral. Both Iowa Gov. Chet Culver (D) and New Hampshire Gov. John Lynch (D) plan to stay neutral at this point and are more focused on preserving their states' roles at the front of the process. They met yesterday to discuss the 2008 calendar, rather than the candidates.

The Democratic contest is now dominated by senators, with New York's Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois' Barack Obama the candidates drawing the most attention. Challenging them, particularly in several early states, is former North Carolina senator John Edwards. Two veteran senators, Delaware's Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Connecticut's Christopher J. Dodd, hope to capitalize if the front-runners stumble.

Just one governor is in the Democratic race: New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who is seen as a long-shot candidate despite one of the deepest resumes of anyone in the field.

Vilsack wasn't even the first former governor to fall out of the Democratic race. Last fall, after receiving a rush of attention as a potential contender but before he could even announce his candidacy, former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner said he was not interested in seeking the presidency in 2008.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh had planned to use his record as governor as a central selling point in his campaign. But the Democrat got out of the race last December, just a few weeks after establishing a presidential exploratory committee.

The Republican race has followed a similar path. The two leaders in the polls are Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, who passed up running for a second term to seek the presidency, is seen by some party insiders as the third candidate in the GOP top tier, but he is not well know nationally at this point.

The GOP field includes two other former governors. One is Wisconsin's Tommy G. Thompson, who was one of the most innovative state executives of the 1990s. The other is Mike Huckabee of Arkansas. Both face uphill bids.

Rendell said the absence of more strong governors in the two fields may be nothing more than an anomaly in this campaign cycle. If California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger were not constitutionally prohibited from running or if former Florida governor Jeb Bush had a name other than Bush, either would be considered a top-tier candidate in the GOP field, he said.

On the Democratic side, the governors of vote-rich New York and Ohio were only just sworn into office, and several potential candidates from other battleground states faced challenging reelection campaigns in 2006 and opted out of the presidential race. "You can't run for president and run for reelection," Rendell said. "You have to make the choice that Governor Romney made."

So far only a handful of governors have endorsed presidential candidates. McCain has the support of Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty and Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., while Romney has the support of Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt. No governor has announced support for Giuliani. Among Democrats, Obama has the support of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, while Clinton has not yet rolled out the endorsement of any Democratic governor.

Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer (D) is among those who are in no hurry to pick a candidate. "I like a lot of them," he said. "I like Bill Richardson a lot. Hillary's taking up the oxygen and a lot of the money in all the rooms. Barack could be the transformational leader that everybody's looking for. Maybe it's him. Edwards, he might be the one to come up through the middle. So give it a few months."

In Democratic Campaigns, Six Degrees Of Tom Daschle (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

The easygoing former Senate majority leader never seemed like a party boss. But lo and behold, Daschleites are everywhere. Former Daschle staffers or Daschle-era Senate leadership aides populate all the major Democratic presidential campaigns. A particular beneficiary: Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who won Daschle's endorsement last week. The South Dakota Democrat, defeated in 2004 by GOP Sen. John Thune, said Obama "personifies the future of Democratic leadership in our country."

Vilsack's Departure Makes Iowa Interesting

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack's decision to drop out of the presidential race late last week surprised many observers who expected him to stick it out at least through his home-state caucuses. Vilsack was always seen as a long shot for the Democratic nomination, but his departure still makes an impact on the field he leaves behind.

Here's a look at a few of the biggest winners and losers as a result of Vilsack's departure:

WINNERS

Iowa: With Vilsack out, there's no chance that the caucuses will be a repeat of 1992, when the presence of native son Tom Harkin turned the race into a non-entity. No candidate left in the field can excuse failing to make a splash in the Hawkeye State -- meaning what happens there now really matters.

Bill Richardson: Richardson is the only candidate left on the Democratic side with executive experience. There's a reason no senator has been directly elected to the White House since 1960. In that time, four governors have won the nation's highest office.

Chris Dodd: Dodd needed a break to make a real run at the nomination, and Vilsack's departure might just be it. The Connecticut senator should surprise some people with his cash haul at the end of the first quarter and is slowly but surely positioning himself to take advantage of a stumble by the front-runners.

Process: Vilsack dropped from the race 10 months before a single vote will be cast. His stated reason? Money. The public is largely unaware of the process of raising the cash and building a staff, but fundraising continues to matter more and more in weeding out the field.

LOSERS

Tom Vilsack: Insiders always wondered why Vilsack got into the race at all, and his decision to get out so quickly does little to enhance his chances at being picked for the national ticket. Remember, Vilsack was on the veep shortlist for Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) for 2004. Hard to see how he helped his chances at that slot for 2008.

Nevada: With Vilsack out of the race, second-tier candidates looking to make the big leap will probably devote most of their limited resources to making a move in Iowa. The Nevada caucuses, set for five days later, will be an afterthought.

Policy: Vilsack was a leading voice in the so-called "ideas primary," putting forward a series of detailed issue proposals including an overhaul of energy policy. It didn't save him.

Stuck In The Mud (WP)

By Frank Luntz

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

How Can the GOP Get Moving Again? Drop the Dirty Politics and Get Real.

"Don't be afraid to see what you see," Ronald Reagan once said.

Today, many of his disciples are choosing not to see the obvious. Republicans in Congress cannot regain their majority merely by relying on a coalition of traditional conservatives and evangelicals. They must reach out to what I call "the fed-ups" -- a large and growing constituency of independent voters who have held the balance of power in every election since 1992, and will hold it again in 2008.

It was only 14 years ago that nearly 20 million voters rejected both Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush in favor of H. Ross Perot, a little man with big ears and a big idea. Perot's principal claim on their allegiance in the presidential election of 1992 was his insistence that government should be competent, sensible and honest about its finances. His supporters were mad as hell and weren't going to take it anymore. Those voters -- 19 percent of the electorate -- demonstrated that there was a potent political movement of fed-up Americans.

Two years later, millions of Perot voters switched to the Republicans and helped them grab control of Congress. They stayed with the GOP for a decade because the party represented "good government." But red ink budgets, earmarked appropriations for bridges to nowhere, endless ethics scandals and a debacle of a war made them mad once again. In 2006 they deserted the GOP in droves and turned control of Congress back to the Democrats.

How incredible that the antidote to what ails the Republicans can be found in the words of a famous Democrat. In his tragic run for the presidency in 1968, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy said, "Some men see things as they are and say, 'Why?' I dream of things that never were and say, 'Why not?' " The magnificent poetry of that challenge -- to do more and to do better -- is at the core of who we are as a society, what we want for America and for ourselves. Here is the reason why the Republican Party has faded from relevance in the past two years.

Despite its many problems, the United States remains a nation of dreamers. The American psyche is genetically wired to see possibilities. Faith in the future is in our DNA. It's why we historically vote for the more positive, hopeful, upbeat candidates.

Yet my recent public opinion research has recorded unprecedented anxiety about the country's direction. Just 34 percent of the voting public believe that the America of tomorrow will be better than the America of today, while 57 percent think it will be worse.

This explains why so many people have lost patience with the current U.S. leadership. It is no wonder that 52 percent of voters in my election night survey said they were "mad as hell" about politics and politicians. Can you blame them? It doesn't matter whether you are a Republican or a Democrat, the outlook is grim: a war with no end in sight, rising costs of health care, borders that are poorly patrolled, schools that are failing, manufacturing that is disappearing, and a culture that is coarsening.

Congressional Republicans didn't seem to notice in 2006, and certainly didn't seem to care. For the all-important swing voter in the center -- the current version of those 19-plus millionPerot voters -- Republicans came to represent the politics of hypocrisy and failure. They didn't have a message. They didn't have an agenda. They didn't have a purpose. And so on Election Day, these voters -- now about 16 percent of the electorate -- went elsewhere.

It is unfortunate that the Republican Party is currently dominated by hyperpartisan, gut-punching professional politicians and expert technicians whom I wouldn't want to face at the dark end of the electoral alley. They specialize in the flawless execution of "wedge" politics. That may have worked well in past elections, but no longer. The latest gimmick is "branding" -- a Madison Avenue technique -- to reverse the Republican slide. But political parties are not brands, slogans are not a replacement for ideas and you don't sell leaders the way you sell widgets.

Many rank-and-file Republicans agree. But the party apparatus still doesn't get it. Over the years, I have become unpopular with the GOP hierarchy by telling the apparatchiks what they needed to know, not what they wanted to hear. Nowadays my work is far from the day-to-day grind of political partisanship. But if I were still in the thick of it, my guidance would be just 20 words long: Be bold, return to basics, stop telling, start asking, focus on results, abolish "earmarks" and embrace a permanent balanced budget.

Shortly after the Republican landslide of 1994, Rep. Jim Nussle of Iowa said: "I hope none of us lose the backbencher point of view. We should always look to make changes." Nussle was one of a cadre of passionate Republican reformers who railed against Democratic improprieties. (He gave up his House seat to run unsuccessfully for governor of Iowa last year.) The Republican Party still has its share of outsiders, crusaders, people unwilling to accept politics or governing-as-usual. I think of lawmakers such as Rep. Paul D. Ryan (Wis.) and Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), who want to get back to balanced budgets, fiscal accountability and causes that appeal to centrist voters.

They understand that Republicans lost the majority because Americans wanted change. But they need to step up now, speak out and demand a public role in reforming the party and Washington in the same way that former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) demanded that well-meaning but failed Republican leaders step aside in 1994.

There are some hopeful signs.

Both the early front-runners for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008 have appeal beyond the party's base of conservative supporters. Arizona Sen. John McCain tapped into the old Perot constituency in his bid for the nomination in 2000, and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani is doing that now.

In Florida, a group of Republican legislators stepped back from partisan bickering to try something novel: They asked the people for ideas.

Florida House Speaker Marco Rubio challenged his colleagues to create an agenda for the future with "100 Innovative Ideas" from ordinary people around the state. Instead of fundraisers, they held "idea raisers." Republicans, Democrats and independents were all welcome -- any idea that advanced the principles of good government and political accountability was considered.

It wasn't a political ploy. They released their "100 Innovative Ideas for Florida's Future" after the election. And Republican legislators got back in touch with constituents.

But what did national Republicans do as the new Congress convened and Democrats began pushing through their "Six for '06" proposals in the first 100 hours? They called a news conference not to present counter-proposals to guide the minority over the next two years, but to complain that the Democrats were treating them unfairly. They objected that the committee process was being skirted and members were denied opportunities to offer amendments.

Were Republicans standing up for retirement security, control over health-care decisions or economic freedom? No. They were upset over who was or was not allowed to offer amendments on the floor. (Note to Republicans: Americans don't care.)

The path to a GOP majority must be paved with solutions to the real problems of real people. Republicans should talk about expanding health savings accounts and educating Americans about the benefits they offer. They should commit to sunsetting government programs every four years unless continuing them can be justified. They should pledge the investment necessary to develop renewable fuels and alternative energy. They should challenge Democrats to tackle the burgeoning tax code and fight for tax simplification on behalf of hardworking taxpayers.

Republicans need a spirited, intellectually based rebuttal to every piece of Democratic legislation and an alternative to every policy -- not a new parliamentary maneuver.

My polls show that Democrats now hold a perceived advantage with voters not just on reducing deficits and balancing the budget but on an issue long seen as a GOP strength: ending wasteful spending. That alone should jar Republicans into taking a fresh approach.

Step one should be the abolition of earmarks for hometown and home-state projects. Nothing will undermine the lobbyist culture more than a clear and definitive statement that there will never again be a highway project like the Alaskan "bridge to nowhere."

Step two is to once again stand for accountability, a principle abandoned in the last Congress. If Republicans are serious about demonstrating that they understand what America wants, they will support a balanced-budget amendment -- but with an important twist: The declining Social Security surplus couldn't be used as a numbers game to "reduce" shortfalls, and there would be a clause making it difficult to raise taxes.

Republicans lost their congressional majority because they lost touch with what Americans really want. As a pollster, I rarely hear voters call for smaller government. They tell me that they want more efficient and more effective government. (Note to Republicans: There is no starker symbol of Washington's inefficiency and ineffectiveness than the federal government's inability to control our borders and prevent illegal immigration.) Last year, Republicans campaigned locally and lost nationally. Relying on local issues to define elections at a time when national matters dominate public concerns is a losing strategy. With 20 months until the next election, Republicans have a responsibility as the minority party, as the opposition party, to prove themselves as once again worthy of public trust. They must adopt a bold agenda to mirror the public's desire for bold change. Anything less and they will fail not only themselves but also the country.

Frank Luntz, a corporate communications adviser, was pollster for the GOP's 1994 "Contract With America" and advised House and Senate Republicans from 1994 through 1999. He is the author of the new book "Words That Work: It's Not What You Say, It's What People Hear" (Hyperion).

Politics For The Disengaged (WP)

By David S. Broder

DOJ_NMG_0136581

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

In a wonderful example of life imitating art, a group of serious political pros has taken the plot line of "The West Wing" and turned it into the most intriguing gambit yet seen for the 2008 election.

As fans of the now-canceled NBC drama know, the closing episodes showed newly elected Democratic President Matt Santos offering the position of secretary of state to his defeated Republican rival, Sen. Arnold Vinick. The Great Reconciliation not only brought Jimmy Smits and Alan Alda together for the closing shows but also satisfied the audience's hunger for national harmony in a time of bitter partisanship.

That's also the motivation for the creators of Unity08, a scheme announced last week to put forward an alternative ticket for the next presidential race, joining a Democrat and a Republican or headed by an independent pledged to forming a bipartisan administration.

The founders of Unity08 include Hamilton Jordan and Jerry Rafshoon, key players in Jimmy Carter's campaign and presidency, and Doug Bailey, a longtime adviser to Republican moderates and now publisher of the Hotline, a political newsletter.

The one leading sponsor who has held public office is Angus King, elected twice as an independent as governor of Maine. He came to see me last week, along with two impressive college students, Lindsay Ullman of Yale and Zach Clayton of the University of North Carolina, who represent Unity08's target audience of young people.

The sincerity of their motivation is as striking as the odds against their success.

Their hope is to harness the power of the Internet -- already demonstrated as a fundraising and recruiting tool in the 2004 campaigns of Howard Dean and others -- to mobilize the vast numbers of Americans who say they dislike their current political choices. A poll they commissioned found that 70 percent of Americans are dissatisfied with politics today and a similar percentage think politicians do not care about the views of people like themselves.

To provide an outlet for those alienated people, the Unity08 sponsors plan an Internet nominating convention in 2008. People who sign on can vote for the bipartisan ticket of their choice -- or an independent who would present a slate for a bipartisan administration.

Then those electronic "delegates" would be charged with qualifying the nominee for a place on their state ballots -- an often-arduous task for a third-party candidate.

The practical difficulties facing the venture are enormous. Persuading prominent figures to submit their names for consideration will not be easy. King suggested to me that if such a mechanism had been in place in 2000, Colin Powell might have run for president as an independent and been elected.

That is possible, but it would be a huge risk for Republicans or Democrats who have been elected to a position of responsibility to abandon their party and run under the Unity08 banner.

The electronic nominating convention would take place early in 2008 -- at a time when voters would know the concept but not the makeup of the Unity08 ticket. How many would participate is an open question. And the task of qualifying the nominee for the ballot in 50 states and the District of Columbia is one that has been a tough struggle for other third-party efforts.

Both polling and practicality suggest that the notion of an Internet-generated third ticket would have its greatest appeal to younger Americans. Ullman and Clayton, former presidents of the National Association of Student Councils, certainly are right when they say that many of their contemporaries are frustrated by the spectacle of both parties catering to entrenched interest groups and ideological extremes. Even though a senator from his home state, John Edwards, was on the Democratic ticket, Clayton said many of his friends "didn't like the choices and didn't vote" in 2004.

There may be more than a whiff of elitism in the Unity08 manifesto, which explicitly puts down social issues, such as abortion and gay marriage, that are important to many voters, while emphasizing education, the environment, health care and energy. But there undoubtedly is a hunger in the land for consensus and an end to partisanship.

A more straightforward answer would come from a credible independent presidential candidacy or an agreement by credentialed figures from the two parties to form a ticket. The rigmarole of an Internet convention could give way, then, to an actual campaign.

But meantime, those of you who share the wish for some alternative can find out more at http://www.unity08.com .

Growing A Third Party (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Somewhere in America, there are 35,000 people looking at the preliminaries to the 2008 presidential race from a different perspective than that of millions of their fellow citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0136582

They are the people who have signed up so far to participate in Unity08, the effort to launch a bipartisan third-party campaign with the first Internet nominating convention in history. I wrote about this unusual venture when it was launched last year by Hamilton Jordan and Jerry Rafshoon, both formerly of Jimmy Carter's White House; Angus King, the former independent governor of Maine; and Douglas Bailey, a veteran Republican consultant and political adviser.

I contacted Bailey recently to ask what had happened to this bold gamble, and he was the source of that 35,000 figure for the number of people who have lent support to the scheme. They obviously have a long way to go before they can claim to be a viable political force, but they are making slow, steady progress.

When I called Bailey, it had been just a week since the group announced that anyone who was interested could sign up at http://www.unity08.com as a voting delegate to a national convention planned for June 2008. Most of the sign-ups came before that formal start, Bailey said, in response to last year's publicity about the formation of Unity08.

"The need [for a third party] is as great as it's ever been," Bailey said. "The partisan bickering in Washington continues nonstop, and the contest for the nominations in both parties is likely to make it worse."

He pointed to two problems that many of us have decried. "The leading candidates in both parties have suggested they will decline federal matching funds and plan to spend unlimited sums," he said. "They expect the bundlers -- the people collecting for them -- to raise a million dollars each, and what do they [the bundlers] expect in return?"

Second, Bailey said, "the likelihood is that the nominees of both parties will be determined by the first three or four primaries, which means that 99 percent of the people who will vote in November will have absolutely no say in the names that are on the ballot. It's not surprising that they may be looking for an alternative."

None of that is implausible. But where does the alternative come from? Bailey and his partners have an answer, but the process they have in mind still strikes me -- as it did when it was first outlined -- as extremely cumbersome.

In a few weeks, they will outline provisional rules for their own nomination process, determining how candidates will qualify and how the voting will be conducted. The goal is to pick either a political independent for president or to form a ticket with both a Democrat and a Republican. Feedback will be welcomed before the rules are made final, he said.

Then comes the hard part. Thirty-nine states allow a new party to petition its way onto the presidential ballot, without having a named candidate, but the deadlines and numbers of signers required vary widely. The first test will be whether Unity08 attracts enough volunteers and money to carry out that effort.

And then comes the challenge of recruiting a candidate or candidates for Unity08 to back. If its organizers had a compelling person already lined up, their task would be much easier, but they do not.

I suggested to Bailey that the underlying premise of this campaign -- the need to cure the partisanship of Washington -- might be undercut if the Republicans and Democrats nominated people who are not closely associated with those partisan battles -- mentioning Rudy Giuliani, Mitt Romney and Mike Huckabee on the GOP side and Barack Obama and Bill Richardson among the Democrats.

"To the degree that the nominees of the two parties recognize that bipartisan leadership is essential, then it shows the political process has made a self-adjustment, and that is good," he said. "But the usual game is to target the base of your party, rile it up with wedge issues and ignore the middle.

"If they do that again, we will be ready. It is possible the parties can right the ship themselves, but I don't have a lot of confidence in that happening."

Perry Muscle Flexing Falls Flat (HC)

By R.g. Ratcliffe

Houston Chronicle, February 25, 2007

Controversial executive orders spur lawmakers to exercise their own authority

AUSTIN — Gov. Rick Perry has time and again tried to increase his powers either through legislation or executive fiat.

But Perry's five-year drive to add some muscle to Texas' weak governor system hit a brick wall last week.

First, a state district judge ruled that Perry lacked the power to tell state administrative law judges by executive order to speed up hearings in TXU Corp.'s request for coal-fired electric plant permits.

The next day, a House committee approved a bill to overturn Perry's executive mandate that all sixth-grade girls be vaccinated against a sexually transmitted virus that causes most cervical cancers.

"On the vaccine, the Legislature was relatively insulted about that," said House Appropriations Chairman Warren Chisum, a Republican who has been allied with Perry in the past. "They just felt it was important to exercise their authority as a Legislature."

Perry spokesman Robert Black said the governor has done nothing more than try to be the chief executive of Texas.

"The executive branch agencies in this state have a lot of power, but they look to the governor for leadership," Black said.

DOJ_NMG_0136583

Since he became governor in 2000, Perry has issued 65 executive orders. Most are the usual gubernatorial mix of disaster declarations, study task forces and flags flying at half-staff to honor the dead.

However, more than either of the previous two governors, Perry also has used executive orders to expand the power of his office, and his executive order mandating vaccinations against the human papillomavirus is not the first that over-stepped the Legislature.

At least four times, Perry has issued executive orders for state agencies to adopt policies that failed to pass in the Legislature — including a bill by Chisum to speed up the hearings process on air pollution permits such as the one involved in the TXU case.

In three other orders, Perry took provisions of education legislation that had failed in 2005 special sessions and ordered the Texas Education Agency to implement them.

One was a requirement that school districts spend no less than 65 percent of their budgets on classroom instruction. School districts had been instrumental in killing the so-called 65 percent rule in the Legislature.

In another order, Perry one-upped a joint select legislative committee investigating efficiency and spending by higher education in the wake of dissatisfaction over tuition increases. Perry ordered state colleges and universities to perform efficiency studies and report to him.

And he also used an executive order in January to essentially re-create a criminal justice policy agency that he had vetoed out of existence in 2003. The agency had advised the Legislature on crime trends and whether new prisons would be needed. The new incarnation is a division of his office rather than an independent agency.

There also were some that it would have been hard to find detractors for, such as the executive order telling the Department of Public Safety to establish an Amber Alert system for notifying the news media about the kidnapping of children.

Chisum said legislators did not get upset over some of the earlier executive orders because they "weren't as important" to lawmakers in general.

"When you did the vaccine, that was statewide. It affected everybody. You can take on little groups, but you can't take on the whole group," he said.

The post-Reconstruction Constitution of 1876 was designed to make the Texas governor weak to decentralize power.

The constitution divides executive powers in Texas between the governor, the lieutenant governor, the secretary of state, the comptroller, the land commissioner and the attorney general. Five of the offices are elected statewide.

"That makes the governor different from the president of the United States," said Houston attorney David Kahne, one of the lawyers who won the judicial ruling blocking Perry's executive order in the TXU case.

Kahne said the president appoints a Cabinet and is in charge of the federal government. The Texas governor has only partial control, he said.

University of North Carolina political science professor Thad Beyle ranks Texas as having among the 11 weakest governorships, largely because many of the state's powerful executive offices are elected and not appointed. Perry's power rating improves when his party's current dominance is factored in.

Perry's spokesman described that as splitting hairs. He said the governor appoints the education and human services commissioners and the governing boards of most agencies.

"Whether it's on a piece of parchment that says executive order or whether it's a phone call with a directive to one of his appointees ... , the result is the same: Under Gov. Perry, the directive has been followed," Black said.

Others have triedPerry is not the first modern governor to try to expand the powers of his office.

During his tenure as governor, George W. Bush issued 41 executive orders.

None specifically expanded the governor's power, though two expanded the powers of his secretary of state to deal with foreign nations. His first secretary of state, Tony Garza, is now ambassador to Mexico.

The late Gov. Ann Richards issued 65 executive orders during her four years in office. None could be interpreted as expanding her authority.

But Richards was a major proponent of expanding the governor's powers. She tried to get the Legislature to do it in 1991 by making state agency heads serve at her pleasure.

The executive directors of most state agencies are hired by citizen governing boards that are appointed by the governor. But members of the boards can be removed only by a two-thirds vote of the Legislature, so they are not required to follow a governor's directives.

"Calling the bureaucracy into account requires a governor with the power to hire and fire executive directors," Richards said.

DOJ_NMG_0136584

The Legislature consolidated 58 state agencies and gave Richards some additional authority, but it refused to give her direct control of the state bureaucracy.

Perry sought that exact same power in 2003. Again, the Legislature refused to give a governor that additional power.

State Rep. David Swinford, R-Dumas, had carried an omnibus bill that would have consolidated agencies and given the governor more direct control of the bureaucracy.

He said the 130-year-old provisions of the state constitution do not match a modern Texas.

"The constitution, the way it was drawn, there's a lot of things you have to react to a lot quicker now. We have 23 million people," Swinford said.

Swinford said many legislators opposed the bill because there "may have been distrust of all governors."

'Delusions of grandeur'?Perry did convince the Legislature to eliminate the state's economic development agency and make it a division of his office. He also signed into law a bill requiring the state's health and human services commissioner and his 45,000 state employees to answer to the governor.

"That example of when the Legislature gave him more power hasn't worked that well," said state Sen. Rodney Ellis, D-Houston, referring to problems implementing the privatization of state welfare programs.

Ellis was a leader of the opposition to expand Perry's powers in the 2003 Legislature. Ellis said Perry has been able to take a certain amount of additional power without asking because Republicans control the Legislature, hold every statewide office and Perry is the "titular" head of the Texas Republican Party.

"He hasn't had to work with the Legislature in the way that Ann Richards had to or even George W. Bush had to," Ellis said. "He probably figured he could just keep playing on that field and nobody would ask any questions."

Ellis said Perry's six years in office and his past successes created an aura of power, despite having won re-election with just 39 percent of the vote.

"In the case of Gov. Perry, perhaps he has some delusions of grandeur," Ellis said. "Regardless of the percentage you won by, you've been there so long you begin to get comfortable and think that you can just steamroll your way through the process."

Real Tests For Real Children (NYT)

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

The No Child Left Behind Act required the states to raise educational standards and test student performance, in exchange for federal aid. But things have not worked as Congress planned. Instead of moving toward the educational excellence that the country needs to compete in the global economy, many states opted for dumbed-down tests and deliberate sleight of hand to create the fraudulent appearance of progress.

As a result, states that perform well with their own watered-down exams do shockingly poorly when their students take the far more rigorous federal test known as the National Assessment of Educational Progress. A report this month by the bipartisan Commission on No Child Left Behind highlights this problem and calls for the development of more rigorous tests and national standards in reading, language arts, math and science.

States would then be offered the options of embracing the national standards and tests, building new ones based on the national model or keeping their existing standards and tests. States that chose not to embrace the national standards would have to submit their tests and standards to federal evaluation — to see how they compare to the national model — and the results would be reported to parents and the general public.

This proposal, which would have been shot down in previous years, is finding a great deal of sympathy in Congress. That is good news, given the work that has to be done to ensure that all of America's children can compete in the world.

Taking Elections Public (WP)

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Good government -- at $28 million, it's a bargain.

LAST YEAR, Maryland candidates for public office at the state level raised $93.6 million for their campaigns, up 69 percent from 2002, the previous gubernatorial election year. The scramble for cash required to mount a plausible race for the state Senate or House of Delegates doubtless discourages potential candidates, monopolizes the time of those who do run and builds cynicism in voters' views of their elected officials. So why isn't public financing of elections a hotter issue in Annapolis?

The common excuse is cost. The Senate president, Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), has declared himself opposed to spending taxpayers' dollars on politicians. That's a fine populist sentiment, but in fact the cost of a sensible public financing proposal for legislative races (not statewide offices) is modest -- an estimated $28 million in the course of a four-year election cycle. A bill before the General Assembly is modeled on rules already working well in Maine and Arizona. And public funding's advocates make the not implausible argument that the scheme would pay for itself soon enough as lawmakers, less beholden to special interests and corporate contributors, trimmed pork-barrel spending and tax breaks for the favored few.

Similar legislation passed the House last year. Under its terms, to become eligible for public funding candidates would first prove their viability by collecting several hundred small contributions -- $5 or more -- in a legislative district. If they accepted public funding, House candidates in contested races would then be eligible for $80,000 in public funds and pledge to spend no more; Senate candidates in contested races would qualify for $100,000. The system would be completely voluntary. Candidates could opt out, forgo the state allotment, and proceed to raise and spend money without limit; if they did so, however, their opponents who opted in would be compensated with additional state funding.

Incumbents are unlikely to vote for the measure if they believe it will cost them their jobs. But there is so far little evidence of that outcome. In Arizona and Maine, where public financing has been in place since 2002, it has resulted in more contested races -- but no loosening of incumbents' grasp. In both states, where growing numbers of candidates have chosen to take public financing, upward of 90 percent of incumbents seeking reelection won their races last year. But even without altering the incumbent-favoring dynamics of state elections, there is every reason to think that the result -- a legislature whose members owe less to entrenched, deep-pocketed interests -- will be a fairer, more impartial and better government.

Iran Urges Talks On Nukes, Not War (WT/AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 25, 2007

TEHRAN -- The Iranian foreign minister said yesterday the United States was in no position for another war and maintained that negotiations -- not threats -- were the only way to resolve the standoff over its nuclear activities.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki was responding to Vice President Dick Cheney, who renewed Washington's warning to Iran earlier yesterday that "all options" were on the table if Tehran continues to defy U.N. demands to halt uranium enrichment.

Mr. Mottaki said the U.S. could not afford to settle its differences with Iran by starting a third war after Afghanistan and Iraq.

"We do not see America in a position to impose another crisis on its taxpayers inside America by starting another war in the region," Mr. Mottaki told reporters.

The United States and several of its Western allies fear that Iran is using its nuclear program to produce an atomic weapon -- charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) reported on Thursday that Iran had ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze its uranium-enrichment program and had expanded the program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges.

Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel, but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb.

The IAEA report was released after the deadline Wednesday of a 60-day grace period for Iran to halt uranium enrichment. Iran has repeatedly refused to halt enrichment as a precondition to negotiations about its program.

Mr. Mottaki urged the U.S. and its allies to return to dialogue when they are scheduled to meet in London next week.

"The only way to reach a solution for disputes is negotiations and talks. Therefore, we want the London meeting to make a brave decision and resume talks with Iran," Mr. Mottaki said.

Gov. Bill Richardson, of New Mexico and a Democratic presidential candidate, yesterday also urged the Bush administration to negotiate directly with Iran.

"Saber-rattling is not a good way to get the Iranians to cooperate," Mr. Richardson wrote in an op-ed piece in The Washington Post. "But it is a good way to start a new war."

Iran, Mr. Richardson wrote, "will not end their nuclear program because we threaten them and call them names."

Separately, Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards said it killed 17 mercenary fighters on its border with Turkey and accused the United States and its allies of seeking to provoke tensions along the country's frontiers.

In a statement, the Guards said 17 "counterrevolutionary mercenaries" were killed, the official Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA) reported yesterday.

The Guards chief, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, said the United States, Britain and Israel were seeking to incite tension on Iran's borders to undermine its government, IRNA reported.

"Iran's enemies, through hiring some mercenaries and with their wishful thinking, want to create instability but ... the armed forces will strongly suppress anti-revolutionaries and rebels who are dependent to foreigners," Gen. Safavi was quoted as saying.

Diplomats Say U.S. Intelligence On Iranian Nukes Is Thin (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- Despite growing international concern about Iran's nuclear program and its regional ambitions, most U.S. intelligence shared with the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency has proved inaccurate and none has led to significant discoveries inside Iran, diplomats here said.

The officials said the CIA and other Western spy services have provided sensitive information to the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency at least since 2002, when Iran's long-secret nuclear program was exposed. But none of the tips about supposed secret weapons sites provided clear evidence that the Islamic Republic is developing illicit weapons.

"Since 2002, pretty much all the intelligence that's come to us has proved to be wrong," said a senior diplomat at the IAEA. Another official here described the agency's intelligence stream as "very cold now (because) so little panned out."

The reliability of U.S. information and assessments on Iran is increasingly at issue as the Bush administration confronts the emerging regional power on multiple fronts: its expanding nuclear effort, its alleged support for insurgents inside Iraq and its backing of Middle East militant groups.

The CIA still faces harsh criticism for its pre-war intelligence errors on Iraq. No one here argues that U.S. intelligence officials have fallen this time for crudely forged documents or pushed shoddy analysis. IAEA officials, who openly challenged U.S. assessments that Saddam Hussein was developing a nuclear bomb, say the Americans are much more cautious in assessing Iran.

American officials privately acknowledge that much of their evidence on Iran's nuclear plans and programs remains ambiguous, fragmented and difficult to prove.

The IAEA has its own concerns about Iran's nuclear program, although agency officials concede they have found no proof that nuclear material has been diverted.

Iran's radical regime began enriching uranium in small amounts last August in a program it insists will provide fuel only for civilian power stations, not nuclear weapons.

On Thursday, the IAEA released a report declaring that Iran had expanded uranium enrichment and defied a Security Council deadline to suspend nuclear activities. In the meantime, the agency is locked in a dispute with Tehran, the Iranian capital, over additional information and access to determine if the program is peaceful.

In November 2005, U.N. inspectors leafing through a box of papers in Tehran discovered a 15-page document that showed how to form highly enriched uranium into the configuration needed for the core of a nuclear bomb. Iran said the paper came from Pakistan, but has rebuffed IAEA requests to let inspectors take or copy it for further analysis.

Diplomats here were less convinced by documents recovered by U.S. intelligence from a laptop computer apparently stolen from Iran. American analysts first briefed senior IAEA officials on the contents of the hard drive at the U.S. mission here in mid-2005.

The documents included detailed designs to upgrade ballistic missiles to carry nuclear warheads, drawings for subterranean testing of high explosives, and two pages describing research into uranium tetrafluoride, known as "green salt," which is used during uranium enrichment. IAEA officials remain suspicious of the information in part because most of the papers are in English rather than Farsi, the Iranian language.

Iran's representative to the IAEA, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, dismissed the laptop documents as "fabricated information." Iran, he said, has produced 170 tons of "green salt" at a uranium conversion facility in Esfahan that is monitored by the IAEA.

"We are not hiding it," he said in an interview. "We make tons of it. These documents are all nonsense."

The U.S. government is not required to share intelligence with the IAEA, and relations between Washington, D.C., and the U.N. agency are at times testy. In March 2003, ElBaradei embarrassed the White House when he told the Security Council that documents indicating that Saddam's regime in Iraq had sought to purchase uranium in Niger were forged. The Bush administration subsequently opposed ElBaradei's re-appointment as IAEA chief.

While it confronts Iran's nuclear ambitions, the Bush administration also has tried to finger Iran as a supplier of munitions and training for insurgent groups in neighboring Iraq.

But the quality of its information has limited this effort, as well.

U.S. officials recently compiled evidence purporting to show that the Iranian Quds Force, an elite unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, has supplied Iranian-made weapons to Shiite militia that have attacked U.S. forces in Iraq.

After U.S. officials unveiled the evidence to reporters in Baghdad two weeks ago, however, Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates and other Pentagon officials scrambled to retreat from the incendiary claim that the "highest levels" of the Tehran government were directly involved.

"I don't know if it goes to the highest levels of the government," Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the officer in charge of daily operations in Iraq, told Pentagon reporters Thursday. "What we do know is that the Quds Force has had involvement with some extremist groups in Iraq."

Washington, D.C., has sought to pressure Tehran into halting the supply of so-called "explosively formed projectiles" that are able to penetrate heavily armored vehicles. The projectiles represent only a small percentage of roadside bombing attacks in Iraq but they are far more lethal than ordinary explosives.

Administration officials also cite a growing effort by Hezbollah, an Iranian protege and ally based in Lebanon, to aid anti-American Shiite forces in Iraq.

U.S. military officials contend that Hezbollah has provided training in Lebanon to hundreds of members of the Mahdi Army, which is controlled by radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. A smaller number of Hezbollah forces reportedly have entered Iraq through Syria to provide such training.

Given the lack of clear evidence, Iran's strategic goals in Iraq are a matter of debate and concern has spread about its growing influence there. Although Iran is Persian and Iraq is Arab, both have majority Shiite populations, who have kept close religious, economic and cultural ties for centuries. Iran's rulers view the United States as meddling in their backyard, or at least in a natural part of their sphere of influence.

Some outside experts believe Iran seeks to keep America tied down indefinitely in Iraq and actively will resist a settlement there for fear Washington will next turn its guns on Tehran.

Ali Ansari, an expert on Iran at St. Andrew University in Scotland and author of "Confronting Iran," counters that Iran and America share some interests.

Iran is "looking for a stable Iraq," he said. "They want an Iraq that is not fragmented. But the difference would be that they don't want an Iraq that is militarily strong. They want an Iraqi government that is elected democratically, which means a Shiia Iraq."

But Sunni-dominated governments in Egypt, Jordan and especially Saudi Arabia have pushed the U.S. to expand Sunni representation in Iraq's leadership as a way of countering Tehran. Some experts fear that a nuclear-armed Iran will spark a regional arms race.

John Negroponte, former director of national intelligence, told a House committee last month that Iran has extended its "shadow in the region" since the U.S. ousted hostile regimes on its borders: Afghanistan's Taliban and Saddam's government in Baghdad.

Iran also has increased regional political leverage, he said, due to increased oil revenues, electoral victories by Hamas in Palestinian territories, and Hezbollah's "perceived recent success in fighting Israel" in Lebanon.

Iran and Syria since have resupplied arms to Hezbollah, including stocks of long-range missiles that could reach deep into Israel, U.S. officials contend.

Washington lists Hamas and Hezbollah as terrorist organizations.

The administration has also become alarmed at Iran's increasing efforts to support Hamas following the group's victory in Palestinian elections in January 2006. That worry lies behind an $86 million U.S. plan to build up the security forces of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' presidential guard and National Security Force.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has exploited the growing confrontation with Washington, D.C., to gain much needed political support at home. Nationalist sentiments run deep in Iran and the claim that Tehran has the same right to nuclear power as other nations has become a rallying cry that undermines the government's domestic critics.

"None of us can accept the suspension of these activities because people consider this our legal right," said Akbar Alami, an independent lawmaker. "All the political parties agree with this. We cannot stop."

Ahmadinejad's fiery rhetoric and defiance of the West also has burnished his credentials as a populist leader in other Islamic nations. That has raised alarms in Sunni governments around the region that Iran's brand of militant political Islam, possibly backed by the prestige of being a nuclear power, is on the march.

"The Americans are worried about enriched uranium and the Arabs are worried about enriched Shiism," said Mamoun Fandy, senior fellow for gulf security at the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies. Iran's growing power, he said, "threatens every existing political order in the region."

Fighting Iran -- With Patience (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136588

Nuclear weapons have a way of forcing presidents to reverse policies thought to be carved in stone. So it was with Ronald Reagan and the Soviet Union, and so it may be now with George W. Bush and the two surviving members of the "axis of evil."

To the outrage of some supporters and the mockery of his critics, President Bush has blessed a tentative, quarter-loaf diplomatic deal aimed at curbing North Korea's nuclear arsenal. And he has a shot at reaching a modus vivendi with Iran on nuclear proliferation as well -- if he disregards both the outrage and the mockery, as he should.

"There is movement behind the scenes," a European diplomat who closely follows Iran told me last week. "The Iranians are nervous and want to get engaged." Details of a confidential Iranian proposal that has been circulating in Brussels and Tehran for four months support the view that there could be an opening on the Iranian front despite the angry rhetoric from Iran triggered by last week's new indictment of its nuclear ambitions by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Bush vigorously ruled out rewarding bad behavior by foreign adversaries in his first term. Saddam Hussein's manipulation of the international community was a driving force in Bush's labeling Iraq, along with North Korea and Iran, as irredeemably evil in 2002 and invading Iraq a year later.

But now Bush countenances providing economic and diplomatic rewards to North Korea, and ultimately to Iran, to reduce the threat of nuclear weapons in the hands of two regimes that behave as badly as anyone could want. The bravado of the first Bush term has been replaced by a sadder and quieter way of doing business abroad as Iraq has sapped U.S. capabilities and political cohesion.

The sense of a U-turn is reinforced by Bush's reliance this time on the negotiating skills of his diplomatic corps and on European and Asian partners to reach, enforce and pay for the projected deals, which would serve as twin tombstones for a brief era of U.S. unilateralism.

The change on North Korea is described by former administration officials as a strategic decision by the president to start "to pry the lid off" of that starving, tyrannized remnant of the Cold War by offering Pyongyang a path for peaceful change. Cooperation in the six-party negotiations would also help stabilize China's relations with Japan and the United States, in this view.

The president reportedly surprised Chinese President Hu Jintao during their lunch at the White House last April by suggesting that, if the nuclear impasse could be resolved, the time was right for a formal peace treaty to end the Korean conflict. And when North Korea defied Chinese "advice" by conducting a nuclear test in October, China became more engaged in pulling Pyongyang back to the negotiating table.

Unfortunately, Bush cannot rely on Russia to play a similarly helpful role with Iran. President Vladimir Putin seems willing to take enormous risks with global stability for short-term, largely commercial reasons. And divisions in Iran's leadership make the reaching of a "mutual suspension" accord -- under which Tehran will suspend enriching uranium in return for the suspension of U.N. sanctions -- more difficult.

But U.S. and European policy should play on those divisions, which have visibly surfaced as President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad rants on in full-throated belligerence while officials closer to Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, offer proposals that have the virtue at least of identifying the chief remaining obstacles to a deal.

Last autumn, Iran's Ali Larijani told European Union negotiator Javier Solana that Iran could accept the Russian-E.U. proposal for an international consortium to enrich and reprocess nuclear fuel for Iran -- if the enrichment and reprocessing were done on Iranian soil.

A diplomatic device known as a nonpaper (so its existence can be denied) and dated Oct. 1, 2006, describes a "gentlemen's agreement" by the two diplomats to use the proposal "to help open the way to negotiations." When I telephoned him in Berlin last week, Solana affably but deftly warded off questions about the nonpaper, then added: "Nothing has been agreed. Nothing has been put forward in formal terms."

Precisely. The Iranian condition is unacceptable to Washington. But the fact that it was put forward at all suggests that the pressures generated by the U.S. Treasury's campaign to limit finance and export credits to Iran and condemnation by the United Nations are taking a toll on the Iranians -- as these tools did on North Korea.

Bush seems to have decided to employ strategic patience in seeking a verifiable nuclear deal with North Korea and to have taken a long-range view of regional stability. He should do no less with Iran, however much manufactured outrage or contrived mockery it provokes, in Tehran or in Washington.

UN's ElBaradei To Visit North Korea For Talks On Nuclear Accord (BLOOM)

By Seyoon Kim

Bloomberg, February 25, 2007

Feb. 24 - International Atomic Energy Agency Director-General Mohamed ElBaradei accepted an invitation from North Korea to visit the country in March for talks on its nuclear program, the United Nations atomic agency said.

DOJ_NMG_0136589

``I see this as a step toward the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula," Elbaradei was quoted as saying in a statement from the IAEA. ``We will discuss issues of mutual concern and how we can implement the agreement reached at the six-party talks about the shut-down and eventual abandonment of the Yongbyon nuclear facility, including the reprocessing facility."

North Korea invited officials from the United Nations atomic agency to visit in the coming weeks for talks on its nuclear program and on plans for inspections after pledging to end the pursuit of weapons in exchange for aid. ElBaradei may visit with a team of nuclear inspectors during the week of March 12, agency spokesman Peter Rickwood said yesterday.

North Korea's agreement to halt its development of nuclear bombs was also met with U.S. and Japanese promises of steps to normalize their relations with the country.

The accord was announced Feb. 13 after talks involving South Korea, the U.S., Japan, China and Russia. Under the agreement, the North will receive economic aid equivalent to 50,000 metric tons of heavy fuel oil and a further 950,000 tons if it disables its Yongbyon nuclear reactor.

The six-nation talks gained new importance after the North's nuclear test in October. The UN Security Council then banned sales of military equipment and luxury goods to the country. The Stalinist nation also test-fired seven missiles in July, one of them the long-range Taepodong 2.

North Korea's Welcome Opening (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

IT WAS AN INVITATION he couldn't refuse. Last week, North Korea asked Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to Pyongyang to discuss dismantling its nuclear facilities. The invitation arrived a day after the IAEA announced that Iran is moving faster than expected to enrich uranium, in defiance of the United Nations.

The IAEA, the imperfect yet indispensable nuclear watchdog agency, is imperfect in the way that all bureaucracies are imperfect; it can be slow, legalistic and equivocal. But as a keeper of the international nuclear order, it is better than the alternatives — a conclusion even the Bush administration appears to have accepted.

The IAEA has not always enjoyed such access, or such a reputation. North Korea kicked out IAEA inspectors in December 2002, then fired up its plutonium plant and, less than five years later, claimed a successful test of a nuclear bomb. Two weeks ago, North Korea signed the precursor to what could, if all goes much better than expected, eventually turn into a nuclear disarmament deal.

Under the pact, Pyongyang must shut down its Yongbyon nuclear reactor, allow IAEA inspectors back into the country and, within 60 days, disclose all its nuclear materiel and operations. In return, Pyongyang will get a dribble of heavy fuel oil, to be followed by more oil and aid if and when it begins to dismantle its nuclear facilities.

Although it's encouraging that Pyongyang has invited ElBaradei, the key test will be whether it discloses anything meaningful about its nuclear operations — which U.S. officials believe include stockpiles of bomb-ready plutonium and a program to enrich uranium. More critical still will be whether the famously secretive North Koreans will allow IAEA inspectors the access that will be required to verify their claims.

ElBaradei infuriated the Bush administration before its 2003 invasion of Iraq by refusing to endorse the U.S. view that Saddam Hussein had a functioning nuclear weapons program. He was eventually proved correct, of course, and in 2005 was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize (an award that was also an obvious rebuke to President Bush).

In Iran, however, IAEA reports have tended to support U.S. claims about Tehran's suspicious nuclear activities. Whether these reports have prompted a change in the U.S. attitude, or whether the change is the result of a larger shift in the administration's perspective on the IAEA, is hard to tell. Whatever the reason, the agency's renewed relevance in Washington is welcome.

All this said, ElBaradei and Bush disagree on Tehran. The U.S. generally favors a more hard-line approach, while the IAEA is more willing to negotiate. But these are policy disputes. The IAEA's strength is more practical. It is powerless to force nations to allow its inspectors to go where they are not wanted, nor can it catch determined cheats. But it has earned credibility for honestly reporting what its inspectors find and where they are not permitted to look. For this alone, its return to North Korea will be useful.

The Stuff Sam Nunn's Nightmares Are Made Of (NYT)

By Michael Crowley

The New York Times Magazine, February 25, 2007

By now we can too readily imagine the horror of terrorists exploding a nuclear weapon in a major American city: the gutted skyscrapers, the melted cars, the charred bodies. For Sam Nunn, however, a new terror begins the day after. That's when the world asks whether another bomb is out there. “If a nuclear bomb went off in Moscow or New York City or Jerusalem, any number of groups would claim they have another,” Nunn told me recently. These groups would make steep demands as intelligence officials scrambled to determine which claims were real. Panic would prevail. Even after the detonation of a small, crude weapon that inflicted less damage than the bomb at Hiroshima, Nunn suggested, “the psychological damage would be incalculable. It would be a slow, step-by-step process to regain confidence. And the question will be, Why didn’t we take steps to prevent this? We will have a whole list of things we wish we’d done.”

Nunn thinks of those things every time he picks up a newspaper. When, for instance, he reads about the arrest of a Russian man who, in a sting operation, tried to sell weapons-grade uranium — a reminder of a possible black market in nuclear materials and of the poor security at facilities in the former Soviet Union. Or when he sees news about Iran’s efforts to build a nuclear bomb, which could set off a wave of nuclear proliferation in the Middle East and thus significantly raise the possibility that terrorists will someday acquire a bomb. And despite the apparent diplomatic breakthrough with North Korea earlier this month, in which the North Koreans agreed to begin dismantling their nuclear facilities in return for fuel and other aid, Nunn, who finds the deal encouraging, remains concerned since North Korea’s unpredictable, cash-starved dictatorship still retains perhaps half a dozen nuclear bombs, and the ingredients to make more.

A decade after leaving the United States Senate, where he spent years as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Nunn posed one, overriding question about his list of things we’ll wish we had done if a doomsday should ever come: “Why aren’t we doing them now?” In a sense, his own answer has been to help found and run the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a Washington-based foundation largely bankrolled by Nunn’s friends Ted Turner and Warren Buffett. In what may be the most ambitious example of private dollars subsidizing national security, the N.T.I. is trying to fill in the gaps where government is failing to reduce nuclear threats. In other words, to do the things now that we would otherwise wish we had done.

The war in Iraq has understandably consumed America’s foreign-policy energies. But it occludes what Nunn and many others, on both the right and left, regard as a deepening worldwide nuclear crisis. Despite its willingness to confront North Korea, the U.S., Nunn insists, still does not fully grasp the nuclear dangers it faces. “We are at a tipping point,” he says. “And we are headed in the wrong direction.” As he sees it, the trouble is, in a defense establishment that once war-gamed the end of the world a thousand different ways, there has been a shortage of thinking about what the right direction looks like or how to take it. It is a situation that has led Nunn, who once extolled nuclear weapons as a guarantor of American safety, to reassess decades of hawkish cold-war thinking, to reconsider his most fundamental beliefs about whether the country would be safer in a world with any nuclear weapons at all.

Sam Nunn’s nuclear nightmare begins with a character like Oleg Khinsagov. Last month, the International Atomic Energy Agency revealed that officials in the former Soviet republic of Georgia had arrested Khinsagov, a 50-year-old Russian fish and sausage trader, for attempting to sell 100 grams of highly enriched uranium to a Muslim buyer who, Khinsagov had been told, represented “a serious organization.” The price: $1 million. Khinsagov, who was caught in a sting operation, had nowhere near enough material for a bomb, but he claimed to have far more at his apartment. (Whether he actually did is unclear.) An American laboratory analysis indicates that the material most likely originated at a Russian nuclear facility.

To some, Khinsagov’s arrest was a success story, a sign that recent efforts to crack down on nuclear smuggling are producing results. Nunn is not so sanguine. He says that nuclear smugglers who get caught — the international agency counts 18 confirmed cases involving highly enriched uranium and plutonium since 1993 — are usually unsophisticated amateurs. “It’s the ones we don’t see that worry me,” he says.

It is a worry that he shares with Ted Turner, the billionaire philanthropist and founder of CNN whose donation of $250 million in Time Warner stock enabled the Nuclear Threat Initiative to open for business in 2001. Turner long dreaded a nuclear holocaust, but he assumed the threat had fizzled out with the end of the cold war. “I was getting ready to celebrate the millennium in 2000 because it looked like humanity was going to make it,” he told me, when we spoke last month. “And if we could do that, maybe we could make it to 3000. I figured that we had nuclear disarmament.” And then he saw a report on “60 Minutes” about lax security in the former Soviet Union. There were 20,000 warheads and stockpiles of uranium and plutonium capable of making another 40,000 or more warheads scattered across 11 time zones, whose safety too often depended on lackadaisical guards, shabby locks and defective security cameras. There was another related problem: large quantities of uranium that could be used to make bombs were being stored at some 130 civilian nuclear reactors around the world, often under even more slipshod security. A small group of terrorists might break into such a facility and if they had basic engineering and chemistry skills could probably forge a crude nuclear bomb out of a grapefruit-size 30-pound lump of highly enriched uranium (to say nothing of a much simpler radioactive “dirty” bomb).

Turner considered establishing an organization to revive the dormant nuclear-disarmament movement. But foreign-policy specialists he met with persuaded him to focus on more realistic, incremental change. A mutual friend connected Turner with

Nunn, who was then practicing law at an Atlanta firm. According to one person familiar with N.T.I.'s founding, who does not want to be named because he works with N.T.I. and does not have permission to speak on its behalf, "There was this very prolonged dance where people were trying to come up with ideas that were exciting enough for Turner but sensible enough for Nunn," who was uncomfortable with Turner's passion for disarmament, a movement Nunn had long considered irresponsible.

Nunn and Turner found common ground, however, in a narrower mission: responding to the threat of "loose nukes," or the possibility that nuclear weapons and materials might be smuggled out of the former Soviet Union and find their way into malevolent hands. They settled on having the Nuclear Threat Initiative spend millions of dollars on everything from annual reports written by Harvard academics on the loose-nukes problem to filming a docudrama about a nuclear-terrorism crisis. Above all, the foundation would finance direct-action programs to secure nuclear materials around the world, in coordination with the U.S. and foreign governments.

It was one such program that led Nunn and Turner to a warehouse in Ust-Kamenogorsk, an industrial city in eastern Kazakhstan, in October 2005. They were there to size up an effort, paid for in part by N.T.I., to "blend down" 6,400 pounds of highly enriched uranium — enough to make dozens of bombs — into a form that couldn't be used in weapons. The uranium was spent fuel from a decommissioned nuclear power plant situated near the Iranian border. A few years earlier, he had made the following offer to Kazakhstan's president: N.T.I. would provide its expertise to relocate and then blend down the uranium, and it would pay half of the $2 million cost to do so. By the time Nunn and Turner toured the Ulba Metallurgical Plant, the project was close to completion. A portion of the uranium had not yet been blended down, however, and it lay stored in 20 or so tubes in a corner of the warehouse. Nunn and Turner stood and gazed solemnly at it. "Here was the potential, right there in that little corner, in the hands of the wrong people, to wipe out cities around the world." Nunn says. "That's a pretty stark realization."

N.T.I. intervened in Kazakhstan, Nunn explains, because the U.S. government did not act first. It's not the only such example: in mid-2002, more than 100 pounds of highly enriched uranium — stored in portable canisters that emit little radiation — was lying at the Vinca Institute of Nuclear Sciences, a civilian research reactor in Belgrade. The security there would have been no match for even a small terrorist squad. And Islamic militants operated in the region. Clearly Vinca was a high-priority problem. Yet even though the first American plans to rescue the material were drawn up during the Clinton administration, no action had been taken a year after Sept. 11. The obstacle was bureaucratic: in return for giving up the uranium, the Serbian government demanded help cleaning up Vinca's spent reactor fuel. That qualified as an environmental cleanup, however, which the U.S. lacked the authority to pay for. So N.T.I. stepped in and covered the $5 million cleanup fee. It wasn't until August 2002 that a motorcade of technicians and machine-gun-toting commandos finally transferred the uranium from the Vinca Institute to a cargo plane that flew it to Russia to be blended down.

"If there's anything that most Americans would think the government would happily chip in for, it's getting highly enriched uranium out of a place where it could fall into terrorist hands," says Matthew Bunn, a former nuclear-arms official in the Clinton administration who is now at Harvard and whose work is partly financed by N.T.I. "Yet" — in Vinca — "the government could not get this done without N.T.I.'s money."

A small-town lawyer and politician who won an underdog campaign in Georgia in 1972, Nunn quickly made his name in Washington as a defense-policy wonk. Thanks to an intimidating expertise on defense affairs and a bespectacled air of judicious authority, Nunn was "looked upon with awe" by colleagues in both parties, says Pete V. Domenici, the Republican senator from New Mexico. Such was his authority, in fact, that he comfortably rebuffed offers from George H. W. Bush and Bill Clinton to serve as secretary of defense, knowing that he wielded even more power from his longtime perch as chairman of Senate Armed Services. Nunn used that influence to consistently pro-military ends. During the 1970s, he fought with liberal Democrats seeking to cut defense budgets and ultimately forced Jimmy Carter to accept substantial increases in defense spending. Nunn also strongly defended the value and morality of nuclear weapons. The nuclear-freeze movement, in his mind, was naïvely utopian. "We had to have a nuclear deterrent," he says today. "Not only that, but a first-use policy," which refers to the U.S.'s stated willingness in certain circumstances to strike first with nuclear weapons.

Nunn considered a run for president in 1988, and his name surfaced again after Michael Dukakis's crushing defeat in November of that year, which further persuaded centrist Democrats that they needed a Southern moderate as a candidate. But that talk ground to a halt after Nunn opposed the first gulf war. He urged at the time that sanctions and diplomacy be given more time and, in January 1991, voted against the Senate's war resolution. A sign went up on a Georgia highway calling him "Saddam's Best Friend," and some suggested that he was cynically appealing to liberal Democratic primary voters. As it happened, however, opposing such a short and easy war probably ruined Nunn's shot at the White House. In Washington, his vote was considered a colossal political blunder. "He got a lot of political flak," says his friend Al From, the chairman of the moderate Democratic Leadership Council. "It probably hastened his decision to retire from politics." (Nunn's vote "profoundly influenced the next generation of senators that confronted plans for the second invasion" 11 years later, says a former Clinton defense official who advises Congressional Democrats. White House officials even invoked Nunn's "mistake" as they lobbied Congress to vote for war.)

By the mid-1990s, the cold war was over and the stature of defense gurus diminished. Moreover, politics on Capitol Hill were changing. The rise of fierce, Gingrich-style cultural politics made life uneasy for all Southern Democrats. In 1993, Nunn resisted Bill Clinton's attempt to allow gays to serve openly in the military, prompting a gay-rights spokesman to brand him a "Jesse Helms Democrat." Washington was growing far less hospitable to a moderate with little taste for the blood sport of partisan politics. "The premium is on stirring up your base," he says now. When Nunn announced his retirement in 1995, even the Republican Strom Thurmond urged him to stick around. Nunn was just 58 when he left the Senate. For more than 20 years, his life had been defined by the cold war and the fight against Communism. That cause was over.

Nunn first became alarmed by the threat of loose nukes during his last Senate term. A year after the Soviet Union began to collapse in 1990, he passed legislation with his friend Richard Lugar, the Republican from Indiana, that dedicated hundreds of millions of dollars annually in the Pentagon budget to the dismantling of surplus Soviet nuclear weapons, upgrading security at nuclear sites in the former Soviet Union and finding jobs for its nuclear scientists lest they be tempted to work for terrorists or would-be nuclear powers. Since 1991, the Cooperative Threat Reduction program — or simply Nunn-Lugar, as it is generally known — has spent more than $10 billion on its mission, and it is considered a triumph of forward-looking lawmaking.

Even so, huge quantities of weapons and material remain in what Nunn considers perilously unsafe conditions. Only about half of the buildings containing nuclear material in the former Soviet Union have undergone post-1990 security upgrades to install things like perimeter fences, cameras and radiation-monitors to prevent theft. And 134 tons of excess plutonium, which the Russians are willing to destroy, are just sitting in storage. Progress in addressing these problems has been stymied in part by conservatives in the last Republican Congress who bristled at the notion of sending American tax dollars to a Russian military that, they said, should pay for its own fences and cameras. Cooler relations between Russia and the United States have stalled matters further. Russian military officials are less willing to let Americans poke around their nuclear sites and assess security conditions. And the uncompromising diplomacy of the Bush administration has played a role too. American and Russian officials recently fought over arcane rules that would govern a program to dispose of that 134 tons of excess plutonium. The lead United States negotiator demanded extremely broad guarantees for U.S. contractors involved in the work, including freedom from liability even in the event of intentional spillage of nuclear material. The standoff delayed the program for more than a year, until Bush and Vladimir Putin finally hammered out a solution at a summit last fall.

One of the few points of agreement between George Bush and John Kerry during the presidential campaign in 2004 was that preventing a terrorist nuclear attack is among America's very highest priorities. But many critics on both the left and right argue that the Bush administration has lacked a sense of urgency toward the threat of loose nukes. Kenneth Adelman, a former Reagan-era arms-control official and a Pentagon adviser under George W. Bush, recently recalled a private meeting with Donald Rumsfeld days after his swearing in as defense secretary. "He was very skeptical of the Nunn-Lugar program," Adelman told me. "That wasn't the kind of thing he thought the Department of Defense should be doing. He had it in his head that it was a wimpy thing to have the Pentagon involved in."

Some Bush allies maintain that the real blame lies with Russia's increasingly belligerent leader. "I believe there are still many installations where the security of materials is still not to the high level that we would hope," John Wolf, who served as assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation in Bush's first term, told me. "Somebody ought to look into Mr. Putin's eyes and down to his soul and say, 'You're putting the fate of the world at risk by your unwillingness to take action.' "

Last September, Nunn and N.T.I.'s president, a former Energy Department official in the Clinton administration named Charles Curtis, flew to Vienna to meet with Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency. ElBaradei admires Nunn, whom he calls "a shining example" in the fight against a potential nuclear catastrophe — presumably not least because N.T.I. has given ElBaradei's agency more than $1 million to upgrade its monitoring of nuclear material worldwide. Part of the reason for Nunn's visit was to discuss a major new N.T.I. proposal: the creation of an international nuclear fuel bank.

This was the foundation's response to an unsettling wave of countries showing interest in new or expanded nuclear capabilities. Several nations, including Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco and Algeria, say they might want to develop civilian nuclear power. Meanwhile, South Africa, Brazil, Canada, Argentina and Australia all talk of creating home-grown uranium-enrichment programs — ostensibly for power but potentially also for military ends. "What I see is a new wave of countries not necessarily trying to develop nuclear weapons but nuclear-weapons capability — the ability to process or enrich plutonium or uranium," ElBaradei told me recently. "And I know, and you know, that if a country is capable of doing that, they are virtually a nuclear-weapon state."

The idea behind an international fuel bank is to make it possible for nations to generate nuclear power without developing a nuclear-weapons capability. Iran, for instance, has rejected offers from Russia to manage its uranium supply on the alleged grounds that it doesn't want to be dependent on Russia's political whims for its energy needs. The fuel bank would render such complaints obsolete and make transparent who is using energy programs as a cover for military ambitions. If a country has access to a reliable fuel supply, why would it need its own enrichment program?

For Nunn, this is the logical next phase in the fight against loose nukes: preventing the creation of new nukes that could become loose someday. ElBaradei has predicted that as many as 30 or 40 countries could begin trying to develop nuclear capability in coming years. And while traditional policies of deterrence may keep future nuclear states in check, every new bomb factory necessarily means there is more dangerous nuclear material in the world. "I see the two going together," Nunn says. "The more countries that have this fissile material, the more likely the risk of a diversion or theft of fissile material becomes."

America was lucky to survive the cold war, Nunn told an audience in Washington last month. "I don't believe if you get another 7, 8, 10 countries with a nuclear weapon that you're going to be so lucky."

It is very likely that North Korea's success in building weapons and Iran's steady progress toward that goal have only encouraged other nations to get into the nuclear game. But, Nunn believes, the United States, mired in Iraq and strained in its relations with former allies, has never had less leverage to counter them. Nunn says that the current Iraq war (which he also opposed) has distracted U.S. officials, undermined the credibility of any U.S. military threat it might bring to bear on North Korean or Iran and "dealt a severe blow to the leadership credibility we need in the world."

In this view, American credibility is an essential part of persuading other nations to stop or reverse their nuclear programs. One way to enhance American credibility, according to this line of thinking, is for the United States to decrease its own nuclear stockpile. Yet the Bush administration has not only not moved to significantly reduce that stockpile, it is also exploring new nuclear technologies (like bunker-buster mini-nukes). "I think we have very badly failed to meet our responsibilities," Brent Scowcroft, George H. W. Bush's national security adviser and Nunn's friend, told me. "I think it is the sort of neoconish notion that it is our job to dominate the world and that the way you dominate it is by pushing ahead on new nuclear stuff."

Nunn complains that the Bush White House also subordinates nonproliferation to other goals. As an example, he cites the deal the administration cut with India last year. It created a legal exemption allowing American companies to conduct trade with India's nuclear-power industry even though India is not a party to the 1968 Non-Proliferation Treaty. Nunn publicly called for Congress to impose conditions on the deal — specifically, a provision requiring that India halt production of new fissile material for weapons. A worldwide treaty barring the creation of all new fissile material is near the top of Nunn's wish list, and he saw the deal with India as a fine opportunity. But in the end, the Bush administration, which is eager to cultivate India as a regional ally, got its way. "We missed that opportunity," Nunn says. "We should not have entered into that agreement."

The Bush administration is not without its achievements or its defenders. Persuading Libya to abandon a nascent nuclear program in 2003 is one of its least-heralded triumphs. The recent deal with North Korea, if it holds up, could be another success story. The Global Threat Reduction Initiative, a program set up by the Energy Department to remove nuclear material from civilian nuclear reactors around the world, has been widely commended. (Nunn, who is not prone to boasting, says people "at very high levels" have told him that the example set by the Vinca operation in Serbia was a crucial impetus behind the creation of the new program.) Meanwhile, conservatives note that the sorts of international treaties embraced by Nunn but spurned by Bush have historically failed to blunt the nuclear ambitions of states like India and Pakistan and, now, possibly Iran. Hence American power and the deterrent threat of brute force remain the best way to confront the dangers of proliferation. "If you want to discourage countries from acquiring nuclear weapons," Richard Perle, the former Reagan arms-control official, says, "make it clear that once they get a nuclear weapon, it is something they can't use directly because we will annihilate them."

Nunn, for one, remains unconvinced. The North Korea deal, he says, came about after the Bush administration shifted tactics from its confrontational, axis-of-evil posture to intensive multilateral diplomacy. While Nunn says he applauds the administration for changing direction on North Korea — "You have to talk to countries unless you're going to leave yourself with one resort, which is military force," he says — Perle's vision of deterrence is ineffective if a nuclear weapon is stolen or transferred from a state to a terrorist group with no fixed address to incinerate. It is potential threats like these that have led Nunn to shift his focus from locking up loose nukes to grander ideas, like the international fuel bank.

At the same time, he has had to enlist new allies. Ted Turner's initial donation of $250 million to the Nuclear Threat Initiative came in the form of Time Warner stock, which lost 70 percent of its value before N.T.I. sold it off. N.T.I. might have gone under by now had Nunn not enlisted another wealthy angel, Warren Buffett. Nunn has known Buffett for years through his service on the Coca-Cola corporate board — Nunn estimates he spends 30 to 50 percent of his time serving on several corporate boards, including those of Coca-Cola, Dell and Chevron — and Buffett has long been concerned about the risk of nuclear terrorism.

"One thing you learn in the insurance business is that anything that can happen will happen," Buffett told me. "Whether it's the levees in New Orleans or the San Francisco earthquake, things that are very improbable do happen." Buffett once gave Nunn a formula that the latter likes to repeat: assuming a 10 percent chance of a nuclear attack in any given year, the odds of surviving 50 years without an attack are less than 1 percent. If the odds of an attack can be reduced to 1 percent per year, however, the chances of making it 50 years without a nuclear detonation improve to better than even. Buffett also told Nunn that if he ever had "a big idea" for reducing the chances of nuclear terrorism, he should call. After Nunn proposed the fuel-bank project, Buffett backed the effort with a pledge of $50 million — on the condition that at least one government contributes $100 million in cash or nuclear fuel within two years. Buffett is now N.T.I.'s chief underwriter, promising to donate $7 million annually to the foundation through 2009. (Fund-raising generates the rest of N.T.I.'s money.) "I told Sam we're not going to have something as important as his effort disappear because of the actions of a stock," Buffett says. "As long as Sam's involved, I'll be involved. I promise you that."

For his part, ElBaradei is ecstatic that Buffett stepped forward. But he also regards it as a damning reflection on the seriousness with which the world is taking nuclear proliferation. "It's discouraging, to say the least, for my organization to go and pass the hat to seek funding for these problems when everyone agrees that this is the No. 1 security threat," ElBaradei says. "Governments are not putting money where their mouths are."

Last month, Nunn wrote an op-ed article in The Wall Street Journal with former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and George Schultz and former Secretary of Defense William Perry that sent waves through the foreign-policy establishment. Its title was "A World Free of Nuclear Weapons." The article declared that, after the cold war, "reliance on nuclear weapons for [deterrence] is becoming increasingly hazardous and decreasingly effective." Deterring terrorist groups has become nearly impossible, and the peacekeeping value of nuclear weapons is more and more outweighed by the risk of their possible use. Therefore, the authors wrote, it is time to pursue the goal of "a world free of nuclear weapons." To seek abolition, in other words.

The language used in the op-ed — for example, the claim that abolition is "consistent with America's moral heritage" — struck some as an echo of 1980s liberal critiques that treated nuclear deterrence as a moral abomination. "Many people said this was a leftist view, a pacifist view of the world, to come and say we need to move to a new abolition of nuclear weapons," ElBaradei told me shortly after the piece was published. On the other hand, Nunn's byline on the article seems to have buoyed those who have long called for weapons reductions. "Here is a man who was known as the leading Democratic hawk in the Senate saying we have got to recapture this vision of eliminating nuclear weapons," Joseph Cirincione, a nuclear-proliferation expert at the liberal Center for American Progress, says. "Not just reducing nuclear dangers but eliminating these weapons. It was a shot in the arm to everyone who's been trying to correct the disastrous policies of the last six years."

Nunn says that some people were stunned by his new stance. "How could you endorse this?" he has been asked. Ronald Reagan believed passionately in the principle of disarmament, but few in Washington's foreign-policy establishment have ever shared that view. Brent Scowcroft, for one, calls abolition "a fantasy. But even if you could do it, that's dangerous. I just think that we have invented nuclear weapons, and we cannot disinvent them. And a world where everybody gets rid of their nuclear weapons means that anybody that cheats can become a superpower in a short period of time. And I just think that's a very dangerous world."

Nunn acknowledges this danger and admits that any realistic disarmament plan would have to allow the U.S. to quickly reconstitute weapons if a threat emerged. But he has come to believe the greater danger is continuing on our current path. "I think we have to turn it around," he told me a few weeks ago. "You literally can't get there" — to a safer world, that is — "from here."

Nunn concedes that any path to complete disarmament would be long and slow. He says that the U.S. could begin by finally starting to make substantial cuts in its nuclear forces, and by ratifying a 1996 international nuclear-test-ban treaty that Congress has refused to ratify, and by working to halt the production of new fissile material everywhere. But only a sweeping vision of a world free from the bomb can start such a process, Nunn says. "I don't believe the steps are possible without the vision."

It has been a long journey to this point. Twenty years ago, he says, the Wall Street Journal article "would not have been possible. I would not have been in that mood at that stage, and I said so." Today, in fact, Nunn finds himself unexpectedly aligned with the original abolitionist vision that he only recently urged Ted Turner to de-emphasize. It is a vision many Democrats say Nunn could bring into a future Democratic administration, possibly as secretary of state or defense. (In a recent speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, Hillary Clinton cited Nunn and the N.T.I. as her inspiration for a bill to create a White House nuclear-terrorism adviser.)

But Nunn knows it could be another 20 years — probably more — before such a vision can be realized, if at all. "You can probably only get to the achievement with the next generation," he says. "Probably none of the people who signed that will be able to see it through. But the world has to see that direction. Perhaps then a younger generation will see that the goal is achievable."

Correction: February 24, 2007

An article on Page 50 of The Times Magazine this weekend, about Sam Nunn, head of the Nuclear Threat Initiative and former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, misstates the name of a company on whose board he serves. It is Chevron, not ChevronTexaco. The article also misspells the surname of a former secretary of state with whom Nunn and others wrote a recent op-ed article for The Wall Street Journal. He is George P. Shultz, not Schulz. And the article misspells the surname of the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency in several references. He is Mohamed ElBaradei, not ElBaredei.

Post-Putin (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times Magazine, February 25, 2007

Sergei B. Ivanov walked in late to the holiday performance of the army's Academy of Song and Dance. He sat in a seat saved for him between a mop-haired boy and a girl with a fluffy white ribbon in her hair. He watched, stiffly tapping his foot, as Soldier Ivan danced with fairies on his way to saving the children's New Year's presents from the old witch Baba Yaga. Grandfather Frost Russia's Santa Claus arrived in the end, of course, with gifts for the children in the audience, sons and daughters of Russia's military men. The soldier/actor's voice boomed as he introduced "a very big present," "our wonderful guest": Ivanov, then the country's minister of defense (and soon to be named first deputy prime minister), the man who might well be the next president of Russia.

"Dear friends," Ivanov began, his voice tinny by comparison. His face appeared pinched, his lips as thin as the hair parted sharply on the left. Pale, trim, dressed in a dark suit with an open collar, he looked like a secret agent. Which, in fact, is what he was in Finland and Kenya (and maybe in Sweden and England), working for the K.G.B. as the Soviet Union was collapsing. As history shows, a former intelligence officer might be just what Russia wants in a leader.

"It is very pleasant for me today to share your holiday because all adults — and even the minister of defense — were kids sometime," he went on, awkwardly. "And I remember it well: the smell of fir-tree needles, the fir tree, the smell of mandarins" — famous for ripening in the depth of Russia's winter — "the fir-tree decorations, which I could not wait to get out of the box and help the adults decorate the New Year tree. I will never forget it." He is not a natural politician, at least not a politician skilled in the glad-handing, smooth-talking art of campaigning for elected office. He grew up in a country — the Soviet Union — where that was irrelevant.

It might still be. Ivanov, who is 54, is a leading contender to become only the third elected president in Russia's history, replacing Vladimir V. Putin, the steely, steady president who, according to the country's adolescent Constitution, must step down early in 2008 after two full terms in office. At least he is presumed to be a contender, just as there is presumed to be an election, scheduled for March 2, 2008.

Ivanov has never expressed the desire to be president — neither in public nor, as far as anyone who knows will tell, in private. Neither has Dmitri A. Medvedev, the other first deputy prime minister and the other presumed-to-be-leading candidate. Nor have Valentina I. Matviyenko, the energetic governor of St. Petersburg; Vladimir I. Yakunin, another former K.G.B. agent who heads the state-owned Russian Railways; Sergei S. Sobyanin, a former governor and the president's chief of staff; Dmitri N. Kozak, the presidential envoy to the turbulent Caucasus; Boris V. Gryzlov, the speaker of the lower house of Parliament; Sergei M. Mironov, the chairman of the upper house; or Sergei V. Chemizov, director of the state arms-marketing monopoly who served as an intelligence officer with Putin in East Germany.

All have been mentioned as possible successors to Putin, not because they have said anything or even distinguished themselves in any particular way but because they are close to Putin. All, with the exception of Sobyanin, are old friends and allies from his hometown, then Leningrad, now St. Petersburg. No one knows for sure who might emerge as a candidate, because Putin himself will decide, and he has given no indication yet of his final choice. What is certain is that whomever he selects will become the next president of Russia.

Putin's problem — and it is of his own making — is that it has become impossible to imagine anyone else in charge. His genuine popularity, nourished by the czarlike aura cultivated around him, has smothered any chance for an alternative national leader to emerge, even one of his own choosing. There is a reason that the coming vote is not called the "2008 election" as often as it is the "2008 problem."

Post-Soviet Russia is still a young country, one attached to a very old history of hereditary and, more recently, nonhereditary transfers of power. The new Russia has had, arguably, only one truly competitive presidential election, meaning that the outcome was not clear beforehand. That was in 1996, when the country's first president, Boris N. Yeltsin, held off a challenge from the Communist leader, Gennadi A. Zyuganov, after a tainted campaign and vote that nonetheless had the blessing of the democratizing West. An ailing Yeltsin simply anointed Putin his successor, plucking an unknown and untested figure from the secret services to be his prime minister in August 1999 and then four months later to be acting president.

Putin had never been elected anything in his life. And yet he went into his first election in March 2000 as the incumbent (albeit as acting president) and cruised through the process with all the trappings of power, including decisive control of most of television. He beat Zyuganov comfortably in the first round with 52 percent of the vote (bolstered perhaps, as The Moscow Times reported, by ballot stuffing in some regions).

By 2004 he faced a diminished crop of candidates, second-tier party leaders who either expressed support for Putin's re-election or foundered in oblivion, barred from television appearances and harassed by such government tactics as untimely fire inspections at campaign rallies. It was a rout, one so skewed in favor of Putin — who, officially, won 71 percent — that it became farcical.

Putin has unquestionably transformed the country, righting it, to a degree, after its perilous stagger through the 1990s, when chaos, crime and corruption raged, but he has done so by creating an authoritarian system that is only nominally democratic (in that Russia still holds elections, as the Soviet Union did). He reined in elected governors from the provinces and their representatives in Moscow. He chased into exile or into prison prominent businessmen seen as political challengers. He pulled all of the national television networks back under state control. He so imposed the Kremlin's will on the legislative bodies that they are now controlled by political parties lacking any real identity except as vassals of Putin. He has been accused of creating a Soviet Union Lite or, alternatively, a new imperial Russia, with himself as a 21st-century czar, a unifying figure above politics, beyond criticism, in absolute control. His supporters dispute this, but there is no question that he has consolidated virtually all political and, increasingly, economic power into his hands, or at least into the hands of the small cadre of aides whom he has entrusted as stewards of the country's natural resources and strategic enterprises.

Kremlin Inc. has become the name for the hybrid system Putin created: capitalism with an authoritarian face. The search for his replacement has started to look less like a political campaign and more like a boardroom struggle to select a new C.E.O. As at most corporations, the process is out of the public eye, the result presented to shareholders as a fait accompli. And like most executives, Putin is susceptible to choosing someone most like himself. "I don't think it's going to be a radical change," Ivanov said in December.

Announcing one's own candidacy is, in fact, tantamount to declaring one's open opposition to the Kremlin, to the smooth transition of power, to Putin himself. Even the parliamentary opposition is wary of doing that. So far in this quasi-election season only two people have done it: a former prime minister, Mikhail M. Kasyanov, and, improbably, Aleksandr V. Donskoi, the youthful mayor of Arkhangelsk, a small port city on the White Sea.

Both promptly came under the scrutiny of prosecutors, even as the mass media piled on in the way they never do with today's authorities, certainly not the likes of Putin, Ivanov or Medvedev. Kasyanov was accused of arranging the shady privatization of a luxury summer house on the Moscow River, Donskoi of falsifying a university diploma when he first ran for mayor two years ago.

On the day in November when I first met Donskoi in Moscow, intrigued by the audacity of his decision to run for president of all Russia, investigators raided his office up in Arkhangelsk. As we spoke, his wife, Marina, and an aide answered insistent phone calls from home and relayed progress reports. "I realize all the responsibilities," Donskoi, a supermarket tycoon, told me. "I understand there could be difficulties, including physical threats. It's already taking place."

A month later he was back visiting Moscow and called a sparsely attended news conference to denounce an intensifying campaign against him. He denied having falsified his diploma and went on to explain, among other things, his interest in "gypsy hypnosis." Marina Donskaya interrupted him, having lost patience with the pressure. "He's not gay!" she shouted, referring to slurs that had been appearing in the Arkhangelsk press. "He impregnated me."

By February, prosecutors had opened three cases against him. Donskoi, only 36 years old, unknown outside of Arkhangelsk and perhaps better off for it, would stand little chance in a real campaign to be the leader of a country as sprawling, complex and deeply troubled as Russia. That's not the point. The point is that Putin's Russia does not dare to hold an open competition for the highest office in the land — one where even a long shot like Donskoi could at least make a case for himself. That, more than anything else Putin has done, is the biggest threat to democracy.

"All of us believed in the new, democratic Russia," Kasyanov, the other upstart candidate, told me. He served as Putin's prime minister from 2000 to 2004, representing the continuity from the presidency of Boris N. Yeltsin. On the eve of his re-election, though, Putin sacked him, setting him adrift in political obscurity to ward off prosecutors, so far successfully. From an office tower in southern Moscow, Kasyanov now runs a consultancy devoted mostly to his campaign. A large telescope stands beside an enormous plate-glass window. It points at the Kremlin.

"There is no possibility for a free and fair election," he said, his tone evoking those democrats and liberals who once occupied positions of influence inside the Kremlin during the 1990s but now sound simply discouraged. "Right now there is an issue of the survival of the democratic state."

Last year, Putin said that he had been thinking about his replacement from the moment he became president in 2000, but Operation Successor, as it has been called, began in earnest in November 2005, when the Kremlin announced that Putin had given promotions to two of his closest aides, loyal men he brought to Moscow with him when he began his rise to power in the 1990s: Dmitri Medvedev and Sergei Ivanov.

Medvedev had previously served as his chief of staff and chairman of a huge state-owned utility, Gazprom, which he still is. He became first deputy prime minister, a newly created position under Prime Minister Mikhail Y. Fradkov, a jowly bureaucrat whose three years in office have been notable for a lack of influence. Ivanov, Putin's comrade and eventual superior in the Soviet K.G.B., became deputy prime minister — a rung below Medvedev — having served as head of the state security council and, significantly, the first civilian minister of defense in Russia's (and the Soviet Union's) history. Like Putin, neither has ever been elected to office.

While it was never stated, the significance was clear: both were being groomed for higher office. When I asked Aleksandr Y. Lebedev, a former K.G.B. officer, member of Russia's lower house of Parliament and one of the world's richest men, about Operation Successor, he suggested I watch television. His advice recalls the old cold warriors analyzing the array of Soviet leaders on Red Square's grandstand: Kremlinology on the nightly news. Lebedev could tell that Putin's mind was not yet made up. "You can take a chronometer," he said when we met in November. "If one is given seven minutes, the other will be given seven minutes."

The news is not as propagandistic as it was in Soviet times, but it has also ceased to be a forum for a national discussion or debate on matters involving politics and Putin personally. He is never criticized. His two anointed aides receive the same deference. Ivanov and Medvedev now appear almost as often as Putin and certainly more than their nominal boss, Prime Minister Fradkov. They preside over meetings of ministers, make statements, explain to ordinary Russians the duties the president has assigned to them. Anything critical — say, questions about the exoneration of Ivanov's son, Aleksandr, after his car struck and killed a pedestrian — never appears.

Few Ivanov or Medvedev events pass unheralded. Ivanov's appearance at the army's holiday concert was utterly inconsequential, yet it appeared on the evening news programs on all three state networks anyway. Rossiya, one of the state channels, even repeated an expanded version on its prime time news. Two children asked him to let the troupe perform for the military in Vladikavkaz, the southern city that has served as the staging base for troops waging war in Chechnya. Of course, Ivanov promised — as long as the performers on the stage beside him agreed. (The performance had already been scheduled.) Not long after the New Year, the troupe performed in Vladikavkaz and again was featured on the news, along with a reminder of the man who had made sure it happened.

Ivanov seems, in person, far more pragmatic and less prone to nationalistic declarations than his public statements would lead you to expect. At a dinner in late December with foreign reporters, he outlined a reasoned view of geopolitics and his own goals for modernizing Russia's military. Ivanov rose through the ranks of the K.G.B. and its successor agencies, including the foreign intelligence service and the Federal Security Service. Still, ever since he met Putin in 1977 while both were studying to be K.G.B. officers — "I don't want to go into the details," he said — his public prominence has owed itself to Putin's rise to power.

When it came to his own future, he demurred. "I do not think about it," he said. "You may not believe it, but I don't. The presidential campaign hasn't started," he added, crossing himself as the Russian Orthodox do, "and I hope it won't start for a long time."

It was hard to believe this diffidence when, a few weeks later, I joined him on a visit to an artillery training base and a MiG testing facility in Kolomna, two hours southeast of Moscow. He touted his plan to create family advisory councils to combat abuse and corruption and his negotiations to sell the newest MiG 35 to India. Both are ostensibly chores of Ivanov's current job, but his trip to a youth hockey championship in a small city, Sudogda, sponsored by a youth sports organization that he created, called New Generation, was nothing more than image building. It was all on the news again, with Ivanov appearing in one instance before a military recruiting poster. "Make Your Choice," it said.

Ivanov is portrayed as a hard-liner, part of the clan of Putin aides known as the siloviki, or people of power. Medvedev is the (comparatively) liberal, democratic reformer, from the clan representing the modernizing businessmen. Both are oversimplifications, since their singular positions are entirely dependent on their close, personal relations with and loyalty to Putin, who is unquestionably in charge. Having (apparently) launched Operation Successor, he later suggested that there could be still more candidates. "Yes, that's possible, especially since the list is not very long," he said in Shanghai last June. Pressed if it could be a dark horse, someone unknown, someone like he was under Yeltsin, he threw out more bait. "Completely unknown?" he said. "Not really. Such people are known to everyone, but their names are simply not mentioned."

Valentina I. Matviyenko has, in fact, been mentioned — as someone who could be the first woman to rule Russia since Catherine the Great. She has been governor of St. Petersburg, Russia's second city, since Putin removed her predecessor and cleared the way for her election in 2003. A former apparatchik in the Communist Party, she became a diplomat, serving as ambassador to Malta when the Soviet Union was falling apart and then to Greece during Yeltsin's presidency, before becoming a deputy prime minister in 1998. As governor, she has demonstrated unwavering loyalty to Putin, even when he ended direct elections of governors like her following the Beslan siege in 2004. In a magazine interview at the time, she declared that Russians were not ready for experiments with electoral democracy. "The mentality of the Russian demands a lord, a czar, a president," she said.

When I met her in December, Matviyenko expressed disdain for electoral politics. Her own election campaign in 2003 she called "the most difficult point in my life," and she deplored the "dirty side" of elections: money and lies, understandably, but also what she derided as the "million promises" made by her opponent, as though campaign promises were somehow inappropriate. She said that legislative bodies should be elected, but executive power could not risk elections. "This is because, unfortunately, if a mistake is made during the elections, it would be practically impossible to correct it during the official's term," she told me in her office inside Smolny Institute, built in the 19th century as a school for the daughters of Russian nobility.

She is no longer accountable to the voters, to the people. Putin's post-Beslan decree means that she, like governors or presidents of Russia's 88 regions, serves at his will, ratified by the local legislative assembly. (Not one has balked at any of Putin's choices.) When I asked her about 2008 and her own prospects as a candidate, she said she would take herself out of the running: she had work yet to do in St. Petersburg. To end speculation, she explained, she would resign, which she in fact did two days later. She then petitioned Putin for a vote of confidence. He obliged a day later, reappointing her to a new term. On Dec. 20, the city's Parliament, following a speech by another of Putin's potential successors, Sergei Sobyanin, voted 40 to 3 to confirm the president's choice. Matviyenko began a new term as governor that will last until the end of 2011, when, unless something revolutionary happens in the meantime, Putin's chosen successor will reconsider her appointment.

Her reappointment showed how seamlessly Putin has imposed order on the unpredictable whims of electoral politics, removing chance, surprise and competition. "People do not want any more revolutions," Matviyenko told me in the Smolny Institute, which Lenin chose as his headquarters during the Bolshevik revolution and where he lived and worked in two modest rooms, preserved to this day as they were in 1917. "People want the quiet development of the country, stable development, without shake-ups. They would like to see a president who can guarantee the succession of power."

By late January, according to the buzz, a front-runner had emerged. Dmitri Medvedev led a large delegation of Russians to the World Economic Forum, the annual gathering of the world's business and political elite in Davos, Switzerland. Compared with Ivanov, Medvedev remains largely unknown outside Russia. He is only 41 years old, a boyish lawyer, co-author of a textbook on civil law and lecturer at St. Petersburg State University's School of Law, Putin's alma mater. He has served as an aide to Putin for 15 years now, ever since both worked for St. Petersburg's governor, Anatoly A. Sobchak, who was among the most vocal advocates of democracy and economic reforms even before the Soviet collapse. His rise to the second-highest post in government is inseparable from Putin's rise to the presidency. Davos was his foreign coming-out party, one so successful that analysts in Moscow declared Operation Successor complete.

"Russia is a country that, in the 20th century, was subjected to hard trials, revolutions, civil war, world wars and economic collapse," Medvedev said in Davos, concluding a detailed exposition in Russian of Putin's economic and political policies with a passage in stilted but fluent English. "Today we are building new institutions based on the fundamental principles of full-fledged democracy."

On an icy day earlier this month, I followed him on one of the routine working visits so prominently featured on the nightly news — in this case to Veliki Novgorod, the ancient Russian city 300 miles northwest of Moscow. The trip included visits to a children's clinic, a new subdivision and a mortgage center, all beneficiaries of the "national projects." He basked in the praise of the officials he met, but he also faced polite queries on the need for more financing and on certain unintended consequences of the national-project policy. It seemed very much like Dmitri Medvedev's Listening Tour. At a meeting with regional leaders and businessmen, he heard that prices for construction materials in the region skyrocketed following the government's plan to build affordable housing. At Children's Clinic No. 3, renovated for the first time in 30 years, a nurse noted that only three babies had been born who were actually eligible for the new grants intended to stimulate the birth rate and halt the country's alarming population decline.

Medvedev jotted notes, fidgeted, shuffled papers; he often speaks to the floor or table in front of him. Physically, he is not an imposing figure: short and compact, and having lost weight over the last year, he is very much like Putin. He commands detail like his mentor, and with increasing confidence.

At the clinic, Medvedev acknowledged that much work remained to be done, but he boasted that the "national projects" were working. "This kind of quick rehabilitation of medical institutions has never occurred in history," he said in remarks broadcast that night.

The one thing not mentioned until the end of the day was Medvedev's future. His aide, Zhanna Odintsova, even took polite exception when I suggested the trips had the feel of a political campaign. She also told me that while I could attend the day's last event — a roundtable interview with journalists from the neighboring regions — I did not "have the right to ask a question." So I planted my question with a willing colleague, Alyona Khozova, a correspondent with Ren TV in Vologda.

After an hour of questions about the national projects, about his hobbies (he swims every evening and tries to teach his son to distinguish right from wrong) and about his plans to visit various regions, Khozova asked the final question. "Lately the topic of a successor to Vladimir Putin has been circulating," she began.

That was as far as she got. Medvedev cut her off with a laugh. "I am not now working on anything directly," he said. "I am engaged completely with those affairs that we just discussed. And I like this work. It surprises me in a good way. I experience a kind of 'drive,' if you will, from these activities and will take that which I have received to its logical conclusion."

Putin's greatest legacy would be a smooth succession of power, still a rare occurrence in a country with the violent, authoritarian past that Russia has. History might ultimately judge him as Russia's George Washington, the man who did not let the possibility of retaining personal power overrule a young country's laws and democratic principles. Still, there are those who wish that he would stay, that the Constitution would be amended to allow him to run for a third term he would undoubtedly win. He could do so easily, given the unwavering obsequiousness of Parliament. Regional Parliaments across Russia have drafted referendums on the issue from Primoriye on the Pacific Coast to Chechnya, the battered ruin of a republic whose war for secession Putin has effectively crushed, at the cost of tens of thousands of lives.

"We think that Putin should complete both the political and economic reforms that he began and should have at minimum two more terms — three or four more terms," the speaker of Chechnya's Parliament, Dukuvakha B. Abdurakhmanov, told me by telephone in mid-January. Chechnya's petition by that point had already garnered the support of two dozen of Russia's regions, raising the possibility the issue could yet come to a vote in the Parliament. "The number of terms should not decide the end of his presidency, but rather his age and health."

Putin continues to demur, even as he opens the door for speculation. "As for myself, as I have said, the Constitution — even though I like my work — the Constitution does not give me a right to stand for a third consecutive term," he said in an annual televised call-in program in October. His use of "consecutive" prompted many to believe he might yet come back for re-election in 2012.

Part of what fuels the uncertainty surrounding the succession is what Putin will do once a second term ends. He will be only 55. It is hard to imagine him slipping into quiet retirement. Speculation abounds that he intends to remain an unelected power, overseeing the country from behind the scenes. He could take over a party (though he has yet to join one), become the speaker of Parliament or emerge as the leader of the as-yet unrealized union of Belarus and Russia. Rumor has long had it that he could take over Gazprom, the huge state gas and oil company, now one of the world's largest corporations and still growing. He could reap the rewards that his authoritarian capitalism has brought Russia, though he once said he was not a businessman by temperament.

On Feb. 1, Putin held his annual full-dress press conference and swatted aside repeated questions about his successor and his future. "There will be no successor," he said. "There will be candidates for the post of president of Russia." He did not mention Medvedev, Ivanov or the others, not once, which prompted a new round of speculation that the speculation about Medvedev and Ivanov had, perhaps, been misplaced. Pressed, he would say only that he reserved the right to express a choice. "But I will do it only when the election campaign starts," he said.

By strict letter of the law, campaigns in Russia last only 30 days. Putin could put off his endorsement, as it were, until the last minute. In the meantime, he is keeping people guessing. On Feb. 15, he unexpectedly promoted Ivanov to the same rank as Medvedev, giving Russia two first deputy prime ministers and shifting the buzz yet again.

Opposition to Putin exists. In December, Andrei N. Illarionov, a former economic adviser of Putin's until he resigned more than a year ago to protest the government's authoritarianism, described the succession process as something out of the Middle Ages. "It does not matter what kind of successor one is, smart or not too smart, a pleasant one or not too pleasant," he said at a news conference. "It does not matter. The choice between this and that makes no sense. One thing matters. It is that the transfer of power to one's heir should not happen in a modern, civilized and normal country." There are candidates who will run against

Putin's chosen heir, representing the greatly diminished Communist Party or the Liberal Democratic Party, whose nationalist leader, Vladimir V. Zhirinovsky, has long ago ceased opposing the Kremlin. But they will enjoy none of the advantages of Putin's heir, and they will lose.

Still, Valentina Matviyenko might be right. Russians are not in a revolutionary mood now that the country is more stable, now that salaries and pensions are paid, now that consumers can indulge in everything Europeans can — except political choice.

In December, the authorities refused to grant a permit for a march organized by Other Russia, an amalgam of disaffected political organizations, including one created by Garry Kasparov, the former chess champion who retired in 2005 to wage a lonely campaign to make Russia politically free. The authorities authorized only a rally, to be held on Triumphal Square. Four days before it, the interior ministry's counterterrorism police raided Kasparov's office and seized posters advertising the march. As I approached on the morning of the rally, truckloads of soldiers lined every street in the area; a helicopter hovered overhead. Street sweepers, snowplows and buses blocked the main street while soldiers stood in formation, two layers deep.

Inside a fenced area were perhaps 2,000 protesters; organizers' estimates of 4,000 or more were exaggerated. The organizers later said that hundreds of participants had been stopped at checkpoints on the roads or at train stations. Those who made it included aging liberals of Mikhail S. Gorbachev's Glasnost, now 20 years past, and radical youth, including the committed members of two organizations, the National Bolsheviks, known for stunts like being arrested while occupying government offices, and the Red Youth Vanguard, whose red-and-black flag incorporates an AK-47. The police and soldiers on hand outnumbered them by four to one or more.

"They are afraid that one day we will say, 'Enough,' " Kasparov yelled from the back of a flatbed truck with a Dolce & Gabbana billboard as a backdrop. His voice was drowned out by the chopping thud of the helicopter overhead. He led a chant — "We need the Other Russia," after the movement's name — but the chants faded after a couple of rounds.

One Cold War Was Enough (WP)

By Sergei Lavrov

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

There has been much misinterpretation in the West since President Vladimir Putin's recent speech at the Munich Conference on Security Policy. From the reaction of some Western journalists and politicians, one would think that the Russian president wished to ignite a blast of anti-American rhetoric to spark another Cold War. Defense Secretary Robert Gates got it right when he responded by asserting that "one Cold War was quite enough." Indeed it was, so let's not declare -- or look for a pretext to declare -- a new one. At a time when Russia is ready and eager to play a positive role in world affairs and integrate into the global economy, it does far more harm than good to treat Russia as a hostile nation whenever Moscow and Washington disagree.

What Putin actually said in Munich was not new. He said nothing that we have not discussed directly with the Bush administration and that is not whispered in political circles in Europe and elsewhere. He made these statements at a conference because he wanted to get the world's attention to begin a dialogue about what kind of world we want for our children and ourselves. Putin believes, as do many others, that the world cannot be dictated to by a single country. History shows that this has been attempted repeatedly but has never worked. Recent unilateral actions have not resolved problems but actually exacerbated them and created new hotbeds of tension.

If you read the president's entire speech, you will see that Putin was neither attacking the United States nor proposing Russia as a counterbalance to U.S. unilateralism. Instead, he called for a world with many centers of influence where different interests work together, multilaterally, to shape a common denominator on global issues. The recent six-nation agreement on North Korea's nuclear program proves that this pragmatic approach can work.

In fact, Putin offered more instances of mutual agreement between the United States and Russia than examples of discord. As he noted, we are strong partners on counterterrorism and nuclear nonproliferation. We have a common stake in ensuring global energy security as agreed to at the Group of Eight summit last July in St. Petersburg.

Our American colleagues tell us that the United States needs Russia and other key countries to help resolve numerous regional conflicts. Against this background, America's unilateral actions look puzzling. It's also ironic that Putin's speech was deemed threatening. Russian citizens ask themselves: Who threatens whom? With the Warsaw Pact dissolved for more than 15 years, why does NATO still spread toward Russian borders? What should Russia believe when the United States seeks to place anti-missile systems in Eastern Europe? And instead of joining efforts to counter global threats, should our two countries really be engaged in searching for deficiencies in each other's domestic life?

As Russians struggled with the chaos and weakness that dogged us in the first post-Soviet years, some might have gained the impression that our voice would never be heard on the world stage. A stronger, more vibrant Russia has emerged from the rubble of the 1990s. Our economy continues to expand and diversify; our people look forward to the progress and prosperity that our new society can deliver through technological innovation and social programs. And a growing middle class benefits from the robust business climate that attracts more and more foreign investments: In 2006, for example, net inflow of capital to Russia surpassed $40 billion.

It only makes sense that we would hold our own views and expect them to be taken seriously, whether they concern vital security matters or terms of economic interaction. We are strongly committed to democracy, and we will not compromise the right of the Russian people to decide things for themselves and be heard on international issues.

In any relationship, disagreements arise. But observers make a grave error when they mistake the honest and open airing of concerns as some sort of casus belli. President Bush rightly emphasized the other day that, while differences exist between our two countries, "there's also a relationship in which we can find common ground to solve problems." Russia is ready to work with the United States on an equal and mutually respectful basis.

Another Cold War? Certainly not. A democratic world in which a strong Russia coexists with a strong United States, as well as a strong Europe, China, India, Brazil and others? That is Vladimir Putin's vision -- and it is well worth considering.

Missile Fantasies (WP)

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

The administration's rush to deploy missile defenses in Europe brings a sinister response from Russia.

THE EMERGING debate over the deployment of U.S missile defenses in Central Europe is based on a series of false pretenses. The Bush administration pretends that it is sensible to invest $225 million next year in preparing to install ground-based interceptors and radar systems in Poland and the Czech Republic to defend against an attack from Iran, even though the glitch-plagued defense system hasn't yet proved workable and Iran doesn't have a missile that could reach the United States or Europe. The Polish and Czech governments, eager to deepen strategic cooperation with the United States, pretend that they will benefit from hosting the systems, even though they have little reason to worry about threats from the Middle East and the Bush administration has been slow to reward their past collaboration in Afghanistan and Iraq.

The prize for cynical posturing, nevertheless, goes to Russia, which in the past few days has suddenly advanced a claim that it knows to be false: that the deployment of the antimissile system would weaken the Russian nuclear deterrent. As Russian President Vladimir Putin and his generals know, even if U.S. interceptors in Poland could function according to the Bush administration's scheme -- which they can't, and won't anytime soon -- they would not be capable of stopping a single Russian intercontinental ballistic missile, much less the massive force that remains at Moscow's disposal. U.S. officials have met with Russian counterparts on at least 10 occasions to explain this.

Mr. Putin and his generals nevertheless are threatening that Russia might respond to the U.S. missile defenses by redeploying intermediate-range missiles that were banned from Europe by a 1987 treaty. An even more sinister comment came Monday from the commander of Russian missile forces, who said that if Poland and the Czech Republic hosted the U.S. rockets and radars, they would be targeted by Russia's strategic missiles. This crude attempt at intimidating Moscow's former Soviet satellites predictably produced a defiant response from the two governments and probably eliminated any domestic opposition to an otherwise questionable venture. As Czech Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg put it, "The Czechs will now think the shield is even more necessary."

The Bush administration's pushing of this initiative, which would not result in the deployment of any interceptors in Europe before 2010, is probably motivated by the same political impulses that have driven missile defense since 2001. Administration officials are determined to create a program so literally set in concrete that it can't be stopped or reversed by future presidents -- as was the missile defense program of President George H.W. Bush. Whether the technology actually works or a threat exists that justifies the rush never seems to matter much.

Such sandbagging justifies close scrutiny by Congress of the Pentagon's $10 billion funding request for missile defense in next year's budget, including the funds for Poland and the Czech Republic. But the Russian gamesmanship is more worrisome. On the opposite page today, Mr. Putin's foreign minister denies any interest in confrontation. But at the same time Mr. Putin may use the U.S. defense program as an excuse to revive a major piece of the Soviet nuclear arsenal with which to threaten NATO members in Europe. It's hard to think of a quicker way to revive the Cold War.

Rivals On Legal Tightrope Seek To Widen Freedoms In China (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136602

BEIJING — Li Jinsong and Li Jianqiang are Chinese trial lawyers who take on difficult political cases, tangle with the police and seek solace in the same religion, Christianity.

But like many who devote themselves to expanding freedoms and the rule of law in China, the two spend as much time clashing over tactics and principles as they do challenging the ruling Communist Party.

The two Mr. Lis are part of a momentous struggle over the rule of law in China. Young, well educated and idealistic, they and other members of the so-called weiquan, or rights defense, movement, aim to use the laws and courts that the Communist Party has put in place as part of its modernization drive to constrain the party's power.

The informal network of rights defenders may be the only visible force for political openness and change in China at a time when the surging economy and the country's rapidly expanding global influence have otherwise strengthened party leaders. The authorities have refrained from suppressing it entirely, at least partly because it operates carefully within the law and uses China's judicial system, as well as the news media, to advance its aims.

Yet nearly 18 years after the June 4, 1989, crackdown on pro-democracy protesters in Beijing, China quickly crushes any organized opposition. Rights defenders face the delicate task of coordinating their actions and expanding their collective influence when they remain autonomous, rudderless and, very often, rivalrous.

The two Mr. Lis have feuded about how to handle big court cases. When they met the Bush administration's China specialists in the White House last November, they argued about whether top leaders like President Hu Jintao were basically benevolent. A joint interview on Radio Free Asia devolved into a shouting match over whether rights defenders could work with party leaders or should actively oppose them.

As their confrontation grew, Li Jianqiang, the more combative of the two, wrote a manifesto that called China a "super jail" and described its leaders as "ruthless dictators." He listed Li Jinsong's name as the lead author and posted it on the Internet.

Li Jinsong, who takes a much softer line, said the essay, which circulated widely, so enraged China's top leaders that it derailed a major appeals court victory in his highest-profile case, involving China's "barefoot lawyer," Chen Guangcheng. The essay may also have given the police in Shandong Province an excuse to send some thugs who assaulted him, he said. Li Jianqiang acknowledged a few weeks later that he wrote the essay himself. But he said it amounted to a minor mistake and dismissed claims that it had a direct impact on the court case.

They and the dozens of other advocates who consider themselves rights defenders have had notable victories, mostly by calling attention to problems at the local level that more senior officials move to fix. They have exposed corruption, illegal land seizures and labor and environmental abuses that have prompted policy changes or at least made many Chinese more aware of the concept of human rights.

As China's only consistent homegrown critics of government abuses, they have received attention from the international news media and human rights groups. President Bush invited several rights defenders to the White House last spring.

Yet they are, as the nationalist leader Sun Yat-sen lamented about Chinese opposition groups in an earlier era, "grains of sand." They divide into camps on the fundamental question of whether to try to improve the current Communist Party-run system by supporting well-intentioned party leaders, or to seek an end to Communist rule. "Some of us are waiting for a good emperor, some kind of Gorbachev, to come and fix the system," Li Jianqiang said. "Many of the rest of us think that is a waste of time. We need to be building a civilization outside the Communist Party."

Change From Within

That debate is a delicate one for a group whose basic goals — helping people exercise the rights granted to them, at least on paper, by an authoritarian government — at least nominally overlap with those of the party's leadership.

China's top leaders, committed to attracting foreign investment and making the country a respected world power, have promised to conform to human rights norms and to run the country "according to law."

The Communist Party often does not subject itself to the laws it enacts, prompting cynicism about its real intentions. But many rights defenders say they can help bring about meaningful change because the party and government bureaucracy is not monolithic.

Top party leaders, according to this way of thinking, hope to use the legal system and the news media to check abuses of power at the local level, which they view as threats to their own popularity and longevity.

The defining moment came in 2003. Prime Minister Wen Jiabao seized on a case of a migrant worker beaten to death by the police that had been championed by rights defenders. He abolished vagrancy laws that gave the police the authority to round up migrants at will.

Rights defenders concluded that grass-roots organizing and the tactical use of local courts could allow them to circumvent local fiefs in China's authoritarian bureaucracy and appeal directly to more enlightened leaders at the top.

"China is slowly transforming itself from rule of man to rule of law," Li Jinsong said. "I believe that this process has the support of the top leaders. They face resistance within the system, and they need outside help."

But this view, once widespread, has fallen out of favor among other rights defenders. Li Jianqiang calls it a "peasant mentality" because farmers since feudal times have looked to the emperor, presumed to be benevolent, to solve problems they say are caused by venal local officials.

He contends that President Hu, who once talked as though he wanted to expand constitutional rights and strengthen the legal system, has more recently done the reverse.

In internal party speeches, Mr. Hu has called on officials to guard against "color revolutions" of the kind that swept Central Asia and Central Europe, which officials here attributed to a potent combination of civic and social organizations and foreign forces. Mr. Hu has clamped down on lawyers and journalists and tightened the party's control over the courts.

Gao Zhisheng, one of the most outspoken rights defenders, was arrested and convicted of subversion last year, though he was given a suspended sentence because the authorities said he provided information about other dissidents. Another rights defender, Guo Feixiong, was arrested and faces charges of illegal business activity. A third, Guo Guoting, fearing police intimidation or possible prosecution, fled to Canada.

"The strategy of submitting petitions and using legal actions to draw the emperor's attention is a proven failure," Li Jianqiang said. "It ends up encouraging rule by man, not rule of law."

Same Name, Two Paths

Li Jinsong and Li Jianqiang became lawyers in 1994. Both are Christians. The similarities do not run much deeper.

Li Jianqiang, 42, lives in the east coast city of Qingdao. He eagerly discusses politics and the law. He relates his run-ins with China's police or State Security officials like war stories. He has an impish smile.

As an employee of the Qingdao city government, he joined public protests in favor of democracy in 1989. When the military shot student protesters in Beijing on June 4, 1989, local governments moved to weed out people who had supported the students. Mr. Li lost his job.

He returned to school to study law, but never shed his reputation as a troublemaker. He took on cases involving accusations of police or government malfeasance, but he said he was often harassed by local authorities. Increasingly, he found it difficult to represent clients in his home province, Shandong.

So he became itinerant. He defended a journalist accused of leaking state secrets in Hunan Province and a writer accused of posting subversive materials on the Internet in Hubei Province. Recently, he sued local authorities in Zhejiang Province after they demolished a Christian church that the government had not sanctioned.

He met other young lawyers who called themselves rights defenders. He became a Christian in 2005, he said, when some of them introduced him to the religion. He worships in an unofficial "family" church in Qingdao.

"I decided we have a spiritual vacuum in our society that only God can replace," he said.

Li Jinsong, 41, practices law in Beijing. He often wears dark business suits over dark shirts. That, along with a courteous and deferential manner, gives him the air of a priest. But he frowns and speaks in clipped phrases when asked to discuss his personal background, including his religion. He said he began attending a government-authorized Protestant church in 1988.

"It's not something I deny, but not something I like to talk about publicly," he said softly.

Though he practices commercial law, he has also defended "vulnerable people," as he calls them. He helped migrant workers force a transportation company to stop raising ticket prices before a major holiday, when migrants scramble to return to their hometowns in the countryside. A Beijing court compelled the Finance Ministry to revise an administrative ruling against one of his clients in 2001, a milestone case that some saw as confirming a right to sue government entities.

But it was a case in Li Jianqiang's home province, Shandong, that made Li Jinsong well known in legal circles. He became the lead lawyer for Chen Guangcheng, a self-trained legal expert who, despite being blind since a childhood illness, championed peasants in legal actions against local authorities.

In 2005, Mr. Chen sought to organize a class-action lawsuit on behalf of hundreds of peasants forced to have abortions or undergo sterilization procedures after local officials in Linyi City, Shandong, failed to meet their official population-control quotas. The police put him under house arrest, and prosecutors later indicted him on charges of destroying property and disrupting traffic. Relatives and supporters say the charges were concocted to punish him.

Li Jinsong and other rights defenders used a publicity campaign to increase the pressure on local officials to treat Mr. Chen fairly, while alerting top leaders in Beijing to what they and many others said was an embarrassing abuse of authority at the local level.

Li Jianqiang, though not personally involved, criticized the strategy at the time. He wrote in an open letter that Li Jinsong had made "stupid mistakes" that backed the local authorities into a corner and did little to help Mr. Chen.

DOJ_NMG_0136604

Both men, it appeared, had reasons to think they were right. Mr. Chen's prosecution and trial, in a county court, made a mockery of China's official judicial procedures. Local thugs prevented Li Jinsong from entering Mr. Chen's village to interview witnesses. They flipped over his car when he visited. The day before the trial, the local police detained a fellow lawyer on a pretense. The verdict: guilty, and a harsh prison sentence of four years and three months for Mr. Chen.

Li Jinsong's luck changed sharply on appeal. Last October, a higher court in the city of Linyi overturned the verdict and ordered a new trial. Mr. Li and other rights defenders hailed it as a major victory. They saw the hand of more senior officials at work.

"There are some leaders who I believe are conscious of what was happening and wanted to see a fair result," he said. "We saw their intervention in this case."

A Visit to America

China's rights defenders have developed a reputation for being a force for legal, evolutionary change. In the United States, foundations and religious groups that support grass-roots activities here have backed them.

One pioneer in that effort is the China Aid Association, a religious group based in Midland, Tex., that has ties to the Bush administration. The association monitors conditions for Christians and supports rights defenders, many of whom are Christian.

Last November, the China Aid Association invited the two Mr. Lis and two other rights defenders to visit Midland and Washington. The two did not know each other well. Li Jianqiang's criticism of the handling of the Chen case did not endear them to each other. But Li Jinsong said he looked forward to the trip.

"I thought we might come to understand each other better if we met outside China," he said.

Instead, their debate intensified. After prayer sessions in Midland, in the offices of members of Congress and at foundations where they meet potential donors, the two Mr. Lis offered conflicting versions of what should be done to advance the rule of law in China. They disagreed on whether the United States should encourage political change or support top leaders who wanted to carry out such changes.

Li Jinsong, still elated about the appeals court victory in Mr. Chen's case the month before, often cited the case to support his view that the top leaders had good intentions.

Though the two lawyers smiled and stood side by side for photographs in front of the White House and State Department, they said they argued with each other when they met the Bush administration's China experts inside. When they appeared together for a broadcast on Radio Free Asia, their differences burst into the open.

Li Jinsong said during the broadcast that he had urged donors and Bush administration officials to steer aid to Communist Party officials "who do good," as well as to rights defenders hoping to improve things from the outside.

He said he wanted "to express my appreciation" for President Hu, Prime Minister Wen and Vice President Zeng Qinghong.

"These three leaders do not want to see abuses and would not tolerate them if they knew about them," he said.

Li Jianqiang said he and Li Jinsong had a "basic disagreement." Top leaders, he said, have more responsibility, not less, for human rights abuses.

He said that during the 1990s, when President Jiang Zemin was in power, there were relatively few arrests of dissident writers. Today, with Mr. Hu in charge, there are many more, he said.

"There are a larger than usual number of unjust arrests," Li Jinsong acknowledged. "But I am sure that if the top leaders knew about them, the people would be set free."

"That is nonsense," Li Jianqiang responded. "The leaders play deaf and dumb and pretend they have a real legal system."

A Prayer for China

After their meetings in Washington, Li Jinsong got the news that Chen Guangcheng's second trial, as ordered by the appeals court, would convene in a few days. He had to cut his trip short and catch the first flight home.

Just after he departed, Li Jianqiang, who stayed on in the United States, wrote an essay he titled "A Prayer for China." It said, in part, "In this free, God-blessed land, where we received a friendly reception by the American government, we must not forget our pitiable homeland."

He said China would not have a better future without "systemic change" in politics and culture. "Our government clasps chains on the people and enslaves them. In our one-party dictatorship, the law is little more than an ornament, and the rights in the Constitution are laughable lies."

On Nov. 27, the same day Mr. Chen's second trial took place in Shandong, Li Jianqiang posted the letter on a popular overseas Web site. The names of the four rights defenders on the trip were listed at the bottom. Li Jinsong's came first.

Under pressure a month later, Li Jianqiang wrote a second letter, which he also posted online, saying he made a mistake listing Li Jinsong's name. Li Jinsong said the damage was done.

DOJ_NMG_0136605

Mr. Chen's second trial was only slightly less of a mockery than the first, in the eyes of Mr. Chen's supporters. A crucial witness, who Mr. Li said was prepared to testify to providing false evidence against Mr. Chen after the police tortured him, was arrested on the eve of the trial. Three days later, the court issued the same verdict it had in the first trial, sentencing Mr. Chen to four years and three months in prison.

Li Jinsong and several other supporters of Mr. Chen say Li Jianqiang's essay may have hurt Mr. Chen's chances of a favorable verdict. Officials in Shandong used the essay to claim that Mr. Chen's supporters had been infiltrated by foreign forces seeking to undermine the Communist Party, they said.

A senior law professor and government adviser in Beijing, who is not connected to the Chen case, said he attended a meeting shortly after Mr. Chen's second trial in which top judicial officials, including Luo Gan, a member of the Politburo Standing Committee who oversees the judicial system, discussed the case. It was cited as an example of how "hostile forces" had used the courts to provoke social unrest, said the law professor, who asked not to be identified because the meeting was secret.

"We had hoped the second trial would be a fair trial," Li Jinsong said. "But the essay undercut those who wanted such a result."

Li Jianqiang acknowledges that the essay was his attempt to signal a common stance among rights defenders where none existed. But he said it could not have had the impact Li Jinsong claimed. Having been posted online the same day the trial took place, it could hardly have influenced the trial itself, he said. And he said he considered it unlikely that it prompted central government leaders to dictate a different verdict.

"In our system, the decision to convict is made before the trial, not after," he said.

Instrumental or not, the letter shows how the rights defense movement is struggling to maintain a sense of purpose amid an intensifying police crackdown and a string of public defeats.

In late December, Li Jinsong traveled to Shandong to prepare another appeal. He never reached his destination.

After entering the province, his overnight bus from Beijing was stopped on a public highway and boarded by thugs. They singled out Mr. Li and a colleague, dragged them from the bus and rained blows on their heads and bodies. They left them bloodied on the sidewalk and sped off.

Li Jinsong was treated for minor injuries. He said the local police ignored his attempt to file a complaint.

Mr. Li debated with friends whether he should try to return to Shandong to attend the appeal hearing. In the end, he did not have to decide. The judges met privately, with no lawyers present. This time, they backed the local court, sending Mr. Chen to prison.

The Three Futures Of China (LAT)

By James Mann

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

CHINA'S ANTI-SATELLITE missile test last month is merely the latest in a series of recent events that force us to question where the world's most populous country is heading. What will its political system look like in, say, 25 years?

This question will grow in importance as members of the new Democratic congressional majority — and some presidential candidates — take up the themes of economic populism. One Democratic candidate, John Edwards, has already said he doubts that he would support permanent normal trade relations with China if the matter came to a vote today. And China's future will be debated again during the Summer Olympics in Beijing next year.

It is possible to envision three scenarios for China. One can be called the Soothing Scenario: that China's authoritarian political system is bound to open up, or even that it is already evolving toward political liberalization.

Another scenario holds that China is so fundamentally unstable that it is headed for some sort of political cataclysm or economic nosedive, or both. Call this the Upheaval Scenario.

And then there is what I call the Third Scenario: that China's one-party political system will not change in any fundamental way. This view holds that China will remain an authoritarian regime over the long term.

The problem with the current U.S. debate about China is that, in public at least, political, business and financial leaders tend to talk almost exclusively about the Soothing Scenario. Some critics of our China policy warn about the Upheaval Scenario. But the Third Scenario gets far less attention — even though it is perhaps the most likely. After all, China's authoritarian political system is the status quo, and there are powerful forces at work to prevent any far-reaching change in it.

The Soothing Scenario is rooted in economic determinism. Under this view, China's increasing prosperity, its expanding trade with the rest of the world and the massive foreign investment in the country will undermine its authoritarian system and lead inevitably to political liberalization.

That is what leaders of both political parties have regularly told the American people. Over the last decade, it has become virtually obligatory for presidential candidates to voice some version of the Soothing Scenario, usually concentrating on the reassuring premise that our trade with China will transform its politics. "Trade freely with China, and time is on our side," candidate George W. Bush declared in 1999. President Clinton told Chinese President Jiang Zemin in 1997: "You're on the wrong side of history." Clinton maintained that economic changes in China would "increase the spirit of liberty over time…. I just think it's inevitable, just as inevitably the Berlin Wall fell."

The idea that China is inevitably headed for far-reaching change has become a staple of U.S. thinking in large part because it has served the interests of important constituencies. In the late 1970s and the 1980s, the belief benefited the U.S. national security establishment, which had aligned itself with China against the Soviet Union. The notion that Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping was reforming his country's political system helped defuse congressional opposition to U.S. military cooperation with China's communist regime.

In the 1990s, as trade and investment in China became increasingly important, U.S. companies were asked why they were so eager to do business with a regime that had, in 1989, ordered troops to fire on unarmed civilians. The Soothing Scenario offered an answer: Trade and the workings of "history" would inexorably liberalize China's political system, whether Chinese leaders wanted it or not.

But to believe that the spread of McDonald's and Starbucks will change China's political system is to indulge in the old mistake of thinking that the Chinese are becoming like us. Bringing in McDonald's has nothing to do with whether a government is willing to tolerate organized political opposition.

And to assume that China's emerging urban middle class will be the vanguard for far-reaching political liberalization is to ignore the fact that this is the one group — beyond the Chinese Communist Party itself — that has the strongest interest in preserving the status quo.

Proponents of the Soothing Scenario often argue that China will evolve from a repressive regime into a democratic one in roughly the same way that South Korea and Taiwan did two decades ago. But the comparison doesn't work. China has vast expanses far removed from the relatively open traditions of the country's coastal areas. Visitors who declare that China will develop like Taiwan and South Korea, based on their visits to Beijing and Shanghai, are like foreigners who travel only to New York City and Boston and conclude that the United States will behave like Western Europe.

But the biggest problem with the Soothing Scenario is that it fails to explain how the smooth transformation will take place. China's political system is still organized along Leninist lines. When, how and why will its leaders be persuaded to give up power? What if China's growing economy gives the country's leaders an ever-stronger stake in preserving the current system?

The Upheaval Scenario, including predictions of a possible breakup or collapse, is regularly advanced whenever there are short-term signs of instability in China — labor strikes, rural unrest, riots, environmental disasters. There are, however, plenty of reasons to be skeptical of such forecasts. It is too easy to overemphasize the appearance of chaos in China and to miss the reality of the country's enduring, underlying cohesion.

That leaves the Third Scenario: that China's leaders will continue to prevent any organized political opposition and keep controls over the media and the judiciary. (A few days ago, Luo Gan, a member of the Chinese Communist Party's Politburo Standing Committee, reaffirmed that judges have no right to independence, saying, "The correct political stand is where the party stands.") Only small-scale reforms, such as carefully limited village elections, would be permitted — and only as long as they do not disturb the one-party monopoly on power.

Why should Americans care about China's future? For several reasons. For one thing, it would be nice if the country's 1.3 billion people could freely choose their leaders, limit their government's power and hold it accountable. This would ensure greater political stability for China.

A China that evolved along the lines of the Third Scenario would not necessarily be a military threat to the U.S. However, it would continue to pose problems for democratic values throughout the world. In recent years, China has supported deeply repressive regimes in Myanmar, Zimbabwe, North Korea, Uzbekistan and Sudan. If democracy hangs in the balance in Russia, there is little question that China would favor an authoritarian state over one with genuine political opposition.

To see how these three scenarios play out, consider how they might apply to the 2008 Olympics. The Soothing Scenario is the one that China will try to televise to the world before and during the Olympics. Chances are that in the run-up to the Games, the Chinese leadership will take steps to show how the country is opening up.

The Upheaval Scenario is the one the Chinese leadership fears: the possibility of social unrest that would disturb the Games. There will be plenty of groups with grievances against the government eager to attract worldwide attention during the Olympics, and Chinese authorities will not want to use force against them. The result would almost certainly be a massive effort by China's internal security apparatus to head off demonstrations and to keep would-be protesters out of Beijing.

DOJ_NMG_0136607

Will we see signs of the Third Scenario at the Olympics? Not many. The best time to see whether China will really open up or remain authoritarian will be in the year or two after the visitors go home. I believe that China's current one-party system will endure far into the future.

Taiwan Premier Su Announces Presidential Bid (AFP)

AFP, February 25, 2007

Taiwan Premier Su Tseng-chang announced he will seek the ruling Democratic Progressive Party's nomination for the 2008 presidential race.

"Taiwan's history is turning to a new page. The 2008 presidential election is about to come," said Su, nicknamed the "electric fireball" because of his small stature and lack of hair.

"I have prepared myself. Now I want to sincerely tell my countrymen that I'll run for the next presidency. I implore full support of party members and countrymen," he added.

The 60-year-old, a former human rights lawyer and popular co-founder of the pro-independence Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), emphasised Taiwan's sovereignty.

China regards Taiwan as part of its territory, to be reunified by force if necessary. Taiwan and China split in 1949 at the end of a civil war.

"For the future of Taiwan, we have to unite together and stride forward," Su said.

The DPP has been pressing for independence, whereas the leading opposition Kuomintang (KMT) calls for improved ties with Beijing.

Su became the third DPP heavyweight to make public his presidential bid, following former premier Frank Hsieh, who stood down as premier a year ago, and DPP chairman Yu Shyi-kun.

These three, and Vice President Annette Lu, dubbed "three kings and one queen," are seen as the most prominent presidential contenders from the DPP.

The DPP earlier this month jumpstarted its nomination process for the 2008 presidential polls following opposition leader Ma Ying-jeou's unexpected announcement that he will run for president.

DPP members who seek official nomination must register with the party from March 5-9 to enter a party primary vote. The candidates will then compete against each other in public opinion polls.

The final outcome -- with the primary accounting for 30 percent and public surveys 70 percent of the results -- will be announced on May 30.

KMT leader Ma last week declared his presidential bid after being indicted for corruption.

Ma resigned as KMT chairman after he was accused of misusing some 11 million Taiwan dollars (about 333,000 US) in expenses when he was Taipei mayor.

No Change On Sanctions After Abbas Trip (AP)

By Angela Charlton, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 25, 2007

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas ended his European tour Saturday without persuading any country to end crippling economic sanctions based on his power-sharing deal with the rival Islamic militant Hamas.

The bright spot in his trip was a promise Saturday from French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy to work with a government that includes Hamas and Abbas' more moderate Fatah party. His comments were more positive than those of other European leaders during Abbas' four-country tour. But Douste-Blazy made no commitments on resuming aid frozen since Hamas won parliamentary elections a year ago.

Europe's governments remained firm: Any new Palestinian government must recognize Israel's right to exist before direct international aid can resume.

"I encouraged Mr. Abbas to persevere in his efforts to quickly form a national unity government," Douste-Blazy told reporters.

If the government is formed according to the power-sharing deal worked out in the Islamic holy city of Mecca last month, "France will be ready to cooperate with it," Douste-Blazy said. "And our country will plead on its behalf within the European Union and with other partners in the international community."

DOJ_NMG_0136608

Abbas, who also traveled to Britain, Germany and Belgium, welcomed the pledge from France. But it was unclear how far France could go in supporting the Palestinians without the backing of the rest of the EU or other members of the Quartet of Middle East peace negotiators: the United States, Russia and the U.N.

Half of the Palestinian Authority's budget came from foreign assistance until much of it was frozen last year over Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept existing peace agreements with Israel. The power-sharing deal skirts those demands.

"We hope that the embargo will be lifted," Abbas said after meeting French President Jacques Chirac on Saturday. "If not ... the Palestinian people would continue to suffer and the sanctions would continue to cause damage."

European leaders cautiously welcomed the power-sharing deal, an effort to end clashes between Hamas and Fatah that have left more than 130 dead since May.

But EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana told Abbas in Brussels that the EU would not make a decision on aid until a new Palestinian government has taken office.

In Gaza, four Palestinians were killed and 37 were injured in a family feud late Friday and early Saturday, threatening the calm that has accompanied the Mecca deal. Gaza remains volatile because families of some of those killed in months of clashes still seek revenge.

Palestinian parliament speaker Ahmed Baher, of Hamas, said in Gaza on Saturday that the government would be formed by the first week of March.

Israel has ruled out talks on a final peace deal with Abbas if he goes ahead with the coalition government.

But Abbas insisted he still had hope in the peace process despite an inconclusive meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice earlier this week.

"We cannot say that there is something hopeless. It is indispensable that we reach agreement with the Israelis," he told reporters in Paris.

Abbas said he would push for the release of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit before the new government is formed. Shalit's capture by Palestinian militants last June sparked weeks of fighting between Palestinians and Israelis. Chirac and Douste-Blazy urged his release Saturday.

Israeli Troops Raid Nablus, Start Curfew (AP)

AP, February 25, 2007

Dozens of Israeli jeeps and armored vehicles raided the West Bank city of Nablus Sunday and placed tens of thousands of Palestinians under curfew.

The army said troops had on Saturday, at the start of the operation to arrest suspected militants, uncovered an explosives laboratory in the city and that soldiers had been shot at in several places and returned fire. No injuries were reported on either side.

About 80 jeeps backing several bulldozers entered the city, witnesses said. The bulldozers pushed rubble into piles on main roads to make them impassable, they said. Troops placed about 50,000 people under curfew in the center of Nablus and closed the main entrance to the city, witnesses said.

Jeeps blocked entries to two main hospitals in the city, said a doctor, Ghassan Hamdan.

Schools and a university in the city announced that they had canceled studies due to the curfew.

5 Palestinians Die In Gaza Feud (NYT)

By Isabel Kershner

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 24 — Five Palestinians were killed and more than 40 wounded in fighting between clans on Friday and early Saturday in Khan Yunis, a town in the southern Gaza Strip. Though the clashes were being portrayed in the Palestinian news media as a feud between families, they also took on a factional hue, since one of the families is identified with Hamas and the other with its political rival, Fatah.

The deaths raised fears of a possible round of revenge killings and renewed factional fighting between Hamas and Fatah after two weeks of relative calm. The fighting between Hamas and Fatah, which had killed almost 100 people in the Gaza Strip since December, eased after leaders of the groups signed an agreement in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, on Feb. 8 to share power in a proposed national unity government.

The latest round of violence in Khan Yunis started late Friday with the fatal shooting of Muhammad Ali Ghalban, 27, a member of the Iz al-Din al-Qassam underground that is linked to Hamas, according to Palestinian news reports. Hamas said Mr.

Ghalban was killed by armed men from the Kawareh family. The reports said the killing was apparently an act of revenge for the death of a Kawareh relative in factional fighting a month ago. A few hours later, Hazem Kawareh, 30, a Fatah supporter, and a passerby, Ismail Sabah, 73, were killed, according to Israeli and Palestinian news reports. Palestinian news reports listed the two other fatalities as Ghada Kawareh, 28, and Salama Abu Shabab, 55, although details of the killings were not provided.

Israeli forces also discovered a bomb-making factory in the West Bank city of Nablus during an overnight operation that ended Saturday, an army spokesman said. Five pipe bombs, two gas balloons, materials for bomb making and large quantities of shrapnel were found in the factory, situated in the Old City market area. Palestinians threw a grenade and opened fire on the soldiers, and one member of Islamic Jihad was arrested, the spokesman said.

The army spokesman also confirmed that the Egyptian police on Friday found a ton of explosives in the Sinai desert, near the border with the Gaza Strip. The discovery came as Egyptian forces scoured the area for Palestinian militants thought to have come to Sinai from Gaza with the intention of attacking Israeli tourists at resorts in the desert peninsula. Several Palestinians were arrested earlier in the week in the northern Sinai carrying explosives belts. Israeli authorities have warned Israeli tourists to leave Sinai resorts immediately.

On Friday, two Qassam rockets were launched from the Gaza Strip in the direction of Israeli communities across the border. They fell in open areas and caused no injuries. That brings the number of Qassam rockets launched from Gaza in the past week to 12, according to the Israeli Army, despite a cease-fire that was declared in November.

At a news conference in Jerusalem on Wednesday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel "would not restrain itself forever" in the face of the Qassam fire. "Israel's patience is being tested too often. In the end, we will respond and reach out to those responsible," he said, without specifying any timetable for action.

The Israeli Channel 2 television broadcast excerpts from an interview with King Abdullah II of Jordan on Friday, in which he suggested that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was at a critical crossroad and that he believed this "really is the last opportunity for peace for all of us."

Prodi Gets A Second Chance To Lead Italy (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

ROME, Feb. 24 — Romano Prodi was given a second chance to lead Italy's government on Saturday, though allies and enemies worried that his still-fragile coalition would remain divided and vulnerable to another collapse.

"It's a weak solution," Daniele Capezzone, a leader of the Radical Party, which is allied with Mr. Prodi, told the ANSA news agency. "Within a month we risk finding ourselves in the same situation."

On Wednesday, Mr. Prodi resigned after far-left members of his diverse coalition killed a Senate vote on the government's foreign policy.

Since then, he has forced party leaders into line, even though the underlying ideological splits remain in place, as does his razor-thin majority in the Senate.

President Giorgio Napolitano, after two days of consultations with political leaders, concluded that there was "no concrete alternative" and on Saturday asked Mr. Prodi to try again. Now Mr. Prodi must win votes of confidence in Parliament, scheduled for late next week.

He is expected to have little trouble in the lower chamber, the House of Deputies, where he enjoys a wide majority. But Mr. Prodi would make no firm predictions about the Senate, despite gaining the support of a center-right leader once allied with Mr. Berlusconi, Marco Follini.

"Today I'm more relieved," Mr. Prodi told reporters after meeting with Mr. Napolitano here in Rome. Asked if he thought he could win the confidence vote in the Senate, he said, "The debate will be next week, and we will see."

Many political analysts predicted that he would scrape by, with the help of honorary senators appointed for life who lean to the political left. A different question, however, was surviving his five-year term, with the Senate deeply divided on the budget, political overhaul and issues including whether Italy should keep troops in Afghanistan or support the expansion of an American military base in Vicenza, in northern Italy.

Those last two issues are particularly contentious among the far-left members of his coalition, and they were the reason two senators abstained from the foreign policy vote on Wednesday, bringing down the government.

On Thursday, Mr. Prodi secured from his allies an agreement on a program of 12 "nonnegotiable" points, aimed at both giving him more autonomy and moving the coalition closer to the political center.

DOJ_NMG_0136610

Still, opposition leaders called it a bandage that would only "prolong the agony," as one said Saturday, before another collapse and the need for new elections. They had been urging Mr. Napolitano to sideline Mr. Prodi completely and appoint a caretaker government of technocrats.

"I don't believe this left can ever find the agreement to operate well in the direction of the reforms that this country needs," Silvio Berlusconi, the former prime minister and leader of the center-right opposition, told members of his party on Saturday.

Venezuela Spending On Arms Soars To World's Top Ranks (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Feb. 24 — Venezuela's arms spending has climbed to more than $4 billion in the past two years, transforming the nation into Latin America's largest weapons buyer and placing it ahead of other major purchasers in international arms markets like Pakistan and Iran.

Venezuelan military and government officials here say the arms acquisitions, which include dozens of fighter jets and attack helicopters and 100,000 Kalashnikov assault rifles, are needed to circumvent a ban by the United States on sales of American weapons to the country.

They also argue that Venezuela must strengthen its defenses to counter potential military aggression from the United States.

"The United States has tried to paralyze our air power," Gen. Alberto Muller Rojas, a member of President Hugo Chávez's general staff, said in an interview, citing a recent effort by the Bush administration to prevent Venezuela from acquiring replacement parts for American F-16s bought in the 1980s. "We are feeling threatened and like any sovereign nation we are taking steps to strengthen our territorial defense," he said.

This retooling of Venezuela's military strategy, which includes creation of a large civilian reserve force and military assistance to regional allies like Bolivia, has been part of a steadily deteriorating political relationship with the United States.

The Bush administration has repeatedly denied that it has any plans to attack Venezuela, one of the largest sources of oil for the United States. But distrust of such statements persists here after the administration tacitly supported a coup that briefly removed Mr. Chávez from office in 2002.

Venezuela's escalation of arms spending, up 12.5 percent in 2006, has brought harsh criticism from the Bush administration, which says the buildup is a potentially destabilizing problem in South America and is far more than what would be needed for domestic defense alone.

The spending has also touched off a fierce debate domestically about whether the country needs to be spending billions of dollars on imported weapons when poverty and a surging homicide rate remain glaring problems. Meanwhile, concern has increased among Venezuela's neighbors that its arms purchases could upend regional power balances or lead to a new illicit trade in arms across Venezuela's porous borders.

José Sarney, the former Brazilian president and a leading senator, caused a stir this week when he was quoted in the newspaper O Globo as describing Venezuela's form of government as "military populism" and "a return to the 1950s," when Venezuela was governed by the army strongman Marcos Pérez Jiménez.

"Venezuela is buying arms that are not a threat to the United States but which unbalance forces within the continent," Mr. Sarney said. "We cannot let Venezuela become a military power."

Still, officials in the administration of President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil have been hesitant to publicly criticize Venezuela's arms purchases.

The issue remains delicate after the Brazilian company Embraer lost a deal to sell military aircraft to Venezuela because the planes included American technology.

After turning unsuccessfully to Brazil and Spain for military aircraft, Venezuela has become one of the largest customers of Russia's arms industry.

Since 2005, Venezuela has signed contracts with Russia for 24 Sukhoi fighter jets, 50 transport and attack helicopters, and 100,000 assault rifles. Venezuela also has plans to open Latin America's first Kalashnikov factory, to produce the Russian-designed rifles in the city of Maracay.

A report in January by the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency pegged Venezuela's arms purchases in the past two years at $4.3 billion, ahead of Pakistan's $3 billion and Iran's $1.7 billion in that period.

In a statement before the House Intelligence Committee, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, called attention to Mr. Chávez's "agenda to neutralize U.S. influence throughout the hemisphere," contrasting Mr. Chávez with the "reformist left" exemplified by President Michelle Bachelet of Chile.

DOJ_NMG_0136611

Beyond Russia, Venezuela is also considering a venture with Iran, its closest ally outside Latin America, to build a remotely piloted patrol aircraft. Gen. Raúl Isaías Baduel, the Venezuelan defense minister, recently told reporters that the project to build 20 of the aircraft could be used to bolster border surveillance and combat environmental destruction in Venezuela. Venezuela is also strengthening military ties with Cuba, sending officers and soldiers there for training.

Supporters of the arms buildup contend that under Mr. Chávez, who has been in power for eight years, Venezuela has spent proportionately less on its military in relation to the size of its economy than the United States or than other South American countries like Chile and Colombia.

In 2004, the last year for which comparative data were immediately available and before Venezuela's arms buildup intensified, overall defense spending by Venezuela, including arms contracts, was about $1.3 billion and accounted for about 1.4 percent of gross domestic product, compared with 4 percent in the United States and 3.8 percent in Colombia, according to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, which tracks military spending.

Doubts persist as to how powerful Venezuela's armed forces have become in a regional context, even as they acquire new weapons. Military experts here say pilots in the air force still need training to start flying their new Russian fighters. And in terms of troop strength, Venezuela's 34,000-soldier active-duty army still lags behind the armies of Argentina and Brazil, with about 41,400 and 200,000 members respectively, according to GlobalSecurity.org, a Web site that compiles data on military topics.

Pro-Chávez analysts also say the president is less adventurous in relation to military policy outside Venezuela than predecessors like Luis Herrera Campíns, who supported Argentina in the Falklands War in 1982 to detract attention from a decline in oil revenue and climbing inflation.

But critics of the arms purchases say they are being made with little participation from or discussion with the National Assembly, which recently allowed Mr. Chávez to govern by decree for 18 months.

Ricardo Sucre, a political scientist at the Central University of Venezuela, said that the lack of transparency of the weapons contracts had heightened concern that Mr. Chávez could be arming parts of the army, the new civilian reserve and partisans like the Frente Francisco de Miranda, a pro-Chávez political group, that would be loyal to him in the event of fractures within the armed forces.

General Muller Rojas, the president's military adviser, said concern about the arms purchases was overblown, pointing to reports that Venezuela was considering an acquisition of nine diesel-powered submarines from Russia for about $3 billion.

He said the navy had "aspirations" for more submarines, but that no "concrete plan" for such a large contract had been developed.

"We simply have an interest in maintaining peace and stability," General Muller Rojas said, describing the Caribbean as a crucial to its military influence. "We have no intent of using the Venezuelan armed forces to repress human rights."

Chavez Says Bush's Latin America Tour Doomed To Failure (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said Saturday that he saw U.S. President George W. Bush's upcoming tour to Latin America as a diplomatic offensive aimed at isolating his leftist government.

Chavez said that Bush's planned trip was "without a doubt" aimed at dividing the region and containing Venezuela's influence.

"But it's too late. I think the U.S. president now has nothing to find in Latin America. It is an offensive destined to the abyss of failure," Chavez told a news conference.

Chavez said he respected the decision by other Latin American nations to "receive this little gentleman," but in Venezuela, "we will never receive him. Never. Because we know what he is. This is nothing personal."

Chavez has become one of Washington's fiercest critics and regularly blames U.S.-style capitalism for poverty and inequality in the region.

"The strategy of the U.S. government has always been ... to divide Latin America," he said, including Bush's last visit to Argentina for the 2005 Summit of the Americas when the U.S. leader tried unsuccessfully to promote a hemisphere-wide free trade area.

"I saw him leave with his tail between his legs — the imperialist superpower," he said.

The March 8-14 tour, which will take Bush to Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico, is the most extensive to the region since the U.S. leader to office six years ago and is being seen in the region as an attempt to reverse years of neglect, as well as counter Chavez's influence

Chavez is a close ally of Cuba's Fidel Castro who has spread his country's oil wealth to ideological allies like Bolivia, Nicaragua and Ecuador in the form of preferential oil deals and loans.

DOJ_NMG_0136612

The White House has said Bush's trip is aimed at underlining the U.S. government's commitment to the region and advancing democracy and its benefits, including health, education and economic opportunities.

Civilians Flee New Fighting In Capital (WT)

By Mustafa Haji Abdinur, Agence France-Presse

The Washington Times, February 25, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Thousands of terrified civilians poured out of the Somali capital yesterday after heavy fighting between Ethiopian troops and gunmen overnight left at least 10 persons dead.

Some residents scrambled into passenger vans while most just grabbed household items and left on foot for the relative calm of the surrounding countryside, where food is scarce.

"I was very scared yesterday after I heard the heaviest explosion ever in the capital," said Adan Dirir Bare, a resident of southern Mogadishu.

"I had insisted a lot on staying in Mogadishu, but not now."

A mother of five, Sahro Ali Mohamed, said houses in her Mogadishu neighborhood were deserted.

"People cannot endure the heavy artillery and mortar exchange that kills people every time," she said as she left with her family in tow.

Five children were among the dead from clashes late Friday, apparently killed when caught in crossfire, witnesses said.

The International Committee of the Red Cross yesterday issued a plea to all warring parties to comply with the rules of international humanitarian law to protect civilians.

It urged them "to take constant care in the conduct of military operations to safeguard the lives and dignity of the civilian population."

Last week saw some of the heaviest fighting in the capital since late December when a hard-line Islamist movement was driven out by the interim Somali government and its Ethiopian allies.

The government and the Ethiopians blame remnants of the Islamist movement for stoking the violence.

A top Somali army commander yesterday accused unnamed foreign countries of funding the insurgency.

"The assailants are loyal to those who want to create violence in the capital and they are being funded by foreign countries," Said Dhere told reporters.

"We know who is behind the attacks, and we will crack down on them soon."

In the past, Somalia has blamed Ethiopia's arch foe Eritrea for funding the rebel fighters.

Analysts say Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed has failed to create a government that includes elders and warlords from powerful sub-clans suspected of organizing the raids.

Rival militias of clan warlords carved up Somalia after dictator Mohamed Siad Barre was ousted in 1991.

Somalia is awaiting the deployment of an 8,000-strong African Union force to try to help the transitional government restore order in Mogadishu. The deployment was approved Tuesday by the U.N. Security Council.

But the AU has so far managed to raise only half of the required peacekeepers, with troop pledges from Nigeria, Burundi, Malawi and Ghana as well as Uganda.

In a statement posted on a suspected Islamist Web site, a group calling itself the Popular Resistance Movement in the Land of the Two Migrations, which is accused of threatening peacekeepers, vowed to carry out more attacks.

"We vow to welcome ammunition from heavy guns, exploding cars and young fighters determined to carry out martyrdom operations against these troops," the statement said.

Uganda's Deputy Defense Minister Ruth Nankabirwa said Friday that Uganda was now waiting for air transport from Algeria to begin its deployment.

Senegal's High Unemployment Is Top Election Issue (WP/AP)

By Rukmini Callimachi, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

DAKAR, Senegal, Feb. 24 -- The seaside highway, one of the Senegalese president's bold building initiatives, winds past the scruffy shop where Barry Mamadou, a 62-year-old tailor, and his two sons eke out a living sewing scraps of cloth into curtains.

It is a beautiful highway, Mamadou said, no doubt about it.

"But I can't eat the road," he said, explaining why, having twice voted for President Abdoulaye Wade, he is now siding with one of 14 opposition candidates in Sunday's presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0136613

Wade's projects include the new sea-hugging highway, a second major airport and a pan-African university. Yet in a country where half the population of 12 million is unemployed, some Senegalese say they would settle for a decent job and three meals a day.

"There seems to be a disconnect between ideas that on paper look good and what is actually happening on the ground," said Alex Segura-Ubiergo, the International Monetary Fund's representative in Senegal.

Wade, 80, who spent three decades in the opposition and ran four times for president before winning by a landslide in 2000, said his critics are missing the larger picture.

"I am a man in a hurry because Africans are not in a hurry, and the chasm that divides us from the West is big and is getting bigger. So we need to run faster to catch up. We can't fix the divide by going slowly," he said Thursday in an interview at the presidential palace.

The West sees this mostly Muslim country as an oasis of progress on a continent beset by authoritarian rule, corruption and grinding poverty. The government has never been overthrown in a coup, and many corporations have moved here. Wade has the advantage of incumbency and a fragmented opposition, but opinion polls are banned in election seasons, so predictions are difficult. If no one tops 50 percent of the vote, a runoff will be held.

But whatever the outcome, jobs are the leading issue.

Ibrahima Seck, 31, an engineering graduate, was a machinist at a chemical plant that recently shut down. Now he hawks knockoff perfume on the streets of the seaside capital.

Each perfume bottle nets him $2, and days can go by without a sale. His goal: to save about $1,000 for a ticket on a perilous 900-mile voyage by wooden boat to Spain's Canary Islands and a better life in Europe.

The surge of West Africans trying to reach Western Europe on sometimes perilous journeys is among the biggest stains on Wade's last seven years in office. Hundreds have died, yet at least 31,000 people undertook the voyage last year from West Africa.

"What the old man promised us, he didn't do," Seck said of Wade. "I need a real job, not a nice road. Not an airport. As soon as I save enough money, I will take the boat, even if it means losing my life."

Wade points to an annual growth rate of almost 5 percent, compared with 1 percent during the 40 years of socialist rule before he won office, and to job-creating initiatives such as raising crops whose oil can be used for biofuels.

But infrastructure has deteriorated. Electricity cuts are far more frequent because power plants are aging and oil prices are rising.

While inflation overall has remained low, the price of some basic commodities has spiked. The cost of a 13-pound canister of cooking gas, for example, rose 57 percent last year.

Wade's government has also been criticized by human rights groups for jailing opponents, including, for a time, his former prime minister, Idrissa Seck, now one of the candidates running against him. Another contender in Sunday's race is 68-year-old Moustapha Niasse, a veteran opposition leader who was Wade's first prime minister.

In Mbeki's South Africa, Change Has Come, Slowly (WP)

By Craig Timberg, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

KHAYELITSHA, South Africa -- The road in front of Princess Rini's leaky, wooden shack has been paved. There is a primary school and a library down the street. And though three of the outdoor taps the government built nearby are broken, a twist on the fourth brings forth copious clean water.

"It's changing, a little bit, a little bit," said Rini, 38, a widow with short, braided hair who moved to Khayelitsha, among Cape Town's poorest and most dangerous townships, a decade before apartheid ended in 1994. "It's better than before."

The reason: "It's Thabo Mbeki," she said.

Inequality remains extreme in South Africa, with sharp divisions along lines of race and class. But Mbeki, who could become a lame-duck president as soon as December, when the ruling African National Congress has elections for party leader, has already crafted a legacy of fiscal stability and modest racial progress that, advisers say, he is working furiously to protect as rivals vie to replace him.

Mbeki is seeking to maintain control by competing for a third term as party leader, a move that would help him handpick the next president. But analysts say the outcome is far from certain in a year they call the most politically tumultuous since apartheid.

In these battles, the slow pace of change is perhaps Mbeki's most glaring weakness. Rush hour in Cape Town, southern Africa's original European colony and still a bastion of white privilege, is swollen with luxury cars speeding past dilapidated townships. Executive suites in downtown skyscrapers remain dominated by the small white minority.

DOJ_NMG_0136614

"We have not succeeded at de-racializing the economy," said Willie Esterhuyse, a retired Afrikaner philosophy professor who became a friend and adviser to Mbeki. "After liberation, nothing changed. . . . The racism is embedded in the physical nature of the country."

Although the racial order has proved dauntingly resilient, a strong economy has provided benefits to all levels of society.

Rini said she could not imagine ever living in the lush white neighborhood where she works one day a week, earning $57 for the month, and she craves steadier employment and a concrete home with plumbing. But she said she is grateful for the improvements to her neighborhood and for the $27 monthly government grant she receives to help support her youngest child.

Of Mbeki's government, she said its programs were "better than nothing."

Mbeki's advisers acknowledge that his cerebral approach to the presidency will never generate the enthusiasm many South Africans felt for Nelson Mandela, the charismatic first president of the post-apartheid era. But Mbeki, who was deputy president during those years, was the intellectual force behind policies that have allowed the country to become fiscally sound while gradually providing homes, water, electrical connections and grants to millions of the poorest South Africans.

Esterhuyse, who was an emissary for the apartheid government when he first met Mbeki in the late 1980s, said that even then Mbeki was "the guy in the engine room" capable of bringing ANC ideals to reality.

He became president in 1999, for the first of two five-year terms allowed by the constitution, but soon was embroiled in controversy when he questioned the scientific consensus on the cause of AIDS and, in the opinion of activists and many global leaders, moved too slowly on providing antiretroviral drugs. His international standing, analysts say, never entirely recovered.

In South Africa, he has developed a reputation as ruthless in backroom dealings, brittle in the face of criticism and emotionally remote in public appearances. His anti-populist instincts have become so hardened that even when he agrees to the demands of critics, as he eventually has on such sensitive matters as AIDS and South Africa's rampant violent crime, he has refrained from crowd-pleasing gestures of empathy for victims.

In a speech to Parliament this month, Mbeki said tartly, "There will be no empty theatrical gestures, no prancing on the stage and no flagellation, but we will continue to act against crime, as decisively as we have sought to do throughout the years of our liberation."

By contrast, he has consistently displayed passion for redressing the enduring racial divide, a subject he often calls the "national question." But on that goal, advancement is least clear.

Government programs requiring businesses to diversify their ownership have turned a small number of politically connected men and women into millionaires. And the number of blacks in top management jobs has increased from 13 percent in Mbeki's first full year in office to 27 percent, according to government statistics.

But unemployment among blacks tops 30 percent, and in many townships more than half of adults lack work.

Equally daunting is the legacy of Bantu education, which during apartheid sought to keep blacks as second-class citizens trained mainly for menial jobs. The 2001 census found that nearly half of black South Africans have no formal education or left school at the primary level.

"There's been a lack of creativity in how do you deal with poverty, how do you deal with unemployment," said William Gumede, author of "Thabo Mbeki and the Battle for the Soul of the ANC," speaking from London, where he is studying. "The remaining underclass is really going nowhere."

Property values have risen sharply for white South Africans, and the Johannesburg Stock Exchange regularly reaches new highs. South African companies have moved aggressively to other African countries, Asia and beyond.

Yet even as government receipts soar, South Africa's schools remain understaffed, and many of its public hospitals and clinics are overwhelmed.

Mbeki's approach to such woes is inherently cautious, based on his belief that major changes are possible only if the economy is made strong, his advisers said.

That response has not satisfied many ANC activists, and several of the candidates seeking to replace Mbeki -- including his fired former deputy Jacob Zuma -- draw support from those demanding more generous jobs programs, protection from overseas competition or other initiatives that might quickly improve the lives of the poor.

The most dramatic changes under Mbeki, however, are found not among the poor or the rich, but among the burgeoning black middle class, which increasingly has access to shopping, housing and jobs that long were the exclusive preserve of whites.

The impact of these new consumers has surprised even businesses, which have struggled to keep up with demand for electricity, gasoline and consumer goods, said Joel Netshitenzhe, Mbeki's top policy adviser, speaking in Pretoria.

"If there's a real tsunami in South Africa, that's it," he said. "Demand is growing so fast that businesses can't cope."

Solomzi Yapi, 41, who one recent day was hiking up a steep, sandy hill here in hopes of shrinking the belly that grew with his own prosperity, said he sees the economic changes as he drives his Volvo sedan through black townships, selling life insurance. Each passing year, he said, brings more customers with the means to buy his policies -- a change he attributes to Mbeki.

"He does not care how people perceive him," Yapi said. "He's a good administrator."

Yet breaking down racial barriers has come more slowly than Yapi expected when apartheid ended.

"I thought everything was going to be a very sharp turn . . . that we were going to have mixed much more than we've mixed now," he said. "Back then, I was naive. I didn't know anything about politics. We knew a lot about apartheid, not governance."

But a visit to a McDonald's restaurant three years ago convinced him change was coming, he said. All of the managers and the other customers were white. Everyone cooking or working the cash registers was black. But as he ordered his food and ate it, the service was courteous and his visit there caused no stir -- something unimaginable under apartheid.

It amounted to progress, he said, in South Africa.

'They Think They've Been Cursed By God' (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia

President Bush's budget request this month proposes that the U.S. cut spending on global maternal and child health programs to $346 million, or just $1.15 per person in the U.S.

To understand what the cuts mean, meet Simeesh Segaye.

Ms. Simeesh, a warm 21-year-old Ethiopian peasant with a radiant smile, married at 19 and quickly became pregnant. After she had endured two days of obstructed labor, her neighbors carried her to a road and packed her into a bus, but it took another two days to get to the nearest hospital.

By then the baby was dead. And Ms. Simeesh awakened to another horror: She began leaking urine and feces from her vagina, a result of a childbirth injury called obstetric fistula.

Ms. Simeesh's family paid $10 for a public bus to take her to a hospital that could repair her fistula. But the other passengers took one whiff of her and complained vociferously that they shouldn't have to share the vehicle with someone who stinks. The bus driver ordered her off.

Mortified, Ms. Simeesh was crushed again when her husband left her. Her parents built a separate hut for her because of her smell, but they nursed her and brought her food and water.

In that hut, she stayed — alone, ashamed, helpless, bewildered. She barely ate, because the more she ate or drank, the more wastes trickled down her legs.

"I just curled up," she said. "For two years."

Ms. Simeesh was, in a sense, lucky. She wasn't one of the 530,000 women who die each year in pregnancy and childbirth — a number that hasn't declined in 30 years. Here in Ethiopia, a woman has one chance in 14 of dying in childbirth at some point in her life.

For every woman who dies in childbirth worldwide, another 20 are injured. But because the victims are born with three strikes against them — they are poor, rural and female — they are invisible and voiceless, receiving almost no help either from poor countries or from the developed world.

So Ms. Simeesh huddled in a fetal position on the floor of her hut for two years, thinking about killing herself. Finally, last month, Ms. Simeesh's parents sold all their farm animals and paid a driver to take her to the hospital in a vehicle with no other passengers present to complain.

So now Ms. Simeesh is lying in a bed here in the Addis Ababa Fistula Hospital (www.fistulafoundation.org). The hospital is run by an Australian gynecologist, Dr. Catherine Hamlin, whom I've written about before. Dr. Hamlin is the Mother Teresa of our age.

The doctors here will try to repair the fistula, but first they must strengthen Ms. Simeesh, who is skeletal. Her legs have withered and are permanently bent into a fetal position, so that she can't straighten them or move them.

In the U.S., neither Democrats nor Republicans have ever shown great interest in maternal health. But it's an issue that deserves far more support, partly because we know exactly what to do to bring down maternal mortality and morbidity: Sri Lanka and Honduras have both shown how poor countries can drastically cut rates of death and injury.

And in the breakaway Somaliland region of Somalia, an extraordinary woman named Edna Adan Ismail runs her own obstetric hospital and trains midwives, underscoring how women's lives can be saved even in the most difficult environments. Ms. Edna struggles one moment to deliver a breech baby, and the next to round up surgical masks. She is helped by a group of Americans, Friends of Edna Hospital (www.ednahospital.netfirms.com), who raise funds and scavenge supplies. (To see Ms.

Edna, Ms. Simeesh and others in this column, please visit the video I have posted on my blog at www.nytimes.com/ontheground.)

Dr. Hamlin and Ms. Edna deserve the Nobel Peace Prize for showing the world how to turn the tide of maternal mortality and morbidity, and for offering comfort to some of the most forlorn people in the world. At a time when we're proposing further cuts in our negligible budget for maternal and child health, I was deeply moved by the sight of Ruth Kennedy, a British midwife at the fistula hospital, comforting Ms. Simeesh and bringing a lovely smile to her lips.

"They think they've been cursed by God," Ms. Kennedy explained. "And we tell them that they haven't been cursed by God and that they're beautiful and that the only reason that they got a fistula is because we failed them as health professionals."

Containment Makes A Comeback (LAT)

By Ian Shapiro

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

Containment is back.

Over the last 12 months, commentators as varied as George Will, MIT political science professor Barry Posen and Thomas Friedman have all suggested that containing a nuclear-armed Iran might be preferable to attacking it.

Last month, Kenneth Pollack of the Brookings Institution joined in with a study advocating a return to a policy of containment in Iraq — even though he had been one of the most vocal supporters of the 2003 invasion on the grounds that containment was failing.

Even James Baker's Iraq Study Group proposed in its December report that the U.S. should work with Iran and Syria to contain the Iraqi conflict.

Containment is a Cold War idea, articulated by historian and diplomat George Kennan in the late 1940s in his famous Foreign Affairs magazine article "The Sources of Soviet Conduct," (which he published under the pseudonym "X"). Kennan, who had been stationed at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, argued that as long as the Soviet Union did not attack us, we should not attack it — but should rely instead on economic sticks and carrots, on intelligence and diplomacy and on promoting the health and vitality of the capitalist democracies to win the Cold War.

Yes, Kennan wrote, the Soviets were eager to increase their sphere of influence, but U.S. policy should nevertheless be built on "long-term, patient but firm and vigilant containment of Russian expansive tendencies." With time, he believed, the dysfunctional Soviet system, overextended beyond its own borders, would collapse of its own accord.

History proved him right.

But that was then and this is now. Containment (which was also our policy toward President Saddam Hussein of Iraq during the Clinton years) fell into disfavor in the run-up to the Iraq war, when the Bush administration denounced it as inadequate to meet the threats of the post-9/11 world. If Al Qaeda is attacking and nuclear terrorists are roaming the globe and rogue governments are providing them with weapons, the administration argued, only radical measures — preemptive war and forcible regime change — can protect us.

This was the modern equivalent of the "rollback" policy (to push the Soviets out of Eastern Europe) proposed by John Foster Dulles and Dwight Eisenhower in the 1952 election campaign (but abandoned as impracticable when they came into office the following year).

So what's the truth? Is containment in fact obsolete, as the Bush administration would have it? Numerous parallels suggest that it is not.

After World War II, for instance, Kennan knew that national security would have to be managed with scarce resources as troops were demobilized and military budgets cut. Trying to dominate the world would be impossibly expensive. It made more sense, Kennan thought, to work for a world that no one could dominate. That's why he welcomed the rise of Titoism as a challenge to Soviet hegemony, recognizing that competition within the world communist movement worked to our advantage.

This lesson is lost on the Bush administration, which had giant budget surpluses to play with just a few years ago but is now facing an Iraq war debt well in excess of a trillion dollars and massive budget deficits as far as the eye can see.

Instead of following the Kennan model and pitting our adversaries against one another, the administration encourages them to make common cause at every turn. The "axis of evil" speech in the 2002 State of the Union address is a stunning example. The senseless alienation of Iran when the moderates had the upper hand there and were cooperating in Afghanistan made no sense for the United States.

Kennan believed that the way to win hearts and minds was by demonstrating the superiority of democratic capitalism on the ground. Hence his support for the Marshall Plan to consolidate democratic success in Europe as fast as possible.

This too is medicine for our time because Islamic fundamentalism shares with communism the lack of a viable political economy. Where fundamentalist movements have come to power in Afghanistan and Iran, the results have been disastrous. Islamic fundamentalism poses no competitive threat to democratic capitalism. That's why so much of the population of Iran (as distinct from the country's leadership) is strongly pro-Western in values and orientation.

Kennan was convinced that arguing with the Soviets was a waste of time. The United States should focus, he believed, on what our enemies did rather than what they said, assuming they would act in response to their interests, not to our arguments. And it works.

THINK OF LIBYA, where Moammar Kadafi responded to the incentives (and disincentives) of containment despite his anti-Western invective. In the late 1990s, containment (including economic sanctions) led him to stop sponsoring terrorism, turn over the Lockerbie bombers for trial and pay compensation to British and French victims of Libyan-sponsored terrorism.

Instead of Iraq being the model for Iran, Libya should be. But allies of the administration see it differently and are pushing the modern equivalent of rollback, suggesting that we should attack Iran to stop its nuclear weapons program.

True, in some respects, Kennan's doctrine needs to be modified for a world that is no longer bipolar, in which there may be multiple adversaries operating in different places. This requires the creation of regional security alliances. Kennan opposed the creation of NATO on the grounds that it would militarize the conflict with the Soviets unnecessarily. But, as Col. Joseph Nunez of the U.S. Army War College has argued, we now need NATO-like organizations on every continent to contain terrorist groups and sectarian conflicts in failed states.

Kennan also had little time for international organizations such as the U.N., believing that they would be swept aside in any real conflict between the U.S. and the Soviet Union. But in the globalized world of the 21st century, such international organizations are essential for peacekeeping, international law enforcement and legitimization of intervention when containment requires it.

It is ironic that the two areas in which Kennan's views are most outdated and wrongheaded — working with regional allies and international institutions — are the two areas in which the Bush administration follows his lead.

Kennan died two years ago at 101. But his doctrine of containment should not be buried along with him.

Containment is not obsolete. The Bush doctrine is.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Facility Holding Terrorism Inmates Limits Communication (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer
The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

The Justice Department has quietly opened a new prison unit in Indiana that houses a hodgepodge of second-tier terrorism inmates, most of them Arab Muslims, whose ability to communicate with the outside world has been tightly restricted.

At the Communications Management Unit, or CMU, in Terre Haute, Ind., all telephone calls and mail are monitored, the number of phone calls limited and visits are restricted to a total of four hours per month, according to special rules enforced by the Justice Department's U.S. Bureau of Prisons. All inmate conversations must be conducted in English unless otherwise negotiated.

The unit appears to be a less restrictive version of the "supermax" facility in Florence, Colo., which holds some of the United States' most notorious terrorists, including al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui and Unabomber Theodore J. Kaczynski.

The Indiana unit, by contrast, is part of a medium-security facility and includes inmates set to be released in as little as two years. Prisons spokeswoman Traci Billingsley said the unit's population will not be limited to inmates convicted of terrorism-related cases, though all of the prisoners fit that definition.

Prison officials said they already seek to fully monitor the mail and other communications of all 213 "terrorist inmates" in the system. "By concentrating resources in this fashion, it will greatly enhance the agency's capabilities for language translation, content analysis and intelligence sharing," the bureau said in a summary of the CMU.

The unit, in Terre Haute's former death row, has received 17 inmates since it was launched in December and eventually will hold five times that number, officials said.

Defense lawyers and prisoner advocates complain that the unit's communication restrictions are unduly harsh for inmates not considered high security risks. They also say that the ethnic makeup of the CMU's population may indicate racial profiling. "If they really believed these people are serious terrorists, they wouldn't be in this unit," said David Fathi, staff counsel for the National Prison Project at the American Civil Liberties Union. "They'd be in Colorado with [Atlanta Olympics bomber] Eric Rudolph and the Unabomber and the rest of the people that the Bureau of Prisons thinks are serious threats."

DOJ_NMG_0136620

The prison bureau has come under sharp criticism in recent months for failing to adequately monitor terrorist inmates' communications. The Justice Department's inspector general reported in October that three terrorists imprisoned for the 1993 World Trade Center bombing had sent nearly 100 letters to alleged terrorists overseas from the maximum-security facility in Colorado.

"The inclusion of this unit is one of the many things we're doing to improve our monitoring capabilities," Billingsley said.

According to prison records, current residents at Terre Haute include five members of the so-called Lackawanna Six, a group of Yemeni natives from Upstate New York who attended an al-Qaeda training camp. The unit also houses Randall Royer, a defendant prosecuted as part of the "Virginia jihad" case in Alexandria, and Enaam M. Arnaout, an Islamic charity director who pleaded guilty to diverting money to Islamic military groups in Bosnia and Chechnya.

The only non-Muslim inmates are an unidentified Colombian militant and Zvonko Busic, 61, former leader of a Croatian extremist group that hijacked a jetliner and set off a bomb that killed a police officer in 1976, according to prison records and defense lawyers.

Another CMU resident is Rafil Dhafir, 58, an Iraqi-born physician from Syracuse, N.Y., who was sentenced to 22 years for defrauding charity donors and conspiring to violate U.S. economic sanctions against Saddam Hussein's government.

In a recent letter to supporters, Dhafir recounted his abrupt, heavily guarded transfer to Terre Haute in December and described it as part of "a nationwide operation to put Muslims/Arabs in one place so that we can be closely monitored regarding our communications."

"We are all concerned about the close intrusion on our communications," Dhafir wrote. "We knew all along that our calls, mail and visits were monitored, but with the new system we will have absolutely no privacy including our visits. This is causing a great deal of anxiety and resentment especially among those whose families speak no English."

Dhafir wrote that prison officials "are allowing us total freedom for our religious activities" and appear to be working with inmates to improve conditions.

Prisoner advocates and prisons officials generally agree that the bureau is within its rights to monitor prisoners' mail, phone calls and visits. They differ on whether the intensive use of these tactics is justified for these inmates.

Some lawyers and prison advocates said there are important problems with the CMU, including a lack of public notice about its formation and a lack of clarity about how inmates are chosen to be sent there.

Washington lawyer Carmen Hernandez, who represents Busic and is president-elect of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, noted that being sent to the unit is not considered a punitive measure by prisons officials. As a result, authorities do not have to provide hearings and other procedures that are required when punishments are to be administered.

"They claim it's not a punitive measure, but when you start restricting access, it certainly would appear to be punitive," Hernandez said. "If you're going to restrict people's liberties beyond what they already are, it ought to be for a good, particularized reason, and there does not appear to be one here."

Howard Kieffer, a Santa Ana, Calif., defense lawyer who runs a Web site focused on federal prisons, also argues that the unit "screams racial profiling."

"It's highly suspect that basically all of the people in this program are of Middle Eastern descent," Kieffer said.

Billingsley said inmates are not placed in the unit based on ethnicity or religion. She said the facility will eventually house a variety of prisoners, including sex offenders who attempt to communicate with victims and others who have abused mail or phone privileges.

"What they all have in common is a demonstrated need to more closely monitor their communications," Billingsley said.

During a tour of the Colorado prison last week, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said the monitoring problems there had been solved, although prison guards say the facility remains understaffed.

Evidence Against Muslim Charity Appears Fabricated (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

An official summary of an FBI-wiretapped conversation contains anti-Semitic slurs that do not appear in the actual transcript.

When the Bush administration shut down the nation's largest Muslim charity five years ago, officials of the Dallas-based foundation denied allegations it was linked to terrorists and insisted that a number of accusations were fabricated by the government.

Now, attorneys for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development say the government's own documents provide evidence of that claim.

In recent court filings, defense lawyers disclosed striking discrepancies between an official summary and the verbatim transcripts of an FBI-wiretapped conversation in 1996 involving Holy Land officials.

The summary attributes inflammatory, anti-Semitic comments to Holy Land officials that are not found in a 13-page transcript of the recorded conversation. It recently was turned over to the defense by the government in an exchange of evidence.

Citing the unexplained discrepancies, defense lawyers have asked U.S. District Judge A. Joe Fish in Dallas to declassify thousands of hours of FBI surveillance recordings, so that full transcripts would replace government summaries as evidence.

The demand could force government prosecutors to either declassify evidence it has fought to keep secret or risk losing a critical portion of evidence in its case.

In December, the judge denied a defense request to declassify the documents so they could be examined by defendants in the case. Seven former foundation officials, six of them U.S. citizens, have been charged with funneling money to overseas charities controlled by Hamas, which the U.S. has designated as a foreign terrorist organization. The defendants have denied the charges.

Though defense attorneys already have government clearances that allow them to review the material, under the federal Classified Information Procedures Act they have been prohibited from sharing it with their clients. And unless the act's rules are declared unconstitutional in the case, defense attorneys argue, the defendants will have no way of proving that the statements attributed to them were misconstrued or never made.

The recently declassified summary of surveillance on April 15, 1996, asserts that during a conversation wiretapped by the FBI, Holy Land's former executive director Shukri Abu Baker told two associates there was no need to worry about the foundation being unfairly targeted because U.S. courts were not under the control of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee or its sponsor, "the government of the demons of Israel."

The summary portrays Baker as raging against "the Jews of the world" and as claiming that Jews have no allegiance to anything but "their pockets and to preserving the illegal Zionist state of Israel."

Additional anti-Semitic comments the FBI summary attributed to Baker or Ghassan Elashi, Holy Land's former board chairman, included:

· "Their [Jews'] only purpose here in the U.S. is to purchase as many politicians as possible and to warp the way the American Christians feel and think not just about the Christian religion but mainly about the Palestinian people … and to rob as much money as possible from American taxpayers for the illegitimate excuse of protecting and preserving the chosen people of God."

· "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests … the sons of snakes and scorpions."

· "I am confident that in the end justice, and not the Jews, will prevail. I believe that there is still justice in America."

None of those quotes was contained in a 13-page transcript of the conversation, defense lawyers said in their motion to expand access to classified evidence.

"Throughout the run-up to trial, the government has insisted that the defendants can learn what is contained in the [surveillance] intercepts by reading the so-called 'summaries' of those intercepts," defense attorneys said in their papers.

But the recently disclosed transcript, attorneys said, shows that "not only are the summaries so inaccurate and misleading as to be useless," but that the "author of the attached summary has cynically and maliciously attributed to the defendants racist invective and inculpatory remarks the defendants never uttered."

"It is appalling that such summaries even exist, much less that the government represented that this is all our clients need to know in order to defend themselves."

Defense lawyers declined to comment about their motion. A federal prosecutor said the government would respond with its own filings to the court.

How the summary and transcript could be so different was unclear, though experts in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act arena theorized that its top-secret nature may have led some analysts to believe that the work product would never be publicly disclosed, much less entered into evidence in a trial.

Because the court records are heavily redacted, it could not be determined who provided the summaries of the FBI wiretaps.

Other alleged discrepancies also have dogged the case. Holy Land lawyers challenged the accuracy of an FBI memo, for example, that quoted a foundation office manager as telling Israeli authorities that charitable funds were "channeled to Hamas."

But defense lawyers told the court the translation from Arabic to Hebrew to English distorted the official's original statement, and that he should have been quoted as saying, "We have no connection to Hamas."

DOJ_NMG_0136622

The Holy Land Foundation was closed weeks after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on New York and the Pentagon. The action followed years of efforts by Israel and many pro-Israeli groups in the U.S. to close the foundation on the grounds that it was a fundraising front for Hamas.

The former Holy Land officials facing trial are charged with conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists by sending money, goods and services to Palestinian charities controlled by Hamas, a U.S.-designated terrorist group since 1995.

TV Cameraman Among Detainees At Guantanamo (WT/AP)

By Ben Fox, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 25, 2007

NAVAL BASE GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba -- A TV cameraman is getting an inside view of life at Guantanamo Bay prison, only he is unable to get out and tell the story.

Sami al-Hajj, of the Al Jazeera TV network, was stopped at the Afghanistan border by Pakistani authorities in December 2001, turned over to U.S. forces and hauled in chains six months later to Guantanamo, where about 390 men are held on suspicion of links to al Qaeda or the Taliban.

Mr. al-Hajj, a 38-year-old native of Sudan, has been held in this U.S. military prison ever since.

He is believed to be the only journalist from a major international news organization held at Guantanamo.

Colleagues from Mr. al-Hajj's Qatar-based network and the Sudanese government want to know why he is being held, but the U.S. government is saying little. The military did not even publicly acknowledge holding Mr. al-Hajj until last April, when it released a list of Guantanamo detainees in response to a Freedom of Information Act request filed by the Associated Press.

But military documents sketch at least a partial outline of Mr. al-Hajj's experiences at Guantanamo and the U.S. grounds for holding him -- that he transported money between 1996 and 2000 for a defunct charity that purportedly provided money to militant groups, and that he met a "senior al Qaeda lieutenant."

When he appeared before a military review panel at this remote U.S. military base in August 2005, Mr. al-Hajj, citing the advice of his attorney, declined to respond to questions. But he denied any connection to terrorism.

"With all due respect, a mistake has been made because I have never been a member of any terrorist group," he said, according to a transcript released the following year. "I can say without hesitation that I am not a threat to the United States."

During the hearing, aimed at determining whether Mr. al-Hajj posed a threat to the United States or possessed intelligence value, Mr. al-Hajj wore a white jumpsuit reserved for the "most compliant" detainees. An officer told the tribunal that Mr. al-Hajj was leading Islamic prayer sessions and teaching other prisoners English.

His colleagues at Al Jazeera claim his detention is American harassment of an Arabic TV network whose coverage has long angered U.S. officials. Near the entrance to the network's Khartoum, Sudan, bureau a banner saying "Free Sami al-Hajj" hangs alongside his photo.

"He's our colleague, so we're very worried," said Nassef Salah Eldin, an Al Jazeera producer in the Sudanese capital. "We feel it could happen to any of us."

Lamis Andoni, a Middle East analyst for the network who helped organize a campaign for Mr. al-Hajj's release, noted the network's sour relationship with the American government. In April 2003, an Al Jazeera journalist was killed when the network's Baghdad bureau was struck during a U.S. bombing campaign. In November 2001, a U.S. missile destroyed Al Jazeera's office in Kabul, Afghanistan. The U.S. claims both attacks were mistakes.

"When you are targeted once, it could be a mistake," Mr. Andoni said in an interview from Amman, Jordan. "But when you are bombed twice, it's something else."

In an interview in Khartoum, Sudanese Justice Minister Mohammed Ali al-Mardi said the holding of the cameraman without charge "is repugnant to all the conventions and principles of international law."

Washington has given Sudan no information about Mr. al-Hajj, Mr. al-Mardi said. U.S. relations with Sudan are strained over the Darfur conflict in western Sudan.

"I consider the information that we obtained from him to be useful," Paul Rester, director of the Joint Intelligence Group at the prison, said in an interview at Guantanamo Bay. Mr. Rester refused to elaborate or even to comment on the charges aired at the 2005 hearing.

The U.S. military says that in the 1990s, Mr. al-Hajj was an executive assistant at a Qatar-based beverage company that provided support to Muslim fighters in Bosnia and Chechnya.

Infiltrating The Extreme (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

TORONTO — Mubin Shaikh, the informer, balances his 3-month-old son in the palm of his hand and hoists him aloft like the torch of the Statue of Liberty. The baby coos and smiles, unaware of the danger of falling, then lurches into space. Shaikh catches him gently and laughs.

Shaikh's own balancing act has been more difficult.

He is a 31-year-old Canadian-born Muslim who disavowed the mosque to fit in with his neighborhood friends, then rejected that life to practice traditional Islam. Later, he used his stature in the Muslim community to infiltrate a suspected terrorist cell, and then helped expose it — an act that alienated him from many in his own circles.

Shaikh's struggle with identity and loyalty is part of a larger conundrum confronting Western nations with edgy and diverse Islamic populations. He thought his ability to straddle worlds was the answer to quelling the homegrown terrorism that has stunned London, Madrid and now Toronto. But it has only raised more questions.

The suspected cell's plan, prosecutors said in June, was to explode three truck bombs in front of Toronto police and intelligence headquarters and Parliament Hill, then take politicians hostage and behead them one by one. The group of 18 had acquired 3 tons of what it thought was explosive material when police moved in, authorities say.

Cushioned by faith

To some, Shaikh is a hero, acting to protect not only Canada but Islam. Others charge that he enabled the plotters instead of acting to stop them, betrayed his brethren and reinforced the image of Muslims as terrorists in this country where more than half a million practice Islam.

Now he faces death threats, which he doesn't take seriously, and glares and cold shoulders in the mosque, which he does. As preliminary hearings for the suspects begin, the anguished questions revive: Did he do all he could? Was it necessary? Will he survive it?

Shaikh dismisses the threats and condemnations as he tickles his son's head with his long black beard. He believes that if he falls, he will be cushioned by his faith.

Shaikh was born in Toronto in 1975, two years after his parents arrived from India via England. His family practiced Islam, but he felt indistinguishable from his Italian and Portuguese neighbors.

In high school, he said, he was one of the "cool guys," sporting five tattoos, smoking pot behind a back wall and dating the cheerleaders.

"I am Canadian and I am Indian, born and raised here, with the expectations of conformity and the pain of acculturation," Shaikh said. "I had to deal with the clash of cultures. I liked girls, I liked music, I wanted nothing to do with the mosque."

Shaikh was in the Royal Canadian Army Cadets for six years and trained with a reserve unit. He became skilled with firearms and learned military maneuvers that he said he eventually taught to the aspiring terrorist cell. He was attracted by the discipline, he said.

After high school, still searching for discipline or a higher law, he came back to Islam. And like many young people, he said, he "overcompensated" and became ultra-religious, traveling to India and Pakistan with a conservative Islamic missionary group. He returned to Toronto in a knee-length robe, a skullcap and a long beard that he still wears today.

"It blew everybody away," he said of his transformation. He found it difficult at first to reconcile Canadian secular values with his newfound Islamic beliefs. "From the age of 19, I was made to feel like a stranger in my own country. I was subject to comments and looks."

The alienation increased after the Sept. 11 attacks, when people began to tell him to act like a Canadian or go home.

"This is my home," he said. "I was angry, and cynical. I wanted to go to Afghanistan or Chechnya. I could have been a jihadi."

Instead, he went to Syria in 2002 to study for two years, and came back more appreciative of Canada's laws and freedoms, armed with Koranic verses that argued against terrorism.

Shaikh became a well-known figure in Toronto's Muslim community as an official at the conservative Masjid el Noor mosque and a prominent proponent of using Sharia, or Islamic law, to settle family disputes among Muslims in Ontario province.

The government and liberal Muslims argued that the Islamic religious code clashed with Canadian laws, and the movement failed.

Down the informant's path

When Shaikh heard in 2004 that a childhood friend, Mohammed Momin Khawaja, had been arrested under Canada's new anti-terrorism laws, he called the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and said, "I've known this guy for a long time and there's got to be a mistake." He asked how he could help straighten things out.

DOJ_NMG_0136624

CSIS agents quizzed him on his background and his beliefs. After more meetings and a polygraph test, they asked him to infiltrate a group they had been monitoring. Shaikh said he had had brushes with the law but no convictions, and he insisted no deals were made with the CSIS that led him to take on the assignment.

The agency agreed to pay him in installments for his efforts, and he said that as of January he had received more than $250,000. Another informant who ended up going into a witness protection program was paid about $12 million as compensation for giving up his business and home and relocating his family.

Neither the CSIS nor the police would comment for this article, citing confidentiality and preparations for the trial of the plot suspects.

Troubled by doubts, Shaikh consulted his spiritual advisor, who told him to be sure he was doing it for God, not for himself, and cautioned that he must not incite the others or betray his faith.

Shaikh's first test came in October 2005. He went to a fundraiser for imprisoned Muslims, assigned to connect with the alleged terrorist cell ringleader, Fahim Ahmad.

In the course of the evening, Shaikh said, he gave the right answers to Ahmad's questions, a between-the-lines test of whether Shaikh was prepared to wage "holy war." When the other alleged leader, Zacaria Amara, embraced him later that night, it apparently was in part to let Shaikh feel the gun under his clothes.

In turn, Shaikh said, he showed them his hard-to-get firearms license he had obtained as a cadet rifle instructor and told them of his military training. They needed someone to help them get arms and lead a training camp. Soon, he was in.

Shaikh said he and Ahmad seemed to recognize something in each other. Shaikh described Ahmad as a Muslim who struggled with the culture clash, whose religious values pushed him to the margins of society, where he grew angry and alienated and increasingly radical.

Laughing when he realized that he could be giving his own biography, Shaikh asked, "How is it that a guy like that goes one way and I go another?

"I don't know if it is fate or what, but I ended up with the right religious connection," he said. "If I had met a facilitator, chances are I would be somewhere in Afghanistan or Chechnya right now."

'Impressionable' recruits

The group included leaders and their young recruits — high school students from wealthy suburban families who lived in large Tudor houses. One drove a BMW, another a Lexus. A few of the younger ones left the circle at his quiet prompting, Shaikh said, and at the other minors' pretrial hearing, he pleaded for charges against some of the "impressionable kids" to be dropped. On Friday, charges against the youngest suspect were suspended.

He said he saw members of the group nearly every day for 10 months, watched beheading videos to desensitize himself, and wrote careful reports for the CSIS. The agency wired his van, tapped all their phones and monitored the group's movements.

In the winter, he said, the group spent 10 days in the woods a few hours north of Toronto in a makeshift terrorist training camp, led by Shaikh. Under the watchful eyes of concealed CSIS agents, the young holy warriors learned how to fire guns and hit a VIP convoy, and discussed the techniques of beheading.

The plot was progressing, Shaikh said: Amara showed him a homemade detonator sparked by a cellphone and told him he was testing bombs. Shaikh said he didn't know that the group had ordered 3 tons of ammonium nitrate, the material used by Timothy McVeigh in the Oklahoma City bombing.

The supplier turned out to be another mole, unknown to Shaikh, and the bags did not contain ammonium nitrate. After the material was delivered, more than 400 police officers conducted raids in early June, bursting through the doors of suburban homes with SWAT teams to arrest 12 men and five minors. The 18th suspect was arrested two months later.

When whispers ran like a current through the Muslim community that Shaikh was the informer, he decided that the best protection was to explain himself.

"I didn't do it for the money. I didn't do it to be a hero. I did it for Islam, because we don't support terror, and if those guys had succeeded, it would have made all Muslims look bad," he said, anger sparking in his dark brown eyes. "And I did it for Canada. I was born here, and I want this to be a place where people can live together without suspicion."

To many, he was a hero. After he revealed his identity in July, an editorial in the Globe and Mail headlined "In Praise of Mr. Shaikh" said: "He is an observant Muslim who acted against an alleged terrorist ring. For that, Canadians of all stripes should be grateful."

But within Toronto's multifaceted Muslim community, gratitude was in short supply.

"Individuals cannot credibly spy on their own community while remaining a member of it," said Safiyyah Ally, the host of the TV program "Let the Quran Speak." "Our community is fragile enough as is, and our leaders are our moral anchors."

Ally said the community should report suspicious activity but leave the spying to the authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0136625

Shaikh heard that and laughed. "How many Muslims do you think there are in CSIS? How many can penetrate those circles? Why do you think they came to me?"

After his exposure, though, Shaikh has found it more difficult than he expected to break through in even his old circles.

"There has been a lot of hostility." he said. "But that is trivial compared to not doing it, because it could have led to something so devastating, so tragic."

"Instead of being peeved at the fact that I was involved, they should be peeved at the guys who were doing it," he said. "They were angry that I brought attention to it. But think of the attention if those guys had blown up a truck bomb. It would come back to us 100%."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House Disaster Drill Supposes 10-City IED Strike (WP/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Dozens of high-level officials joined in a White House drill yesterday to see how the government would respond if several cities were attacked simultaneously with bombs similar to those used against U.S. troops in Iraq.

White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend and the Homeland Security Council that she heads mapped out in advance a massive disaster involving improvised explosive devices, or IEDs. The attack targeted 10 U.S. cities, both large and small, at the same time, said a senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Townsend presided over the three-hour exercise, which brought the government's top homeland security officials to the Eisenhower Executive Office Building next to the White House. All Cabinet agencies were represented by their secretaries or other high-ranking officials, with about 90 participants in all, White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

Stanzel said the drill revealed gaps in the government's ability to respond, but also showed that there have been many improvements since Hurricane Katrina. The storm exposed federal inadequacies when it devastated the Gulf Coast in 2005. For instance, coordination with state and local authorities and the ability to get federal resources in place quickly -- key missteps after Katrina -- appeared much better now, Stanzel said.

President Bush went on a bike ride yesterday morning and did not take part in the test.

The IED attacks are common in Iraq, but Stanzel said the test was not inspired by new intelligence or any increased chatter about terrorists' desire to use IEDs inside the United States.

This was the administration's fourth such "tabletop" exercise since the first in December 2005. That exercise focused on an avian flu pandemic.

As Bush's ID Plan Was Delayed, Coalition Formed Against It (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Darryl Fears, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Inspired by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, a sweeping federal law to tighten security requirements for driver's licenses is in jeopardy of unraveling after missteps by Congress and the Homeland Security Department, analysts and lawmakers said.

While Washington has delayed implementing it, a rebellion against the program has grown. Privacy advocates say the effort could create a de facto national ID card. Meanwhile, state officials charge that complying with federal requirements will cost $11 billion and potentially double fees and waiting times for 245 million Americans whose licenses would have to be reissued starting next year.

The issue threatens to turn into a partisan fight. The White House expects to release its driver's license plan, Real ID, this week and has warned congressional critics not to thwart or further delay a program that was recommended by the Sept. 11 commission.

"If we don't get it done now, someone's going to be sitting around in three or four years explaining to the next 9/11 commission why we didn't do it," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told the Senate's Homeland Security Committee on Feb. 13.

Critics in both parties will try to delay the launch of the program by offering an amendment to legislation that Senate Democrats are pushing to implement remaining changes suggested by the Sept. 11 commission.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the homeland security panel, said in a statement that Real ID may not provide real security and that it is opposed by states "because it is overly burdensome, possibly unworkable, and may actually increase a terrorist's ability to commit identity theft."

DOJ_NMG_0136626

The White House plan, which has been in the works for two years and will take effect in May 2008, standardizes information that must be included on licenses, including a digital photograph, a signature and machine-readable features such as a bar code.

The new rules also will spell out how states must verify applicants' citizenship status, check identity documents such as birth certificates and cross-check information with other states and with Social Security, immigration and State Department databases. Only complying IDs can be used for federal purposes such as boarding airplanes or entering government buildings.

The law is "vital for the protection of the country," said former New Jersey governor Thomas H. Kean Jr., co-chairman of the Sept. 11 commission. "You can't have 30 different methods of identification to get in and out of the country . . . many of them easily forged, and expect to keep the bad guys out."

All but one of the Sept. 11 hijackers acquired, legitimately or by fraud, IDs that allowed them to board planes, rent cars and move through the country.

Tightening U.S. identification requirements was a focus of both the Sept. 11 commission and the Markle Foundation's earlier bipartisan task force on terrorism. Markle, a New York think tank, focuses on technology policy.

But concern has mounted over Real ID's cost, practicality and impact on privacy and travel.

The National Governors Association calls Real ID an $11 billion unfunded mandate. States say the federal government, not license holders, should pay the tab. It wants up to 10 years for states to enact laws, pass budgets, develop technology, hire staff members and educate the public to phase in changes.

Last month, Maine's lawmakers voted to stop the initiative, saying it would cost $185 million -- six times the Maine Bureau of Motor Vehicles' annual budget. Measures are pending in at least 21 states to oppose or question the law.

Matthew Dunlap, Maine's secretary of state and head of the bureau, said the message from the lawmakers was: "We don't care if you give us bags of money. We don't want it."

An unusual and powerful alliance of civil liberties groups and libertarian groups important to the political bases of both parties has also mobilized. They describe Orwellian scenarios in which Real ID integrates nationwide databases storing personal information without adequate security safeguards, and they ask who will own and control access to the system.

"Real ID is a real nightmare," said Barry Steinhardt, director of the ACLU's Program on Technology and Liberty. "No one should be fooled that just because the data resides in 50 different states it's not all functionally one big database, because all the data is linked together."

Steinhardt said he fears that private companies that demand to check driver's licenses for commercial purposes could sell unencrypted data they get from the licenses to big data brokers. Means to prevent that could be even more costly and raise other security risks.

There are other worries. If Maine wants to include gun-permit information on its driver's licenses, Dunlap asked, will a Maine gun owner whose ID is swiped in a traffic stop in another state face extra scrutiny?

Practical problems also loom. Computer systems that would let state workers electronically verify birth certificates, Social Security numbers or citizenship status do not yet exist, Dunlap said, calling them "science fiction."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), ranking Republican on Lieberman's panel, and Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine) are seeking to delay or repeal Real ID and let security experts, privacy advocates and the states renegotiate the rules.

That is what Congress started to do in 2004. But in 2005, Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, rewrote the law to keep illegal immigrants from getting licenses and to let the Homeland Security Department define the rules for the program.

"If that process had been allowed to finish, we would have been done by now," said David Quam of the National Governors Association.

Instead, work bogged down in the overstretched department, whose top officials failed at first to give it enough attention, current and former officials said.

Stewart A. Baker, assistant homeland security secretary for policy, defended the department's effort: "We've moved this as fast as possible given the importance of the issue to so many different constituencies."

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, blamed the administration and the previous Congress for squandering the consensus on security that formed after Sept. 11.

"It's a very badly mishandled case overall of a homeland security reform that was logical, important and yet not sufficiently promoted at the right time," O'Hanlon said. "We've lost the sense of urgency."

WAR NEWS:

Murtha Stumbles On Iraq Funding Curbs (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Lyndsey Layton, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Democrats Were Ill-Prepared for Unplanned Disclosure, Republican Attacks

The plan was bold: By tying President Bush's $100 billion war request to strict standards of troop safety and readiness, Democrats believed they could grab hold of Iraq war policy while forcing Republicans to defend sending troops into battle without the necessary training or equipment.

But a botched launch by the plan's author, Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), has united Republicans and divided Democrats, sending the latter back to the drawing board just a week before scheduled legislative action, a score of House Democratic lawmakers said last week.

"If this is going to be legislation that's crafted in such a way that holds back resources from our troops, that is a non-starter, an absolute non-starter," declared Rep. Jim Matheson (Utah), a leader of the conservative Blue Dog Democrats.

Murtha's credentials as a Marine combat veteran, a critic of the war and close ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) were supposed to make him an unassailable spokesman for Democratic war policy. Instead, he has become a lightning rod for criticism from Republicans and members of his own party.

Freshman Rep. Joe Sestak (D-Pa.), a retired Navy admiral who was propelled into politics by the Iraq war, said Murtha could still salvage elements of his strategy, but Sestak, an outspoken war opponent, is "a bit wary" of a proposal that would influence military operations.

"I was recently in the military, and I have to speak from that experience," Sestak said.

The story of Murtha's star-crossed plan illustrates the Democratic Party's deep divisions over the Iraq war and how the new House majority has yet to establish firm control over Congress. From the beginning, Murtha acted on his own to craft a complicated legislative strategy on the war, without consulting fellow Democrats. When he chose to roll out the details on a liberal, antiwar Web site on Feb. 15, he caught even Pelosi by surprise while infuriating Democrats from conservative districts.

Then for an entire week, as members of Congress returned home for a recess, Murtha refused to speak further. Democratic leaders failed to step into the vacuum, and Republicans relentlessly attacked a plan they called a strategy to slowly bleed the war of troops and funds. By the end of the recess, Murtha's once promising strategy was in tatters.

Tom Andrews, a former House member and antiwar activist who helped Murtha with his Internet rollout, fumed: "The issue to me is, what is the state of the backbone of the Democratic Party? How will they respond to this counterattack? Republicans are throwing touchdown passes on this because the Democrats aren't even on the field."

Rep. Debbie Wasserman-Schultz, a Florida Democrat and deputy whip, said party leaders are working on several Iraq proposals and that Murtha's may survive. Finding consensus will be difficult but not impossible, she said. "This is a multi-step process," she cautioned. "At least we're debating the topic, not blindly following the president."

Megan Grote, Murtha's spokeswoman, said the congressman will not discuss Iraq policy until a news conference scheduled for the end of the week.

Murtha, 74, the powerful chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, still holds a unique position on war policy, stemming from his roots as a veteran, his close ties to the uniformed military and his long-standing alliance with Pelosi. When he first publicly called for ending the war in 2005, he commanded the attention the party's left and right wings.

The strategy he would craft was designed to calm the nerves of the party's conservatives by fully funding the war, while placating the antiwar left by attaching so many strings to those funds that the president would not be able to deploy all the 21,500 additional combat troops he wanted.

To be sent to battle, troops would have to have had a year's rest between combat tours. Soldiers in Iraq could not have their tours extended beyond a year there. And the Pentagon's "stop-loss" policy, which prevents some officers from leaving the military when their service obligations are up, would end. Troops would have to be trained in counterinsurgency and urban warfare and be sent overseas with the equipment they used in training.

Pelosi endorsed the plan in concept but never the details. The plan surfaced Feb. 15 in an unorthodox Murtha appearance on MoveCongress.org, an antiwar Web site affiliated with the liberal activists of MoveOn.org.

It came the day before the House voted on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's additional troop deployments that Democratic leaders had been touting as a major rebuke. Murtha dismissed that vote as he promoted his coming plans regarding the war spending bill. "This vote will be the most important vote in changing the direction on this war," he said of his proposal. "This vote will limit the options of the president and should stop the surge."

To many Democrats, that was not only impolitic, it was disloyal.

"He stepped all over Speaker Pelosi's message of support for the troops," said Rep. Jim Cooper (Tenn.). "That was not team play, to put it mildly."

Even after that Web appearance, some senior Democratic aides say Murtha might well have been able to save his plan if he had quickly laid it out before the Democratic caucus and marshaled Democratic leaders behind a defense. Instead, the House recessed for a week, Murtha disappeared from the media, and Democratic leaders were silent, saying they could not discuss Iraq legislation because no real plan existed.

In the face of an unanswered Republican assault, the Democratic rank-and-file cracked -- on the left and the right.

"While we're all for troop readiness, we're all for them having all the equipment they want," Matheson, the Utah Democrat, said, "I'd be very concerned about doing anything that would hamstring resources and commanders on the ground."

Indeed, Matheson and other Blue Dogs said the Democrats should concentrate on oversight hearings on Iraq policy, while refraining from binding legislation on the war.

The party's newly elected Iraq veterans favor a more straightforward approach than Murtha, establishing a legal timetable for pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq, Sestak said. And the party's antiwar left is no less unhappy with what they see as half measures from Murtha.

"Congress has the authority, and I know it has the responsibility, to get us out of there. And we should use every means possible," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (Calif.), a co-chairman of the Out of Iraq Caucus.

Rep. Barbara Lee (Calif.), another co-chairman who sits on the Appropriations Committee, is likely to try to tie the war spending bill to legislation demanding a withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq by a date certain, with the bill's money available only for the safe withdrawal of the troops.

Such legislation was precisely what Murtha hoped to head off with his recent Internet appearance, said Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), who helped connect him with MoveCongress.org. And Moran still believes the appearance ultimately will work to the Democrats' favor. "The cognoscenti is upset because he's not under their control," Moran said. "They would prefer he release his plan to a think tank, but he decided he wanted to communicate directly. He doesn't trust the way the media filters what he says and does. He understands the power of being able to communicate."

War Critic Faces Test On Iraq Spending Bill (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

JOHNSTOWN, Pa., Feb. 23 — As Democratic Congressional leaders escalate their challenge to the Bush administration's policy in Iraq, one of the most influential players will be that unlikely darling of the antiwar left, Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Murtha's power comes not just from his role as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, in charge of the huge spending bill for the war that will advance in the House in March. It also derives from his close alliance with Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and from his popularity, ever since he called for an end to the war in 2005, among the party's antiwar base — at the grass-roots level, among liberal Internet communities, and in the House.

"He has the aura of a folk hero among the legions who want to get out of Iraq," said Tom Matzzie, Washington director of MoveOn.org.

Still, Mr. Murtha faces an extraordinary political challenge over the next month, and some Democrats are already worried about his handling of it. As they consider the president's nearly $100 billion spending request for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, Democrats must find a way to satisfy an antiwar wing that wants clear progress toward winding down the war — the Out of Iraq Caucus claims a third of the House Democrats — while producing legislation palatable to the party's conservatives and centrists.

Mr. Murtha says he will meet with the Democratic leadership on Wednesday to talk about his plans; a spokesman for Ms. Pelosi said she had yet to sign off on any proposal. But the ideas Mr. Murtha has floated over the past month — attaching restrictions to the financing, and requiring the Pentagon to meet clear standards on readiness, training and equipment for troops about to be deployed to Iraq — have already drawn substantial criticism. Mr. Murtha has argued that his approach both protects American forces and makes Mr. Bush's troop buildup plan impossible to sustain.

But some Democrats said they feared that the Murtha approach could amount to Congressional overreaching, an attempt to micromanage the war. "Congress is a blunt instrument," said Representative Joe Sestak of Pennsylvania, a retired admiral and a critic of the war, who added that he had the "greatest respect" for Mr. Murtha but was "wary."

"There may be unknown ramifications, unintended unknown ramifications, when you get on the operational level," Mr. Sestak said.

Republicans say Mr. Murtha is leading a stealthy effort to cut financing for the troops. "When you hamstring the Pentagon with burdensome standards and hold the funding over the Pentagon's head, that's somewhere between irresponsible and dangerous," said Brian Kennedy, spokesman for Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader. And Vice President Dick Cheney took repeated shots at Mr. Murtha and Ms. Pelosi this week while traveling in Japan.

Back home in his district, Mr. Murtha, a 33-year veteran of the House, stole a few days away from the political maelstrom. Every inch the traditional congressman from Western Pennsylvania, he paid tribute to the Boy Scouts at a dinner Thursday and vowed to keep fighting for organized labor at a breakfast on Friday. He rarely mentioned his opposition to the war in his public remarks, although he told local reporters he believed that sometime over the next few months, Congressional Democrats would reach some compromise with the White House on Iraq.

For all of President Bush's vows to pursue his policies in Iraq, Mr. Murtha argued, "They can't continue this direction.

"They can say that, just like they said they weren't going to fire Rumsfeld two weeks before the election," he added, referring to the dismissal of Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary immediately after the election. "But in the end, you can't sustain a war if you don't have public support."

Of Mr. Cheney's remarks, Mr. Murtha said, "They're striking out because they have no answers."

Mr. Murtha has his critics, but he has an enormously powerful friend in Ms. Pelosi, a political relationship of which House Democrats are keenly aware. Mr. Murtha said Ms. Pelosi had "the best political mind of any speaker I've dealt with" and was a better speaker for the quick-response era of modern politics than even "my mentor, Tip O'Neill."

Ms. Pelosi has returned the favor, often telling colleagues that Mr. Murtha's decision to oppose the war in the fall of 2005 transformed the debate and helped the Democrats recapture the House. "She's said it on more than one occasion," said Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, a vice chairman of the Democratic caucus. Mr. Murtha's shift on the war carried special weight; he is a Vietnam veteran and retired Marine colonel, and one of the House's most respected members on military matters.

The proof of Ms. Pelosi's loyalty came when she backed Mr. Murtha in his failed campaign to become majority leader. And she defended him again last week, when he was widely criticized for granting a lengthy online interview to MoveCongress.org, an antiwar group, just when House Democrats were trying to build a bipartisan majority on the nonbinding resolution against Mr. Bush's troop buildup.

Organizers said they conducted that interview to reassure antiwar activists that Democrats would not stop with a nonbinding resolution, which many on the left believed was too little, too late. But Representative Walter B. Jones, a North Carolina Republican who backed the resolution, said Mr. Murtha's interview had scared some Republicans who were against the troop increase.

Republican leaders seized on the interview, Mr. Jones said, and used it to hold the line. "If he had made his comments after the vote, we could have picked up five to eight more Republicans," Mr. Jones said.

That episode underscores the broader challenge facing House Democratic leaders. Representative James P. Moran, a Virginia Democrat, said Mr. Murtha needed to pay attention not only to anxious centrists and moderates, who are worried that he will go too far, but also to antiwar Democrats who have promised "that they will not vote for one more dollar for support for Iraq."

Mr. Moran added, "If we get hit from both the left and the right, it may be problematic."

In the end, Democratic leaders were counting on Murtha the legislator as much as Murtha the folk hero. "He's a realist, and he's trying to find a majority on the House floor," said one House Democratic strategist.

Mr. Murtha said, "We're working our way through this," but he argued that time — and public opinion — were inexorably on his side.

Iraq: Democrats Vow To Keep Pressure On Bush (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Congress returns to work this week after its holiday recess, Democratic leaders promise to confront President Bush even more forcefully over his Iraq war strategy.

Senate Democrats are moving to modify the 2002 resolution that authorized the war to place new limits on the role of U.S. forces in Iraq.

But it is uncertain whether they will fare any better in this effort than in their last try — an unsuccessful attempt to pass a symbolic resolution opposing the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq.

That resolution passed the House but stalled in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0136630

Now, Senate Democrats are looking at bringing to a vote a stronger measure, one that would limit the mission of U.S. forces. The measure, which has not been drafted, might restrict military operations to going after Al Qaeda operatives and to supporting and training the Iraqi army. And it might set March 2008 as a goal for withdrawing troops that are not involved in that narrower mission.

Democrats contend that conditions have changed since Congress authorized the invasion to topple Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, and some of the reasons for the war have since been shown to be unfounded.

"Saddam is gone," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who has introduced legislation that would require the president to return to Congress at the end of this year to extend the war authorization. "Iraq in fact had no weapons of mass destruction."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) are working on the proposal to set new limits for the U.S. mission in Iraq.

Democratic leaders plan to gauge support for the measure within their caucus. But this latest Democratic effort was already drawing strong Republican criticism.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) panned the proposal as "a Goldilocks resolution: one that is hot enough for the radical left wing, but cool enough for party leaders to claim that they are 'for the troops.' "

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), said Democrats wanted to keep the heat on Republicans. "There is no single piece of legislation that will bring this war to an end, but Democrats will continue to look at ways to force the president to change course," he said.

To overcome a filibuster — or override a presidential veto — Senate Democrats need GOP support to challenge the president's war strategy.

Seven Senate Republicans joined Democrats to vote for a debate on the anti-buildup resolution, but that still gave Democrats four fewer than the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

Democrats say they want to ratchet up political pressure on Republicans, especially those up for reelection next year in states where antiwar sentiment is running high.

Antiwar groups have targeted Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.), who is up for reelection in a state that ousted two House Republicans in November. Sununu voted against a debate on the troop resolution.

"What I don't know is what kind of reaction members are hearing from their constituents back home," Manley said. "But it's evident that the president and his Republican supporters on Capitol Hill are increasingly isolated and out of step with the American people."

Although the new Democratic efforts are aimed at turning up the political heat on Republicans, they could also make some Democrats uncomfortable. Those from conservative districts or states are fearful of taking a step that Republicans could portray as cutting funding to troops in harm's way or tying the commander in chief's hands in wartime.

One Democrat who supported the anti-buildup resolution expressed misgivings about a House effort to attach strings to the White House's latest war-funding request, such as setting troop-readiness standards for deployments.

"It raises constitutional and practical questions to have 535 members of Congress micromanaging troop deployments," said Rep. Chet Edwards (D-Texas). "A more appropriate approach would be for Congress to reconsider the authorization of war or to set deadlines for bringing U.S. troops home."

One prominent Republican war critic, Rep. Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, has come out against any cut in funding for troops.

"We must take great care to ensure that any effort to provide for our armed forces not be used as a proxy for resolving larger issues concerning the war in Iraq," Jones said in a letter to Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Penn.). "Any attempt to 'starve' the war as a way of bringing it to a conclusion, rather than through a serious policy debate about the best way forward in Iraq, would be wrong."

Murtha, chairman of the House defense appropriations subcommittee, has announced plans to sponsor legislation to ban the deployment of units that do not meet strict readiness standards.

Republicans in turn are continuing to dare Democrats to bring to a vote a resolution opposing any cut in funding for the troops.

Democrats, who hold a 51-49 majority in the Senate, also must tread carefully. There has been speculation that Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut independent who caucuses with the Democrats, would join the GOP if Democrats cut funding for the troops. Such a move would hand control of the Senate to the Republicans.

Last week, Lieberman, one of the strongest Senate supporters of a troop buildup, said that he had "no desire or intention" to leave the Democratic caucus.

Governors Warn Of Troop Buildup's Impact On Guard (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0136631

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — Republican and Democratic governors meeting here Saturday warned that President Bush's "surge" of additional troops to Iraq would put added pressure on National Guard units already stretched to their limits.

"We the governors rely on the Guard to respond to natural disasters, a pandemic or terrorist attack," said North Carolina Gov. Michael F. Easley, a Democrat. "Currently, we don't have the manpower or the equipment to perform that dual role" of responding to both state and federal needs.

The Pentagon last week announced plans to send 14,000 National Guard members to Iraq next year as support for the 21,500 troops to be deployed under Bush's plan. The announcement came on the heels of a change in Pentagon policy to deploy Guard troops more frequently but to limit tours to a year; the average now is 18 months.

Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican, said the federal government must follow through on its pledge to replace equipment taken by Guard troops to Iraq.

"Those promises need to be kept," Pawlenty said. "We'll be able to test that, because we have a significant number coming back this summer. We'll be able to see if the equipment comes back."

The governors' willingness to challenge the buildup reflects overall impatience with Washington, which has inspired a slew of state initiatives to tackle such issues as global warming, energy efficiency and healthcare.

Eighty-eight percent of stateside Army National Guard units are "very poorly equipped," with less than half of what they need to respond to a domestic crisis, Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum testified a few weeks ago to the independent Commission on the National Guard and Reserves.

Blum, chief of the National Guard Bureau, coordinates between the states and the Pentagon.

He said 45% of Air National Guard units lacked the necessary equipment to deploy.

Last month, National Guard officials notified commanders in Arkansas, Indiana, Oklahoma and Ohio that their combat brigades — each about 3,500 strong — might be the first to return to Iraq under the new guidelines, redeploying between January and July of next year. All four states sent troops to Afghanistan and Iraq in 2004. Under the old rules, Oklahoma was not scheduled to be called on again until 2010; the other three states, 2009.

In interviews, National Guard officials in Arkansas, Indiana and Oklahoma said their units were short on rifles and other basic equipment.

"We are hurting in equipment nationally, Guard-wide," said Lt. Col. Deedra Thombleson of the Indiana National Guard.

Governors, in town for a National Governors Assn. meeting, plan to raise the issue Monday at a White House session with Bush. Guard officials plan to talk to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates about it Tuesday.

"We will do all that we can to support the effort, but getting the equipment to do that will be a challenge," said Maj. Gen. Roger Lempke, head of the Nebraska National Guard and president of the Adjutants General Assn. of the United States.

Equipping the Guard is of particular concern in states such as California and Florida, where troops are routinely called to respond to natural disasters like hurricanes and forest fires.

"We want to protect our troops and make sure they have what they need to deal with natural disasters," said Florida Gov. Charlie Crist, a Republican.

Gov. Easley of North Carolina called National Guard equipment levels across the country "putridly inadequate."

And without adequate equipment, he said, the National Guard's role in the buildup would amount to "a squandered mobilization."

With plans to increase the frequency of Guard deployments — now once every six years — North Dakota Gov. John Hoeven, a Republican, said that getting enough troops for a second rotation in Iraq was "a concern."

The governors association president, Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat who has advocated sending National Guard troops to secure the U.S.-Mexico border, said the Guard was "being stretched" to respond to the buildup.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, is reviewing the plans with his National Guard leadership to assess the impact on the state. He has advocated doing what's necessary to ensure success in Iraq but said he would not support a policy jeopardizing California's safety.

11 Days Till Baghdad (WP)

Crucial to the President's New Strategy for Iraq, A Commander and His Soldiers Head Into War

DOJ_NMG_0136632

FORT RILEY, Kan. -- Their camouflage on, their wives carrying infants, their older children carrying flags, the soldiers of George W. Bush's surge crowded into a gymnasium for their brigade deployment ceremony, a last public viewing before they disappeared into Iraq.

Baghdad, long an abstraction, was now imminent. Of the 21,500 additional troops President Bush decided to send to Iraq in the coming months, about 3,500 were coming from here. "Are you frightened?" a TV reporter called out. "I'm confident," one of those soldiers replied. An enormous American flag hung on the back wall. A military band lined up in formation. "Ready to go," another soldier said.

Outside, snow was coming toward this isolated place. Inside, as the bleachers filled and the doors swung closed against the cold, a 41-year-old soldier near the middle of the floor began clapping his hands in anticipation.

And now waved at his wife and children.

And now took his position in front of the soldiers he would soon be leading into combat.

This was Lt. Col. Ralph Kauzlarich, the commander of an Army battalion called the 2-16 -- the 2nd Battalion, 16th Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Brigade Combat Team, 1st Infantry Division. The unit has 800 soldiers, most in their late teens and deploying to Iraq for the first time under the command of a man who, in this gymnasium filled with believers, was among the biggest believers of all.

"We are America," is how Kauzlarich would describe his belief a few days later, just before boarding a plane that would take him and his soldiers for a year's deployment into the center of an increasingly unpopular war. "This nation can do anything that it wants to do."

Down the hill, in another part of Fort Riley, a different ceremony was underway. That one, a private memorial service, was for a 21-year-old sergeant from a different battalion who five days before was traveling through northern Iraq when a makeshift bomb detonated near his vehicle, making him one of 25 American troops to die that day in the war.

The ceremony in the gym was a celebration, however, and now, from the band, came a stirring series of notes from a trumpet, followed by a moment of quiet, interrupted by a single boom of a bass drum so sudden and explosive it caused people to flinch, including some of the soldiers.

Ralph Kauzlarich, who perhaps would be an American hero a year from now, or perhaps would be an American tragedy, didn't flinch, though. Instead, just for a moment, he smiled.

What is it like to be a soldier in an unpopular war? To be part of a troop increase that the American public is overwhelmingly against, and to lead 800 soldiers into a war being described as "barbaric" and a "meat grinder" and the result of a "failed policy" and down to "the last chance" and "lost"?

"What we're about to do is going to change every one of our lives," Kauzlarich told his command staff at a meeting the day after the ceremony, which had concluded with handshakes from people who would grab onto him and lock onto his eyes, as if they were already trying to remember the last time they saw Ralph Kauzlarich. "And it'll all be okay," he continued, "as long as we win."

So fiercely does Kauzlarich believe this -- that the war can be won and that it will be won -- it can seem as if he is the one grabbing onto something, in this case the idea that victory is a matter not only of strategy and tactics, but of sheer willpower as well. A true believer's certainty: This is Kauzlarich's, who at 8 years old announced to his family that when he grew up he wanted to be "a leader of men," became the youngest Eagle Scout ever in his home state of Montana, attended West Point, became an Army Ranger, served in Desert Storm, served in Afghanistan, played a controversial role in the Army review of the friendly-fire death of Cpl. Pat Tillman, served a special-operations tour in Iraq, has climbed steadily through the officer ranks, and has yet to experience military failure.

As one of his soldiers said: "He's the kind of guy you follow to hell and back. He's that kind of leader."

He has never lost a soldier under his command. "No, I have not had to contend with that yet," he said. He has never had a soldier of his even get hurt, has never loaded a wounded soldier of his onto a stretcher, or treated a bleeding soldier of his on a battlefield, or notified a family that their beloved child, or husband, or father, had died. "I've talked to families that have lost sons in combat," he said, but those conversations were well after the fact and didn't involve soldiers who were directly his.

That, he imagines, will change. "Statistically, there's probably a pretty good chance I'm going to lose men," he said, and like so many things that would happen in the 11 days between the deployment ceremony on Jan. 25 and his actual departure on Feb. 5, the statement seemed both factual and heartbreaking. Ironies and bittersweet juxtapositions are inescapable in wartime, and these days weren't any exception.

One day came news that two soldiers and 250 insurgents had died during all-day gun battles that were unusually fierce, even by the standards of Iraq; that was the day Kauzlarich, his wife and three children all put on matching outfits of blue jeans and white shirts and went to Sears for a family portrait.

Another day: "I looked at Ralph's body armor today, and picked it up, and felt it," Kauzlarich's father -- who had flown in with his wife to say goodbye, and had gone to his son's office, and had hoisted the armor, and had heard medics boast that they could get a wounded soldier to a hospital from anywhere in Baghdad in 15 minutes max, and had been spared the detail that snipers had begun aiming at soldiers' thighs in order to pierce the femoral artery -- said at dinner. There was ham. There were twice-baked potatoes. There was a Betty Crocker cookbook open on the counter. There was an apple crisp in the oven.

Earlier, out of his son's earshot, the father, whose name is also Ralph Kauzlarich, said: "I have feelings. I have fears. I know he could get injured. I know he could not get back. But I know what he feels, too. He believes this."

His eyes had gotten a little wet as he said this, but now, eyes back to dry, merely nodding, he ate ham and potatoes and listened as his son described the first time he had come under fire in Desert Storm, how he had thought he might die, how he hadn't.

"Okay, there's a reason I'm here," Kauzlarich said he decided that day, as his parents listened, and his wife, Stephanie, went to get the apple crisp out of the oven, and his 7-year-old daughter, Allie, climbed onto his lap for a hug, and his son Jacob, who was born just after Sept. 11, 2001, slid laughing across the floor on his belly. "I wasn't afraid of anything from that point on."

Later:

"That's all you want to be buried with?" Stephanie asked.

Kauzlarich was filling out something called the Family Contingency Workbook.

I want to be buried, cremated: Buried.

Location of Cemetery: West Point.

Personal effects I want buried with me: Wedding Band.

Yes, he told Stephanie, whom he had met when they were students at West Point and who hadn't exactly been seduced by his first words to her, which were: "You can call me The Kauz." That was all he wanted to be buried with.

Type of head stone: Military.

Scripture you want read: Psalm 23.

Music you want played: Something upbeat.

"Ralph, upbeat music?" Stephanie asked.

"I don't want people to be sad at my funeral," Kauzlarich said.

His soldiers -- average age 19, the oldest 46, the youngest 17 -- were filling out forms, too. Getting their wills in order. Designating powers of attorney. Working down final medical checklists: teeth, hearing, heart, blood pressure, blood type.

As part of a battalion that has been in almost every American conflict since the Civil War, these newest soldiers of the 2-16 had been training for a year for some type of mission, though they didn't know any details. When their deployment to Iraq became official in late 2006, they were told they would be protecting fuel convoys coming into the country from Jordan. But then Bush's troop increase was announced, along with a strategy shift toward counterinsurgency warfare, and now the soldiers were hearing that their mission would involve patrols somewhere in Baghdad.

Where exactly, and what exactly, were still a mystery to them. Kauzlarich knew. So did his top commanders. Every day, they would disappear for a while into a secure room at battalion headquarters to learn more about the area they would be trying to bring under control. "A mean and nasty little place," Kauzlarich said when he emerged one day, and meanwhile his soldiers continued to prepare for whatever.

"What in the hell?" asked Command Sgt. Maj. Michael McCoy, the battalion's top enlisted man, as he inspected lines of soldiers who stood at attention in the parking lot in their body armor, acting as if the wind wasn't making the temperature feel barely above zero. Straps weren't tight enough, ceramic plates intended to stop bullets were an inch off, medical kits containing compression bandages and tourniquets were attached to the left side instead of the right. "Consistency," McCoy reminded them. What if it was dark? What if in that dark another soldier was trying to find your medical kit, and you couldn't help him because you were too busy bleeding, and you couldn't direct him because you were too busy screaming?

They had briefings on health risks. Wash your hands. Don't smoke. Drink bottled water. Wear ear protection. Wear cotton underwear. Watch out for rats. "From what I hear, the forward operating base we're going to is right next to a sewage plant," said one of the briefers. And then came a chaplain who began: "All right. Stress management. Suicide prevention. Let's go." And on he went. "This is important. If you are not ready to die, you need to get there. If you are not ready to die, you need to be. If you are not ready to see your friends die, you need to be."

They had battle training, too, one day mounting up in mockups of Humvees that were surrounded by video screens showing all kinds of hellish scenarios. They were trying to maneuver to a downed helicopter. That was the exercise. There was an explosion, a suicide bomber, an ambush. One of the Humvees was hit. Two soldiers were dead. Three were alive. "You're talking about somebody who's on fire," came the directions to soldiers in one of the other Humvees, who were on their way to attempt a rescue. "You're talking about someone whose fingers are burning off. They can't reach over and unbuckle their seatbelt. You've got to get them out . . ." and meanwhile one of the "wounded" soldiers began crying theatrically, "I want to live! I want to live!"

This was Spec. Ryan Nyhus, 19, of whom Kauzlarich said: "The kid's heart is as big as a basketball. He's a superstar." A superstar now, but a year and a half ago he was a high school wrestler in Wisconsin who didn't get the college scholarship he'd hoped for, and so was open to a suggestion from a friend that they join the Army together. Nyhus was sworn in first. Then came the friend's turn, and as he raised his hand, someone noticed that he had signed his name on the enrollment form in the wrong place, and as Nyhus tells it the friend took it as a sign from God "and walked out. Went home. Now he's really big into photography."

Eight hundred soldiers, 800 stories.

McCoy's: Age 44, wife, two children, career Army. "My job is not to die for my country," he said. "It's to see how many of those bastards I can kill for their country."

Staff Sgt. Frank Gietz, 41: two Iraq tours already, the last one doing convoy escorts in which 18 of 132 soldiers in his company were killed, now in charge of a platoon of 32, one of whom asked him just before Christmas how to deal with having to kill somebody. "Yeah, it worried me," Gietz said. "That's why I talked to him for two hours." And said? "Put it in a dark place while you're there."

Pvt. Mario Luna, 17: He asked Gietz the question. He asked it because a girl he had been talking to asked it of him. "And that got me all wound up," Luna said, so Gietz told him to look at the thing he was about to shoot at "as a target, not as a person, and that got me back in the game."

Eight hundred -- and every one was now the responsibility of Kauzlarich, who kept disappearing into the secure room and reappearing with adjustments and refinements.

"I am right now vetting an initiative in which all of us grow mustaches," he told his command staff at one of their daily meetings. Maybe it would foster trust when they moved along the streets of Baghdad, he explained, because Iraqis regard a man with facial hair as a man and a man without facial hair as a boy. "Any advantage we can get," he said, and then he looked at the men he was talking to and wondered aloud: "Can you grow mustaches? I look at you. You've all got such baby faces."

The meeting continued, and meanwhile, outside Kauzlarich's office, Staff Sgt. Jeremy Hodges, 27, one of those baby faces, his with a round scar in a cheek that led to another scar on the back of his neck, told the story of what it was like to get shot in Iraq on July 21, 2006.

"Everything went dark," he said.

And: "I remember the moaning. I remember the gurgling sound in my throat."

And: "I thought it was my last breath of air that day, until I realized the pain was going to last forever."

And: "Hey sir," he wrote during his recuperation, in an e-mail to an officer he had met a few years before who had told him "what a great soldier I was" and "how much confidence he had in me," and who had been "kind of like a father figure to me," and had said Hodges would always be welcome in his command and had single-handedly persuaded him to reenlist.

"I asked him if he still wanted me," Hodges said. "I told him I was broken."

"I don't care," Kauzlarich wrote back. "I'll take care of you. When can I expect you?"

And here Hodges was, one of the 800, ready to tell any of the other 799 what it is like to get shot. Not that they'd asked. "They just kind of stare at me and wonder," Hodges said. But if they did ask, "I'd tell them it hurts."

They packed ammunition and photographs and first-aid kits and candy. They went into town and in a few cases drank too much, and in a few other cases went AWOL. Five days before departure, Kauzlarich studied a list of soldiers who wouldn't be able to go. Seven needed some sort of surgery. Two were about to have babies. One had an infant in intensive care. Two were in jail. Two (including Luna) would have to stay back until they turned 18. Nine were, for various reasons, "mentally incapable of doing what we're about to do."

But most could do what they were about to do, were eager to, impatient even, and said so in no uncertain terms.

"You ready?" McCoy asked soldier after soldier during another body armor inspection.

"Roger, Sergeant Major!"

"You sure?"

"Roger, Sergeant Major!"

"It's the decisive point of the fight," one soldier explained later, foot tapping, head nodding, practically vibrating. "This is the chance to win it."

DOJ_NMG_0136635

Belief, then. Kauzlarich remembers the day he realized how strong a force it could be. He was in Fort Benning, Ga., for advanced coursework, and at the end of an exercise, as he and other soldiers waited outside for a ride, a visiting soldier from Sierra Leone explained how he had survived that country's various wars.

"In my country, we put on a blouse. It is a magic blouse. When I wear it, I know bullets cannot harm me," Kauzlarich recalls him saying. The soldier then rolled up a sleeve of his magic blouse. "Let me show you," he said. "Give me a knife." Someone gave him a knife. "Watch," he said, and Kauzlarich watched incredulously as the soldier swung the knife, which had a four-inch, razor-sharp blade, down on his soft inner forearm. It went easily through the skin. It went through veins. It went through muscle. It went all the way down to the bone, and for one belief-filled moment everyone waited for the healing to begin -- and then the soldier collapsed.

"That's a form of belief," Kauzlarich said of what he learned that day. "That's also a form of jackassery."

What about Iraq's believers, though? The ones for whom a briefing about suicide would focus on how to do it in order to kill as many American soldiers as possible, rather than on how to prevent it? The ones who believe as surely as Kauzlarich believes, and who are presumably waiting for him?

"Who will win?" he said, rephrasing the questions. "I will win."

He thought about his answer.

"Is that belief or confidence?" he asked. "Is it confidence, or is it overconfidence? Those are questions I have to ask myself. Because if it's overconfidence, it's arrogance."

He thought some more.

"I will win," he said again.

Three days until departure now. Kauzlarich wanted his soldiers to have these last days off to be with their families, who had come here from a dozen states and filled every hotel room in town, but first he gathered them on a field behind battalion headquarters to tell them the details of what they were about to do. It had snowed, and it was cold, and the sun was going down as he said that they soon would be on the edge of Sadr City, Baghdad's infamous and violent slum. The soldiers ringed him and pressed closer to hear, and as he raised his voice, his words about "initiative" and "paranoia" and "emotion" echoed off the ice and the surrounding buildings, making this place feel even chillier than it was.

"Now it's not a game, guys," he said. "You are going to see some horrific things in the next year. You are going to see some things you are not going to understand. . . .

"It's down to nut-cutting time, and we're going to get some, but we're going to do it in a disciplined manner, like we do everything. . . .

"I am absolutely confident in your abilities, absolutely confident. . . .

"The bottom line is this weekend's your last, okay? So call your parents, love your families, stay focused on them for this weekend. Not later than Tuesday night, as soon as you get on that airplane and that airplane takes off, your sole focus is going to be winning our nation's war."

There was a pause, just long enough for the word "war" to echo and evaporate, and then the soldiers began to cheer, loudly and for a while, and then they left the field and headed inside the battalion building, filling room after room not with a soldier's bloodlust, which would come soon enough, but with the wintry smell of boys who have been out in the snow.

And then it was departure day, and in the Kauzlarich house a phone call came at 8:30 a.m. saying there had been a death.

The family, by then, was wide awake. The children were running around with stuffed animals purchased over the weekend, each with a memory chip containing a quick recorded message from their father for them to play over the coming year. "Hi Jacob. I love you." "Hi Garrett. I sure do love you." "I love you, Allie-gator."

And so came one more juxtaposition: "Sir, there's been a casualty forward," the caller said.

The dead soldier, who in coming days would be identified as the 3,100th U.S. fatality of the war, wasn't in Kauzlarich's battalion, but his brother was, and that's why Kauzlarich was being called. The parents didn't know yet. They were somewhere in the area visiting their son who was about to deploy, and a search for them was underway. Did Kauzlarich happen to know where they were saying goodbye to one son, so they could be informed that their other son had died?

He hung up. He pictured the soldier -- not the dead one, whom he didn't know, but the one in his battalion, who of course would now not be going to Iraq, at least not right away. He made some calls. No luck. More calls.

The morning continued. Seven-year-old Allie wanted his attention; the night before, after saying she had a headache, and then saying she might have a fever, she had said, "I don't want you to leave," and when he told her, "I'll be okay, and if I'm not okay, you'll be okay because I'll be checking on you," she had said, "Then I'll kill myself so I can be with you." The boys, too young for such sensitivities, ran around the house clobbering each other as usual, while Stephanie had her own images to contend with.

"Gray. Dismal. A very sad place to live," is how she would picture the place her husband was going when she would close her eyes. She had done her time in the Army after graduating from West Point, and she had a soldier's guarded sense of sentimentality, but now came a new image, that of a freshly dead soldier. She had been keeping any doubts about the mission to herself. "He believes in this," she had explained one day. But this day was different. "You better come back," she now said.

Belief vs. uncertainty: Such was the subtext in 800 places that morning as the Army continued its search for two parents and a son. The soldiers would be leaving in two groups over the next 24 hours. The first group was due at battalion headquarters at 1 p.m., and at 12:42 the first hug was underway in the parking lot, a tangle of moving arms that was still going strong at 12:43. By 12:45, tears had begun in several places, including inside a car where a woman sat motionless against the door, head in her hands, and so it continued as the afternoon progressed.

The soldiers smoked. They got their guns. They lined up their body armor. They waited, checking their watches, with wives, girlfriends, children, parents, grandparents. "I seen 'em off in World War II," said the grandfather of a private named Ricky Andrus. "I had a brother who was killed. A pilot on a B-24. He went down in the Mediterranean. He was 20 years old." Which was one year younger than Andrus, who was loading the family car with things he wouldn't be taking, including a pair of cowboy boots whose top halves had been dyed a beautiful blue.

A sergeant named Johnathan Pritchett, meanwhile, was kissing a young woman who was up on her tiptoes, while Gietz told his platoon to start wrapping up the goodbyes already, while Nyhus stood alone on a loading dock and recounted the advice he'd gotten the night before during a call with his friend the photographer. "Keep your head down," the friend had said.

Three p.m. now, and Kauzlarich arrived with Stephanie and the children. "This day sucks," he said. The soldier and his parents still hadn't been found, but it was only a matter of time now, and Kauzlarich understood there would be ripples as word began seeping out, first through the soldier's squad, then his platoon, then the battalion. Blood through a magic blouse; that's what the effect of this death would be. "There's nothing good about it," Kauzlarich said, and when he began saying goodbye to his family and Allie started to cry, something she hadn't done all the other times he had left, that only made things worse.

He said goodbye to his family in his office. He said goodbye again when he put them in the car. He said goodbye again when they didn't leave right away, just stayed in the car, and then he went back into his office and into the final hours.

Computer: packed. BlackBerry: packed. Extra tourniquet: packed. Extra compression bandage: packed. Family photo: packed. Lights: off. He shut the door to his office. He ducked into another office when Jeremy Hodges, who would be staying behind to recuperate, called to him. "Thank you. I will," Kauzlarich said, and walked on. "Jeremy Hodges. Great American," he said, and then he made his way to a nearby gymnasium for one last ceremony, this one with no TV cameras, no trumpets, no drum. Just soldiers sitting on bleachers, eating cookies and waiting to be bused to a plane and listening to one last speech.

"This is going to be hard. Probably the hardest thing you've ever done," the speech began. "But it's going to be okay."

It was the same thing Kauzlarich had said a few days before to his command staff, but this time it was a general talking while Kauzlarich stood to the side, bouncing up and down on the balls of his feet and looking at row after row of soldiers, every one of them his.

What if they die?

And what if he dies?

Would such a death, in such a war as this war has become, be worthwhile?

"It's worthwhile if we win," Kauzlarich said. "But to sacrifice, there's got to be a purpose. And if we don't win, then our sacrifices are going to be in vain."

"Good luck and Godspeed," the general said, ending his speech, and then it was time to go.

Out went the soldiers, funneling into single file to get through the exit doors. They had learned in training to avoid such a formation. Too easy for the enemy to get them. "The fatal funnel," it was called. But here, there was no enemy, only Kauzlarich, the man who had yet to fail, clapping them on their backs as they moved past.

"Ready?" he asked.

"Yessir."

"Good?"

"Yessir."

"Ready to be a hero?"

"Yessir."

Out they went, one by one, hundreds of them, until there was only one soldier left for Kauzlarich to speak to.

"Are we ready for war?" he asked himself, and then out he went, too, onto a bus, onto a plane, into Kuwait to regroup with his soldiers, and as of this week, into the heart of Baghdad, where any moment now their surge will begin for real.

He Wrote The Book. Can He Follow It? (WP)

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

If anyone can save Iraq, it's David H. Petraeus, the ultimate can-do general. Installed in Baghdad earlier this month, he's bringing in his A-team and rolling up his sleeves. The question for the history books is before us: Will he be an alchemist, fusing existing elements of a moribund strategy with his knowledge and willpower to erase the United States' biggest mistake since the Vietnam War? Or does success in Iraq require more than is humanly possible?

Many of Petraeus's strongest supporters fear that his new assignment is a no-win mission, one that could not only stain his professional reputation but also, ironically, discredit the new counterinsurgency doctrine he spent the past year creating.

Petraeus is almost unique among senior Army leaders in fully embracing both the theory and practice of counterinsurgency. During two previous tours in Iraq, he provided relative security and fostered economic and political reform in Mosul and Nineveh province and later overhauled the coalition's training of Iraqi forces. He incorporated lessons from these experiences directly into FM 3-24, the revised counterinsurgency field manual whose preparation he oversaw. The new manual challenges the Army to think differently about how it conducts war.

That's why, as director of a human rights center, I supported his efforts by cosponsoring the doctrine revision seminar and helping shape the field manual. It features such counterintuitive paradoxes as "Sometimes, the more you protect your force, the less secure you may be," and "Some of the best weapons do not shoot."

The paradoxes challenge much U.S. military experience in Iraq over the past four years. Winning, the manual says, requires first ensuring the security and well-being of the civilian population -- the center of gravity in these wars. Counterinsurgent forces must integrate into the population, assuming more physical risk to soldiers, and other tools such as money, humanitarian assistance and construction projects are critical to the fight.

On the surface, President Bush's new "surge" strategy appears to coincide with Petraeus's approach to counterinsurgency: providing security for the population and allowing the host government to take charge. But if you hold the president's strategy up to the light of Petraeus's doctrine, there's only one conclusion you can draw: You can't get there from here. The Bush plan is burdened with three main deficiencies: too few capable U.S., allied and Iraqi counterinsurgent forces; weak U.S. efforts at promoting political and economic reform; and corrupt or feckless Iraqi institutions and leadership. The administration's strategy may have changed, but the supporting components have not. And even if the general asks his chain of command to address these shortfalls, it's unlikely that fixes can be found.

According to the new counterinsurgency field manual, the proper "troop-to-task" ratio for Baghdad requires 120,000 U.S. and allied security forces. During his confirmation hearings, Petraeus carefully predicted that the present numbers will rise to 85,000, but only with some important caveats: if there is a full surge of 21,500 additional U.S. troops (recent administration hints of stopping deployments midway through the increase raise questions about this, however), and if you count all Iraqi security forces (which presumes that the troops both report for duty and prove capable -- both large assumptions). If you also count private American and foreign security contractors and the Iraqi guards that protect government ministries, the counterinsurgent numbers increase by tens of thousands.

Petraeus has never denied that the numbers didn't add up to the ideal. Instead, he has said that he could accomplish the security mission by using these forces differently than they have been used in the past, aggressively pushing them out among the population that they are supposed to secure. Petraeus may conclude -- consistent with the field manual -- that he needs more U.S. forces for a longer period of time. But given current political calculations in Washington, neither the administration nor Congress is likely to provide them.

Petraeus's counterinsurgency doctrine also holds that 80 percent of any counterinsurgency effort should be political. Yet the military has always been the 800-pound gorilla in Iraq. Petraeus is politely urging other government departments to play larger roles, and in particular to increase economic assistance to support the security effort. But the State Department can't even fill the civilian slots on the planned additional provincial reconstruction teams it is sending to Iraq; it has asked the Defense Department to provide military officers instead of foreign service officers. And no one has much confidence that State, Treasury or Justice Department support in Iraq will suddenly become effective -- particularly if security continues to disintegrate.

Finally, there is the field manual's mantra: It's the host government, stupid. Petraeus rightly points out that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is still young -- the fourth in 3 1/2 years. Bush's strategy is to provide the government with enough confidence and breathing room to make tough decisions and take decisive action. All good, except that virtually none of the institutions comprising Iraq's government function as advertised. Both the security apparatus and civilian agencies lack effective oversight or a meaningful national identity. The army, police and intelligence agencies are riddled with sectarian divisions and militia influence, while corruption and a lack of expertise erodes public trust in civilian bureaucracies that still cannot provide prewar levels of services.

Breathing space for this Iraqi government may provide life support, but not a cure. Only a soup-to-nuts overhaul focused on carefully vetting and training personnel and holding them accountable -- for years -- could realistically stem the rot. Given limitations in U.S. capacity and will, this is not feasible.

In addition to facing these jarring realities, an administration happy to return Petraeus to Baghdad should consider whether insurgency is even the right label for the sectarian bloodletting in Iraq. If it's really a civil war or worse, as the recent National Intelligence Estimate concluded, how much can an under-resourced counterinsurgency effort accomplish? In civil conflict, security requirements become paramount, in part because the political space for compromise has all but vanished. Stopping a civil war requires still more of the very resources and time that Petraeus currently lacks.

Placed in charge this late in the game, Petraeus should not have to carry the burden of Iraq's probable failure. Yet there is a silver lining in his appointment. Petraeus has the expertise to identify shortfalls and the likelihood of failure, and he has the credibility to force a political response. Even the president would have to take his assessments seriously. Petraeus vowed to provide forthright, professional military advice regarding the mission in Iraq. He testified that, by late summer, he should know whether the strategy is working. He promised to alert not just his immediate military superior, but Congress as well, if the strategy cannot succeed.

Petraeus may provide the ultimate service to the troops and the nation -- and seal his legacy -- not by winning, but by speaking the truth about Iraq.

Failing In Baghdad -- The British Did It First (WP)

By Toby Dodge

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

At the center of Baghdad's neglected North Gate War Cemetery, near the edge of the old city walls, stands an imposing grave. Sheltered from the weather by a grandiose red sandstone cupola, it is the final resting place of a man from whom George W. Bush could have learned a great deal about the perils of intervening in Iraq.

Lt. Gen. Sir Frederick Stanley Maude was head of the British army in Mesopotamia when he marched into Baghdad on a hot, dusty day in March 1917. Soon thereafter, he issued the British government's "Proclamation to the People of Baghdad," which eerily foreshadowed sentiments that Bush and his administration would express 86 years later: British forces, Maude declared, had entered the city not as conquerors, but as liberators.

Maude had arrived in Baghdad after a long and arduous military campaign. British forces had been fighting the Ottoman army for 2 1/2 years and had suffered one of the worst defeats of World War I in the six-month siege of the eastern city of Kut, which had ended in an ignominious surrender to the Turks in April 1916.

Having rallied from that loss and finally reached Baghdad, Maude tried to create common cause between the British army and the city's residents, whom he saw as having been oppressed by 400 years of Ottoman rule. "Your lands have been subject to tyranny," he declared in his proclamation, and "your wealth has been stripped from you by unjust men and squandered." He promised that it was not "the wish of the British Government to impose upon you alien institutions." Instead, he called on residents to manage their own civil affairs "in collaboration with the political representatives of Great Britain."

Maude did not live to see the failure of his efforts to rally the people of Iraq to the British occupation. He died eight months later, having contracted cholera from a glass of milk.

After his death, British policy toward Iraq changed repeatedly as the army attempted to dominate the country and suppress the population, while the government strove to adjust to Britain's diminished role in the international system after WWI. Initially, the aim was simply to annex the territory and make it part of the Empire, run in a fashion similar to India. But Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points speech in January 1918 did in that idea. In setting out America's vision for the postwar world, Wilson expressly attacked the duplicitous diplomacy of European imperialism, which he blamed for dragging the world into prolonged military conflict.

This meant that a modern, self-determining state was now to be built in Iraq. Britain was to take the lead, but its effort was to be continually scrutinized by the League of Nations, which had been set up under Wilson's watchful eye at the Paris Peace Conference at the end of the war.

In an echo of what is happening under the U.S. occupation, hopes for a joint Anglo-Iraqi pact to rebuild the country were dashed by a violent uprising. On July 2, 1920, a revolt, or thawra, broke out along the lower Euphrates, fueled by popular resentment of Britain's heavy-handed behavior in Iraq. The British army had set about taxing the population to pay for the building of the Iraqi state, while British civil servants running the administration refused to consult Iraqi politicians, judging them too inexperienced to play a role in the new government.

The rebellion quickly spread across the south and center of the country. Faced with as many as 131,000 insurgents armed with 17,000 modern rifles left over from the war, the British army needed eight months to regain full control of Iraq; 2,000 British troops were killed, wounded or taken prisoner and 8,450 Iraqis were killed. To make matters worse, the British government was forced to pour troops back into Iraq, long after the end of the war, to stabilize the situation.

The revolt forced Britain to devolve real power to Iraqi politicians. At the head of this new administration the British placed a newly created king, Faisal ibn Hussein, famous for his association with Lawrence of Arabia during the war. But the revolt had as much influence in Britain as it did in Iraq itself. The "blood and treasure" expended in putting down the violence made the continued occupation extremely unpopular. The public's discontent reached its peak in the general election campaign of November 1922. The leader of the opposition, conservative Andrew Bonar Law, captured the national mood when he declared: "We cannot alone act as the policeman of the world."

Newspapers and candidates organized their electioneering around the "bag and baggage" campaign demanding that Britain withdraw from Iraq as soon as it could. After defeating wartime coalition leaders David Lloyd George and Winston Churchill, the victorious Bonar Law pledged that "at the earliest possible moment, consistent with statesmanship and honour, the next government will reduce our commitments in Mesopotamia."

U.S. presidential candidates now campaigning to seize the White House in 2008 should be forewarned, however: It took Britain 10 more years to jettison its financial and military commitments to Iraq. During that period, a number of governments struggled to reduce the size of the forces deployed in Iraq and the amount of money being spent there. They strove for a decade to stabilize the country and meet Britain's pledges to the international community while trying to placate domestic opinion. The tensions involved in this exercise -- building a state from scratch with a hostile population, under severe budgetary constraints and in the face of rising domestic anger -- ultimately led to the failure of the whole exercise.

Like Maude's before him, Bush's policy in Iraq has resulted in a series of unintended outcomes. In the face of ever-increasing violence, the stirring rhetoric about Iraq becoming a beacon of democracy in the Middle East has been quietly dropped. Instead, the operation in Iraq has been placed on the frontline of the global fight against terrorism: It is better to battle terrorists on the streets of Baghdad than in Brooklyn or Houston, the mantra goes.

Where does this leave U.S. policy toward Iraq? Historical studies often divide military interventions into three general phases. The first phase, the initial decision to invade, is shaped by common misperceptions that the conflict will be short and that military force can be used to achieve political objectives. World War I began with an assumption that British troops would be home by Christmas; Bush declared "mission accomplished" after three weeks.

The second phase is marked by a slow realization that both these assumptions are wrong. The policy failure leads to increasingly desperate attempts to stay the course, to pour in ever greater numbers of troops, gambling on a resurrection of the initial policy. This middle stage comes to an end with the decision to disengage. Interestingly, this choice -- admitting defeat and going home -- is usually taken by a new government.

The 1920 revolt, followed by the change of government in London in 1922, led to a prolonged but largely unsuccessful attempt to do nation-building on the cheap. The final transformation of policy was marked by another change of government. The election of May 1929 resulted in a Labor administration. The new foreign policy team found it easier to identify the contradictions at the heart of Britain's relations with Iraq and find ways to overcome them. It recommended Iraq for unconditional membership to the League of Nations in 1932, unceremoniously dumping Britain's commitment to building a democratic and stable state.

Iraq became a fully independent state that same year. But it was unable to defend itself against its neighbors, or to impose order without assistance. The government was ultimately dependent on the British air force to guarantee its survival.

Eighty years later, after failing to stabilize Iraq, the U.S. government has come face to face with the high costs of the new "forward-leaning" foreign policy of the Bush doctrine. Comparisons with other military interventions suggest that Bush will continue to pursue a largely unvarying policy in Iraq, deploying all the troops and resources at his disposal in an attempt to correct the mistakes that have been made. The result, as the president himself has recognized, will be to push the difficult decisions about the future of U.S. involvement in Iraq onto his successor.

History, however, has two final disturbing lessons for the next president. The governing elite nurtured by the British to take their place -- the Iraqi royal family and their associates brought to the country in 1921 -- proved unfit for the purpose and were swept aside by a military coup in 1941. The British army was forced to reinvade and restore them to power. Yet even this second invasion was not enough. The violent instability that engulfed Iraq and resulted in the rise of Saddam Hussein was triggered by the murder of the royal family by Iraqi army officers in July 1958. The crime was committed in the name of Arab nationalism, as a strike against British interference in a sovereign Arab nation.

Here is what Britain's history of failure at building a democratic state in Iraq in the 1920s and '30s tells George W. Bush and his successors: If, like Gen. Maude, they fail to deliver on the promises of a better future for the Iraqi people, then Iraq will continue as a font of violent instability long after those who made the promises have been buried.

The Iraqis Down The Street (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

'HAVE you tried any of the new Iraqi restaurants over on Coldwater Canyon?"

That might sound odd today, but within a few years, Angelenos may very well come to learn more about Iraqi cuisine and culture than they ever could have imagined. There may develop a Little Mesopotamia — possibly with its own marker on the freeway — in the Valley, or maybe in the OC. You never know.

What's likely, though, is that this appreciation we'll gain of Iraqi culture will come about only after our troops have left that country and Baghdad is no longer a front-page dateline. Better late than never, I suppose.

Such a cycle — the time it takes for a major U.S. overseas commitment to ripple back into our nation's demographic fabric — isn't new. After all, how many Americans were going to Korean restaurants in 1952, or Vietnamese ones two decades later?

Two weeks ago, the White House announced that the U.S. would accept up to 7,000 Iraqi refugees by the end of this year. It's an initial trickle; we should be receiving more. Not just because it's the humane thing to do but because it serves our interests.

Throughout the 1990s, when Saddam Hussein was in power, the U.S. accepted tens of thousands of Iraqi refugees. But since the 2003 invasion, we've received fewer than 500 people from a nation in which sectarian violence has sent 2 million people into exile. It's hard to take refugees from a country that you are trying to pretend is a happily liberated place, relishing the peace and prosperity you've delivered to it. But that pretense is wearing thin, and in being more candid about the realities on the ground in Iraq, the Bush administration is going to have to allow more refugees from that country.

Ever since the federal government first recognized refugees as a distinct group in the aftermath of World War II, the U.S. has favored people fleeing from enemy states and places where we've intervened militarily. From 1982 to 2002, 80% of all refugees fell into those two categories, the largest group coming from Southeast Asia. It should come as little surprise that the U.S. welcomes few refugees from nations that it perceives as having no strategic value.

U.S. military intervention overseas has historically created lasting ties to those lands. In fact, the size of contemporary immigrant communities in this country is often directly related to the intensity of U.S. military interest in the refugees' home countries.

Thinking back to my own suburban Los Angeles upbringing, I'm struck by how many of my childhood friends and teenage dates were first linked to the U.S. by war. The Korean American classmates I studied with were, in a very real sense, the legacy of the Korean War. Filipinos were first linked to the U.S. by the Spanish-American War in 1898 and then came in large numbers after their role as allies in World War II. The Armenians who transformed my hometown in the 1980s were products of the Cold War. My college girlfriend, who transformed me, was Vietnamese.

We know now that as U.S. influence expands throughout the world, the world's influence expands here at home. And accepting refugees can improve the nation's image overseas.

"The more you have refugees entrenched here and becoming Americans, the more they export American values back home," said Georgetown University political scientist Yossi Shain. "Members of mobilized diasporas become ambassadors for the United States around the world." Of course, 7,000 refugees do not a diaspora make. But those numbers are likely to grow as the war lingers on. A quick military withdrawal could also lead to louder demands to assist the many Iraqis who have risked their lives for U.S. interests. In the months after the fall of Saigon in April 1975, the U.S. resettled 130,000 Vietnamese refugees. Many more followed.

"Seven thousand is not just a family," said University of Chicago sociologist Saskia Sassen. "They will come from many families and many communities, and they will build bridges back to these places. This is a form of soft diplomacy that benefits us in the long run." Although it won't likely alter our image among hard-liners, opening our doors to Arab Muslim refugees could help mold public opinion in the Middle East.

But whatever the final number of refugees may be, one day soon these new Iraqi arrivals and their children will be part of us. And as unlikely as it may seem at this dark hour, a war that has already killed tens of thousands of people may bring our two nations closer.

Bomb At Iraqi Mosque Kills 36 After Sunni Imam Condemns Militants (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel

DOJ_NMG_0136641

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 24 — A truck bomb detonated beside a Sunni mosque and public market near Falluja on Saturday, killing 36 people and wounding at least 62 more worshipers a day after the imam there condemned Sunni militants, according to Iraqi security authorities.

The blast, which struck during a prayer service in Habbaniya, a town between Falluja and Ramadi in one of the most dangerous areas of Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, was unusual in that such bombings are a staple of Sunni insurgents. Attacks of that sort are usually directed at Iraqi police and soldiers, or at Shiite sites or mixed neighborhoods.

Residents of Habbaniya said the mosque's imam had condemned Qaeda militants during Friday Prayer the day before, and there was immediate speculation that the attack was linked to his sermon.

A statement issued by the American military said the blast struck about 4:30 p.m. near a school and Iraqi police station, in addition to the mosque. "The target of the attack is not known," the statement said. The military said American forces arrived quickly to help secure the area and transport victims to hospitals.

The bombing was the worst of several attacks in Iraq on Saturday, including one that left at least eight Iraqi national policemen dead at a checkpoint about two miles south of Baghdad International Airport.

According to the American military, witnesses said as many as 10 insurgents rushed to the checkpoint and leaped out of a vehicle, firing assault rifles and lobbing grenades at the police.

Two attackers were killed, but a military statement did not say what had happened to the other attackers. The statement also said American forces arrived and were fired on by the attackers, and then called in unspecified "aviation support."

In another car bombing, at least three people were killed and nine wounded in Baghdad near the compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the powerful Shiite party Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Interior Ministry said.

On Friday, American forces detained and then released Mr. Hakim's eldest son, Amar, after he crossed the border from Iran back into Iraq. The detention spurred demonstrations in Basra and the Shiite holy city of Najaf, and prompted the American military to issue a statement on Saturday calling the episode "unfortunate" but suggesting members of Amar al-Hakim's convoy had provoked the scuffle.

Reiterating both his earlier comments as well as assertions made on Friday by a senior aide to his father, Amar al-Hakim complained at a news conference in Najaf that American forces had physically abused his guards and treated him roughly and disrespectfully.

President Jalal Talabani, whose Kurdish political coalition is the primary governing partner of the dominant Shiite coalition headed by the elder Mr. Hakim, released a statement sharply criticizing the detention and demanding that American commanders hold accountable soldiers who he said had mistreated Mr. Hakim.

Mr. Hakim is considered an heir to his father's political dynasty, and in recent years he has spent much of his time in Shiite southern Iraq building support for his father's ambitions, including a controversial proposal to carve out an autonomous state made up of nine Shiite provinces.

Initially, an American military official said Amar al-Hakim was seized because his passport had expired and because he was traveling with men possessing a large number of weapons.

On Saturday, the military released a longer but less specific statement that said Mr. Hakim was never mistreated. And while Iraqi border officials and associates of Mr. Hakim have said he was detained by American troops, the military on Saturday asserted that Iraqi border forces led the detainment and were merely "supported" by American forces.

Mr. Hakim's convoy "was initially stopped because the vehicles met specific criteria for further investigation in an area where smuggling activity has taken place in the past," the military said. "At the time, members of the convoy did not cooperate with Coalition Forces and displayed suspicious activities which subsequently led to Mr. Hakim's detention."

Mr. Hakim "was treated with dignity and respect throughout the incident," the military said, adding that "unfortunate incidents such as this occasionally occur as Iraq endeavors to secure its borders."

At Least 40 Die In Bombing At Sunni Mosque In W. Iraq (WP)

Attack Follows Sermon Denouncing Insurgents

BAGHDAD, Feb. 24 -- During what turned out to be the last Friday prayer he led, Imam Mohammad al-Marawi urged worshipers at a Sunni mosque in the western city of Habbaniyah to stand firmly against al-Qaeda in Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group that has a strong following in the area.

"A bunch of corrupted individuals," the imam called the group's members, according to a man who was at the service.

DOJ_NMG_0136642

Less than 24 hours later, someone in a Mercedes truck drove up next to the mosque and detonated explosives hidden under a load of stone and marble. At least 40 people were killed, including 15 who were praying inside.

The blast Saturday afternoon in front of Hay al-Ummal mosque killed several passersby, including women and children. The mosque is within a few feet of a children's clinic and a police station.

"If the target was the police station, the truck would have been placed near it, not next to the mosque's outer wall," said Hussein Ali, a prominent community leader.

The bombing was the first in recent months to kill dozens of civilians in a predominantly Sunni area. But witnesses said that unlike other large attacks, this one did not appear to have been driven by sectarian rivalries -- Shiite militias are not known to be active in the area -- but rather was probably carried out as a warning from Sunni extremists to Sunnis who support the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

Tribal leaders in Habbaniyah and other Sunni insurgent strongholds in volatile Anbar province have tried to mobilize civilians against al-Qaeda in Iraq, which has sought to impose strict Islamic code in several regions and has frequently attacked U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Falah al-Dulaimi, leader of Anbar Civil Defense, one of several groups trying to quell the insurgency, said in a telephone interview that insurgents had nicknamed the city "Tel Aviv," a disparaging reference to U.S. influence.

Despite warnings from Sunni insurgents, women in Habbaniyah are not forced to cover their hair with the traditional hijab, and residents are free to use the Internet and cellphones.

U.S. soldiers stationed at a nearby facility responded to the blast in Habbaniyah, which is about 50 miles west of Baghdad. They cordoned off the area and transported many of the wounded to medical centers.

Alaa Jaber al-Marawi, 30, who owns a grocery store across the street from the mosque, said the bombers probably picked the site because it is on the edge of the city's well-guarded center. He said in a phone interview that his brother was among the injured and that one of his legs was amputated Saturday night.

The attack came as thousands of troops from across the country are being deployed to the capital for the implementation of the Baghdad security plan. Some provincial leaders are concerned that the new measures in Baghdad might push insurgents and militias to other parts of the country.

Also Saturday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani issued a statement calling for the punishment of U.S. soldiers involved in the temporary detention of the son of an influential Shiite political leader.

Amar al-Hakim -- whose father, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, heads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq -- was detained Friday near the southern city of Kut after returning from Iran.

Talabani said Hakim had "received uncivil and inappropriate treatment" during his hours-long detention. U.S. officials said soldiers had not singled him out, and they described his detention as a routine procedure along the heavily patrolled border.

Truck Bomb In Iraq Hints Of Sunni Feud (WT/AP)

By Brian Murphy, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A suicide truck bomber sent a deadly storm of metal, stone and jagged plaster through worshippers leaving a Sunni mosque yesterday, killing at least 39 in a likely sign of escalating internal Sunni battles between insurgents and those who oppose them.

The motive for the attack was not immediately clear, but it carried the hallmarks of an increasingly bloody struggle for control of Anbar province -- a hotbed of anti-U.S. guerrillas since the uprising in Fallujah in 2004 that galvanized the insurgency.

U.S. military envoys and pro-government leaders have worked hard to sway clan chiefs and other influential Anbar figures to turn against the militants, who include foreign jihadists fighting under the banner of al Qaeda in Iraq. The extremists have fought back with targeted killings and bombings against fellow Sunnis.

The blast in Habbaniyah -- in the heart of insurgent territory about 50 miles west of Baghdad -- was among the deadliest against civilians in Anbar.

The imam of the mosque had spoken out against extremists -- most recently in a sermon Friday, residents said. Many people in the neighborhood work for the Iraqi military and police forces, who frequently come under attack by militants.

The truck, filled with building materials such as stone and plaster board, was blown apart as worshippers left after midafternoon prayers.

Rescuers, including U.S. soldiers, pulled survivors from the debris. The U.S. military sealed off the area and said it opened its medical facilities to "the most life-threatening injuries" among the more than 60 hurt.

DOJ_NMG_0136643

Police Lt. Abdul-Aziz Mohammed placed the death toll at 39, but authorities warned it could rise. The U.S. military said it was a suicide attack.

The attack occurred a day after U.S. troops raided a factory complex in Fallujah full of propane tanks and industrial chemicals that the military said could be used to make bombs. Back-to-back bombings in the past week released chlorine gas and raised worries that insurgents were experimenting with chemicals to boost the terror level of their attacks.

At least 14 persons were killed in bombings around Baghdad yesterday, most of the explosions targeting Shi'ite areas, even as U.S.-Iraqi forces press ahead with neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweeps seeking to reclaim control of the city.

After nightfall, nearly 20 strong blasts reverberated through Baghdad in a reported exchange of fire between U.S. troops and insurgents south of the capital.

"There is no safe shelter for all outlaws," said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who reported that 426 militants have been captured since the campaign began Feb. 14, but the crackdown also has sent Sunni insurgents fleeing the city to the nearby province of Diyala, which has emerged as a new and busy front for U.S. troops.

It's become so volatile that the Pentagon may delay plans to turn over control of Diyala to the Iraqi military by the end of the year, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon told the Associated Press.

"The potential is there" to hand over Iraq's other 17 provinces, "except in Diyala, where the future remains in question," said Gen. Mixon, commander of U.S. forces in northern Iraq, which includes Diyala.

Diyala, northwest of Baghdad, is known as "Little Iraq" because of its nearly equal mix of Sunni and Shi'ite Arabs as well as Kurds -- the country's three major groups. Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi, a Jordanian, was killed in a U.S. air strike in Diyala last year. Sunni extremists claim Diyala's capital, Baqouba, as the seat of an Islamic state in Iraq.

Direct-fire attacks on U.S. soldiers are up 70 percent in Diyala since last summer, and fierce battles have raged since the Baghdad security plan began.

"We're working our way into the Baghdad security plan, and we won't be into the thick of it until late spring or summer," Gen. Mixon said. "I expect more violence in Diyala through then."

Shi'ite compliance is essential for the Baghdad plan to work. Shi'ite leaders apparently have ordered their militia, including the powerful Mahdi's Army, not to confront the security operation.

But the cooperation suddenly has been strained after U.S. military border guards stopped and searched the heir-apparent of the largest Shi'ite political group.

"Is this the way to deal with a national figure? This does not conform with Iraq's sovereignty," said Amar al-Hakim, 35, who was taken into custody for nearly 12 hours Friday after crossing from Iran with bodyguards.

Al-Hakim's father, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, heads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, which has close ties with Iran and is the strongest voice in Iraq's 275-seat parliament. In December, he met President Bush at the White House.

The younger Mr. al-Hakim -- whom many believe is being groomed to take over the group -- said U.S. soldiers handcuffed and blindfolded him before his release and "strongly abused" his bodyguards. He said cellular phones, licensed weapons and two-way radios were among items confiscated.

A U.S. military statement called the detention "unfortunate," but insisted Mr. al-Hakim was not mistreated.

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, called the detention "uncivilized and inappropriate."

Iraq Insurgents Turn On Sunnis (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen, Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD — At least 37 Iraqis were killed Saturday in a highly unusual insurgent bomb attack against Sunni Arabs as they were leaving a mosque.

A preacher at the Sahaba mosque in Habbaniya, 40 miles west of Baghdad, had delivered a blistering sermon a day earlier condemning Al Qaeda activities in Iraq, an official in the town said.

U.S. military officials helped secure the site and evacuate dozens of injured Iraqis. The most seriously wounded were taken to a nearby base, a news release said.

Shiite Muslims are the main Iraqi targets of the Sunni-led insurgency. But police and residents in the Sunni Muslim-dominated area said the people had largely aligned against Al Qaeda militants operating in the region. They said most of the young men in the village, between Fallouja and Ramadi, were employed in the police and the army — unusual for Al Anbar province, long a hotbed of insurgent activities.

The mosque, as well as a nearby market and shops, was severely damaged in the explosion.

DOJ_NMG_0136644

Across Iraq on Saturday, car bombs and mortar attacks killed and wounded dozens of people, including a car bomb outside the Baghdad headquarters of Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and the largest Shiite voting bloc in the Iraqi parliament, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

Three people were killed and seven others were injured, primarily merchants and their customers.

Another car bomb in an area busy with vendors near the capital's fortified Green Zone, where U.S. and Iraqi government offices are located, killed two people and injured eight others. Rocket and mortar fire killed one and injured nearly two dozen others, including some women and children, in incidents in south and west Baghdad.

Iraqi special forces shot and killed a would-be suicide bomber as he was trying to detonate an explosive device in a crowd in a mixed area of southern Baghdad.

Some of the attacks Saturday targeted Iraqi military and police installations that had been established in the renewed effort to secure the country, injuring officers.

A former Iraqi general was assassinated by gunmen near his house in southwest Baghdad, and a tribal sheik was killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Kirkuk.

Police patrols found the bullet-riddled bodies of 20 men dumped around the capital on Saturday, a higher tally than in recent days but still lower than during the spasm of violence that had consumed Baghdad in past weeks.

Beyond Baghdad, Beyond 'the Surge,' War Still Simmers (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

THE letter from Al Qaeda in Iraq to the members of the local police was clear.

Come to the mosque and swear allegiance on the Koran to Al Qaeda, the letter warned, or you will die and your family will be slaughtered. Also, bring $1,200.

It had the desired effect on American efforts to build an Iraqi security force here.

Nearly a third of the local police force went to the mosque, paid the money and pledged their allegiance. Another third was killed. By late October, only 34 local police officers were left to try to maintain order in this city of 100,000.

Events in Baghdad have dominated the news as American troops move aggressively to quell the sectarian violence that has set Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods at war with each other. But a visit to this restive city is a reminder not only of the many fronts of the war, but also of its many complexities.

While sectarian warfare dominates Baghdad, and southern Shiite cities like Basra contend with criminal gangs and tribal violence as splinter groups compete for power, a different dynamic is at work in this predominately Sunni city on the Tigris River between Baghdad and Tikrit, the birthplace of Saddam Hussein.

Samarra, 65 miles north of Baghdad, is home to the Mosque of the Golden Dome, one Iraq's most sacred Shiite shrines. A year ago, Sunni insurgents bombed the mosque, ripping a hole in the dome and unleashing sectarian violence in the country.

Even so, there has been little of the sectarian violence here that has engulfed Baghdad, where scores of tortured bodies turn up every day and suicide bombers claim dozens in attacks directed at civilians.

Here, and in other cities to the north and west of Baghdad, where Shiites are a distinct minority, Sunni militants continue to wage war on Americans and terrorize the civilian population into submission.

The coordinated attack on an American combat outpost north of Baghdad on Monday by Sunni militants, which left two soldiers dead and some 30 wounded, is an example of the kind of stepped-up attacks the American military fears could become more common.

Lt. Col. Viet X. Luong, the commander of the 2nd Battalion of the 505th Parachute Regiment in the 82nd Airborne Division, said he was seeing an increase in militant activity to the south of Samarra. That, he said, is partially a result of the Americans' successes in the city, but also likely the result of Sunni militants moving out of Baghdad to escape the American offensive there.

"We are getting attacked between the seams," he said.

Over the past five months, his soldiers in the city have conducted more than 1,000 raids, been attacked by improvised explosive devices 69 times and come under direct fire attack at least 85 times, the colonel said.

There are at least two different forces here battling the Americans: the Islamic Army of Iraq, a homegrown militant group made up largely of former Baathists, and Al Qaeda in Iraq, which is aided and sometimes directed by foreign fighters.

Some members of the Islamic Army of Iraq, the main Sunni militant group here, said in interviews that they were pressing Al Qaeda to focus on Shiite militias and not the Americans, whom they see as a temporary buffer in their fight against the Shiites.

Local residents say that Al Qaeda is so bold as to even run a training camp within the city, managing to avoid the American patrols and intimidating the local population through murder and kidnapping.

DOJ_NMG_0136645

American soldiers were supposed to pull out of Samarra by March, but the Iraqi security forces are still nowhere near ready to take charge. Colonel Luong says it will likely be another 6 to 12 months before the Iraqis could hope to stand on their own.

The risks of pulling out too soon have already been demonstrated. Twice in the past four years, the city has fallen to militants. And twice, it took major American offensives to reclaim the city.

Even now, many consider it unsafe. “No judge can come to Samarra because he will be killed,” said Lt. Col. Abdul Jalil Hanni, the commander of the local police force, which now numbers 114. Many new recruits come from Sunni cities farther north.

There are another 201 National Police officers in the city, but nearly 70 percent of them are Shiite, presenting a host of additional complications in this Sunni city. While their commander is Sunni, residents interviewed over the past two weeks said they did not have the slightest faith in them. The Iraqi Army does not patrol in the city.

Capt. Buddy Ferris, who leads Company C at a small outpost on the edge of the city, said that if Americans left tomorrow, the effect on Iraqi security forces would be like “sudden infant death syndrome.”

Captain Ferris and his soldiers see the problems clearly, but the company is proud of its achievements, like bringing the police force back from near collapse.

In six months, the company has established a network of local informants and recently captured a Qaeda member who was sent to Guantánamo because of his connections to suspected terrorists outside Iraq. Captain Ferris acknowledges they have not yet won the loyalty of the population but says he thinks they have a strong leader in Colonel Jalil, whose son, Hassan 18, was assassinated by militants.

Colonel Jalil, whose camouflage uniform covered the scar of a bullet wound in his right arm, says the Americans are too soft. “They do not let me slap them,” he said of the militants, in an interview. A former officer in Saddam Hussein’s feared Mukhabarat, the colonel talked about how he would like to have a free rein to beat prisoners and kill them without trials if they are guilty.

As he spoke, a television in the corner of his office was showing the movie “Annie.” The little orphan was singing, “The Sun Will Come Out Tomorrow.”

Iraqi Allies, U.S. Split On Baathist Policy (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD — The son of one of Iraq's most prominent Shiite politicians lashed out at the United States in an incendiary televised appearance Saturday, a day after he was detained by American troops.

Thousands of Iraqis took to the streets across the country to protest the detention of Ammar Hakim, whose father's political party has been a major U.S. ally. The demonstrators chanted "Down with America" and called Western forces "occupiers" who must leave the country.

Not only has the arrest angered followers of the moderate Shiite party led by his father, Abdelaziz Hakim, it has provided common ground with more radical followers of the anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

U.S. policymakers have advocated isolating Shiite radicals from more moderate figures in the community. But at rallies across the country Saturday, members of Sadr's Al Mahdi army, longtime rivals of the Hakim family, protested alongside members of the elder Hakim's Badr Brigade militia.

Ammar Hakim was arrested and held for several hours because of what were said to be questions about his passport as he crossed into Iraq from Iran. He said soldiers stopped him without good reason, treated him rudely and roughly and appeared to have kept seven AK-47s, 14 pistols and more than $6,000 in U.S. and Iraqi currency taken from him and his bodyguards.

"The U.S. troops said that they treated me politely, which is not true," Hakim said in a televised news conference. One soldier "kicked me violently against the wall. He handcuffed me. He bound my eyes."

The arrest and subsequent protests come at a sensitive time, as the U.S. tries to build relationships with the Iraqi people amid a security crackdown. The incident has the potential to undermine relations between Iraq's majority Shiites and the U.S. forces that toppled their Sunni oppressors.

"We condemn this trespassing act of the U.S. forces that is illegal and against the human rights," said Sheik Suhail Uqabi, a spokesman for Sadr in the city of Najaf. "This reveals the reality of double standards in the U.S. policy toward the Iraqi people, even against the forces that are working under the constitutional political process."

U.S. diplomats have apologized for the incident and said they would investigate Hakim's complaints. They have noted that he was quickly released, and have defended the soldiers involved by saying they followed standard procedures.

Abdelaziz Hakim is the leader of the largest Shiite voting bloc in the Iraqi parliament, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI. The elder Hakim met with President Bush in Washington in December and pledged to help stem the violence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0136646

The elder Hakim was an opponent of Saddam Hussein and spent much of the 1980s in exile in Iran as a commander of the Badr Brigade.

The militia has close ties to Iran and has been accused of operating death squads targeting Sunnis, but it is also viewed as among the more moderate Shiite forces in Iraq.

Ammar Hakim leads the Shahid al-Mihrab Foundation, a charity affiliated with SCIRI that provides food and money to the foundation's supporters.

Iraqi sensitivity about the arrest stems from a feeling that it impinged on the country's sovereignty.

Protesters said they were offended that foreign soldiers could detain a prominent figure so easily, on mere suspicion.

"What the U.S. troops have done is a direct digression of the laws, and a dangerous initiative," said Ahmed Fatlawi, a lawyer and member of Najaf's provincial council. "Abdelaziz is a moderate man who has been trying to bring people together, especially on the political level."

In Hillah, south of Baghdad, a crowd of about 300 people, including followers of Sadr and SCIRI supporters, protested the detention, calling for the "liberation" of Iraq and condemning U.S. policy in the country.

More than a thousand people gathered in front of the SCIRI offices in Baghdad's Sadr City to denounce the way Hakim was treated during his arrest.

"It harmed our feelings," demonstrator Abu Muthanna Waili said. "Such behaviors create a tension inside the country."

In Najaf, Sadr militia representative Oon Abid Ali participated in a demonstration with several hundred people in which protesters chanted anti-U.S. slogans and carried banners saying they held U.S. troops responsible for Hakim's alleged mistreatment.

The detention "is a message … that the U.S. troops could arrest any figures going against its plans," Ali said. "We shall be seeing such acts a lot soon."

Mohammed Mousawi, the head of the Badr organization in Najaf, said, "We did not expect that it would reach this level of naivete and meanness. We are asking the U.S. troops to go out of Iraq immediately. We used to think highly of them."

Car Bomb Kills Dozens; Mystery Blasts Rock Baghdad (CNN)

CNN.com, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- At least 39 people were killed Saturday when a car bomb exploded as they left a Sunni mosque in Habbaniya, Iraq, an Interior Ministry official said.

Also Saturday, only hours after Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki announced "positive results" in Baghdad security, several strong blasts were heard in the capital.

The car bomb, which occurred about 40 miles west of Baghdad, wounded 61 people outside a mosque, a school and an Iraqi police station, according to Multi-National Forces-Iraq.

Medical personnel arrived to help and coalition forces were providing security and helping take the injured to medical facilities.

Local residents told The Associated Press the imam of the mosque had spoken out against extremists.

Also, according to AP, many who live in the neighborhood are employed by Iraqi military and police forces, who are frequently the targets of militant strikes.

The vehicle exploded as worshippers left the mosque's afternoon prayers, AP reported. It was filled with stone and plaster and other building materials. After the blast, U.S. soldiers joined other rescuers who pulled survivors from the rubble, AP reported.U.S.-Iraqi operations

In Baghdad, the U.S. military attributed the mysterious explosions to "indirect fire," a reference to mortar or artillery fire. "We do not know where it is coming from," the military told CNN.

Gen. Qassim Moussawi, spokesman for Baghdad's ongoing U.S.-Iraqi military security plan, said he didn't know the cause behind the explosions, but confirmed that joint operations were being conducted in the southern part of the capital city.

Earlier Saturday, Prime Minister al-Maliki said the U.S.-Iraqi crackdown has dismantled terrorist cells and yielded the arrests and killing of hundreds of insurgents.

Al-Maliki spoke to reporters after a tour of the security plan command center. The prime minister said 426 suspected insurgents have been detained and roughly the same number killed.

The crackdown has reduced sectarian killings and kidnappings; foiled terrorist plots; and allowed hundreds of displaced families to return home, al-Maliki said.Politician's son slams troops

A day after he was detained at a checkpoint, the son of a leading Iraqi politician lambasted U.S. troops who held him, accusing them of blindfolding and pushing him and keeping possessions they confiscated.

DOJ_NMG_0136647

"There is no excuse for what happened," said Ammar al-Hakim in Najaf Saturday. "It shouldn't happen to anyone in the future."

He is the son of leading Shiite politician Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who has close ties to both Iran and the United States and is considered by some people the most powerful Shiite politician in Iraq.

Ammar al-Hakim and his armed entourage were stopped Friday while attempting to enter Iraq's Wasit province from Iran. He was searched, then blindfolded and handcuffed as troops pushed him against a wall and yelled, al-Hakim said.

The troops also searched his car and suitcase -- where they found clothing and about $1,000 -- and they confiscated from his bodyguards seven Kalashnikov rifles, 14 handguns, seven cell phones and $4,250, said the politician's son.

None of the bodyguards' items was returned, he added.

The U.S. military disputes the account, saying all possessions were returned.

The U.S. military on Saturday defended Ammar al-Hakim's arrest and detention, a day after the U.S. ambassador to Iraq apologized for it.

The military's statement on Saturday did not include an apology.

It stated that "unfortunate incidents" may happen occasionally as Iraq "endeavors to secure its borders," but al-Hakim was "treated with dignity and respect throughout the entire incident."

Smugglers have used the checkpoint in the past, the military said, and Ammar al-Hakim's convoy "met specific criteria for further investigation."

Troops arrested al-Hakim and his entourage only after they failed to "cooperate with coalition forces and displayed suspicious activities," the U.S. military said.

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim is the leader of the United Iraqi Alliance and the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. The alliance is the dominant political coalition in Iraq, and SCIRI is one of the leading parties in the alliance.Other developments

Just north of Baghdad, five suspected members of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mehdi Army were detained in a village east of Taji on Saturday, the U.S. military said. The military said the suspects were part of a cell believed to be responsible for kidnappings, murders and roadside bombings.

Farther to the north, in Nineveh, an insurgent suspected of participating in a "foreign fighter smuggling network" was detained Saturday near Tal Afar. The network has smuggled fighters, arms and money into Iraq to support the insurgency, the U.S. military said.

A suicide attack outside a SCIRI compound in Baghdad killed three people and wounded seven, an Interior Ministry official said, adding that the compound was not the bomber's target. A suicide car bomber was about 500 yards away from an exterior checkpoint when guards opened fire because they considered the vehicle suspicious. The bomber then detonated the explosives, the official said.

Two civilians were killed and four were wounded when a car bomb targeting a U.S.-Iraqi patrol in western Baghdad exploded, Iraqi emergency police said. Thirty minutes later, two more civilians were killed and eight others wounded in a car bomb attack on an Iraqi police patrol in central Baghdad.

In Baghdad's southern Dora district, at least two civilians were killed and 23 others were wounded -- including women and children -- when four mortar rounds slammed into a residential area, an Iraqi Interior Ministry official said.

The U.S. military said coalition forces broke a terrorist funding operation and arrested 12 suspected terrorists during Saturday morning raids around Iraq, targeting al Qaeda in Iraq members and affiliates.

CNN's Arwa Damon, Jomana Karadsheh, Nic Robertson, Mohammed Tawfeeq and Michael Ware contributed to this report.

Iraq Rebel Cleric Reins In Militia; Motives At Issue (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 24 — Moktada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric and founder of the Mahdi Army militia, discovered recently that two of his commanders had created DVDs of their men killing Sunnis in Baghdad. Documents suggested that they had received money from Iran.

So he suspended them and stripped them of power, said two Mahdi leaders in Sadr City, the heart of Mr. Sadr's support here in the capital.

But did he do so as part of his cooperation with the new security plan for Baghdad, which aims to quell the sectarian violence tormenting the city? Because his men had been disloyal, taking orders from Iran, whose support he values but whose control he fights? Or was it just for show — the act of an image-conscious leader who grasped the risk of graphic videos and wanted to stave off direct American action against him?

DOJ_NMG_0136648

Mr. Sadr has been the great destabilizer in Iraq since 2003, wielding power on the streets and in the ruling Shiite bloc, thwarting the Americans and playing out at least a temporary alliance with Iran.

With the new security plan for Iraq under way, every question about Mr. Sadr's motives touches on a different facet of Iraq's complicated struggle.

He now finds himself under pressure from several sources. One is his popular Shiite base, which demands protection from devastating Sunni attacks. Another is Iran, with which he has had long but difficult ties. Then there are renegade factions of his own militia that resent his move into the political mainstream.

Finally, the Americans, who have accused Iran of supplying Shiite militias, including Mr. Sadr's, with an especially deadly roadside bomb known as an explosively formed projectile, or E.F.P, which has killed an increasing number of American soldiers.

It is not clear whether the Americans will move directly against him. The United States has demanded that the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki act forcefully against the Mahdi Army; Mr. Maliki, however, owes much of his political strength in the ruling Shiite coalition to Mr. Sadr's backing.

For now, American and Iraqi officials say Mr. Sadr seems to be cooperating with the effort to pacify Baghdad, ordering his men not to fight even as American armored vehicles roll into Mahdi strongholds in eastern Baghdad. He seems to be cleaning house of fighters who could taint him by association with Iran or with death squad killings. His aides say he has called for a sectarian truce. "Moktada al-Sadr said to protect your clerics, protect your shrines and cooperate with the government," said Hazim al-Araji, head of the Sadr office in western Baghdad. "So no actions have been taken."

In perhaps his boldest move yet, Mr. Sadr has assisted the joint Iraqi-American campaign against parts of his militia, signaling whom to arrest and telling others to flee, said two Mahdi commanders and a Shiite politician in Baghdad. On his own, they said, Mr. Sadr has "frozen" more than 40 commanders, including about 20 with links to Iran.

The moves are part of an organizational overhaul, the Sadr aides said. Though Mr. Sadr's whereabouts are unknown — the Americans say he is in Iran, which his aides and Iran dispute — a new Mahdi general for all of Baghdad has been appointed for the first time, they said. Mr. Sadr has also selected new commanders for east and west Baghdad.

Some of the Sadr aides and commanders who described Mr. Sadr's recent moves during separate interviews in Najaf and Baghdad refused to give their names, saying they had not been authorized to speak and feared reprisals from current or former members of the militia.

They said the cleric allowed the arrests of members of his own militia, or suspended them himself, because evidence showed that they had not obeyed his orders and because he wanted to show Iran, American officials and his militia that he was a strong leader who must be respected and feared.

"He wants to prove to the people that he has full control of his militia," said a 47-year-old Mahdi commander from Sadr City who referred to himself as Jabar Abdul al-Hahdi. "He wants to show he's in charge."

Mr. Sadr's conflicted relationship with Iran mirrors Iraq's. Each country's majority Shiites revere the other's clerics and visit the other's religious shrines. But they speak different languages, are dominated by different ethnic groups, and fought each other in a long war in the 1980s.

Mr. Sadr's father, Grand Ayatollah Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr, became one of Iraq's most popular Shiite clerics largely because he set himself up as the rebel alternative to Iran's religious leadership, focusing on poor, oppressed Iraqis, not just theological debate. His mix of social and religious resistance led Saddam Hussein to order his assassination in 1999.

Moktada al-Sadr rose to prominence after the American invasion in 2003 with anti-American speeches and echoes of his father's populism. But he was young, not yet 30, and less educated than his clerical rivals. So even as he railed against Iranian meddling, he sought money and support from Iran's top clerics, meeting with Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme religious leader, in June 2003. It was a dramatic reversal from family tradition.

Less than a year later, he led a revolt against American troops in Najaf, and again Iran played the role of patron. On the 11th day of the revolt, with Mr. Sadr under siege, an Iranian delegation arrived in Iraq to mediate. The Iranians were joined by Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, who called for Shiite unity and calm.

Mr. Sadr eventually agreed to stop fighting and join the political process. The Americans let him.

His popularity rose with the speed of a pop star's, and the Mahdi Army grew like a fan club, from a few hundred young men to thousands — including some who proved hard to control.

Since then, according to some Shiite officials, Iran has funneled support to his organization. What it receives, how much and how consistently, remain a mystery, but some Shiite leaders say Mr. Sadr collects less from Iran than does a rival Shiite party: the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which was founded in Iran by Iraqi exiles in 1984.

Iran generally supports many groups simultaneously, including some Sunni ones, so that it can benefit from any eventuality, said Sami al-Askari, a Shiite member of Parliament who works closely with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

"Iran intervenes in many ways, with many methods," Mr. Askari said.

DOJ_NMG_0136649

In the case of the Mahdi Army, he said, Iran has recognized its diffuse nature, sprinkling support at high and low levels. Some support comes through ties to Hezbollah, the Shiite militia in Lebanon that also receives Iranian support. Beirut now has a Sadr office, and Mahdi commanders say they have been sending fighters to Hezbollah at least since last summer, when Hezbollah battled Israel.

Iran also provides institutional assistance to Iraq, mainly to the Health Ministry, which is run by Mr. Sadr's political bloc. Three days after bombs killed more than 140 people in Sadr City last fall, for example, 50 Iraqi ambulances carried some of the wounded to the Iranian border. They were transferred to Iranian ambulances and taken to Iranian hospitals, with much of the cost covered by organizations in Iran.

Qasim Allawi, a spokesman for the Health Ministry who described the process, said another 25 wounded men and women from the recent Sadriya market bombing in Baghdad were to head to Iran any day.

Iran's more potent forms of aid are direct — and some goes not to Mr. Sadr, but to underlings.

"Sometimes the aid comes for the leadership, and they get to decide where it goes," Mr. Askari said. "Sometimes it goes to the local leadership, and this encourages them to rebel."

"Iran puts Moktada al-Sadr between two pressing sides," he said. "On one hand, they are helping him and they have the ability to take that away. At the same time, they're undermining him by helping people below him."

According to Sadr aides and Mahdi commanders, Mr. Sadr's recent purges aim to put Iran on notice that he is in charge and independent. They said he also wanted to remind members of his militia that he would use every available tool, including Iraqi and American troops, to maintain control of the militia, the source of any political power he wields.

The goal is a top-down, tightly managed operation.

"We're going to end the decentralized system that we had before," said one of the aides in Najaf.

If Mr. Sadr consolidates power over his unruly militia, he could be held more responsible for the actions of its members. Until now, American and Iraqi efforts against the Mahdi Army have focused on so-called rogue elements.

The 30 members of Parliament associated with the Sadr bloc have not been arrested, keeping Mr. Sadr's legitimate influence intact. At the same time, American, Iraqi and British officials are engaged in classified negotiations with his envoys over how to address the Mahdi Army and its Sadr City stronghold, the neighborhood named for Mr. Sadr's father.

When asked about the talks, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the top military spokesman in Iraq, said the meetings represented a reasonable and appropriate attempt to avoid unnecessary bloodshed.

"Anytime you can find a political solution instead of a military solution," he said, "it's always better."

But can Mr. Sadr deliver what the Americans want? Are his efforts adequate? Some American military officers remain skeptical.

"You know what their intent is," said Maj. Kevin Hosier, an intelligence officer with the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, as his unit prepared for sweeps through predominantly Shiite areas near Sadr City this month. "They want Baghdad. They want to make Baghdad a Shia city."

Peter Harling, a senior analyst with the International Crisis Group, a research organization, who wrote a thorough profile of Mr. Sadr last summer, said the impact of the Mahdi purges and command restructuring would likely be short-lived.

"He has been excommunicating some of his key commanders, that's a fact, but he has just put them in the corner," Mr. Harling said, relying on interviews with several Mahdi commanders cited in his July profile. "Many of them, after Sadr really accused them in the harshest terms, actually came back in the movement and carried on with their careers. All this is kind of temporary."

According to Mr. Harling, Mr. Sadr has little choice but to trim at the edges of his organization. His hold on power remains tenuous, dependent on a loose association of clients all over the country who he knows could turn on him at any moment.

"He remains in a strong position as a leader only as long as he is useful to all these smaller leaders," Mr. Harling said. "He rules by consensus."

Vali Nasr, a professor of national security affairs at the Naval Postgraduate School and author of "The Shia Revival," says Mr. Sadr should be viewed as a politician who was trying to preserve his power. Poor Shiites have made him an Iraqi celebrity, a national symbol whose bearded visage graces everything from wristwatches to alarm clocks and large posters. Above all else, he will be loyal to them, Mr. Nasr said.

"Since the Samarra bombing last year, Moktada has received a lot of pressure to be tougher on the Sunnis," he said, referring to the explosion in the northern city of Samarra last February that destroyed one of Shiite Islam's holiest shrines. "He's found that the tougher he's been, the more his popularity has gone up."

In the long run, Mr. Nasr said, "he's not very concerned with what the Americans think of him. What matters to him is what the Shiites think."

Kurds Endorse Draft Oil Law (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Measure Would Go To Iraqi Assembly

BAGHDAD, Feb. 24 -- Leaders of Iraq's oil-rich Kurdish region have apparently approved a draft oil law that will be presented to Iraqi lawmakers in coming weeks, an eagerly awaited breakthrough that is expected to professionalize and expand drilling in the country.

The agreement was announced Saturday by Massoud Barzani, president of the regional government in Kurdish-populated northern Iraq, during a news conference in the northern city of Sulaymaniyah attended by Iraq's president and the U.S. ambassador, the Associated Press reported.

"We reached a final agreement," Barzani said, according to AP. "We accept the draft."

Barzani did not disclose further details of the agreement, and no other officials discussed them publicly.

John C. Roberts, a spokesman for U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, said Saturday night he was unaware of the development or the ambassador's presence at the news conference. Spokesmen for the Kurdish regional government and Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih also said they had no information on the reported agreement.

The Kurdish minister of natural resources declined to discuss the issue.

Iraqi officials in recent weeks have been struggling to reach an agreement on legislation that would govern the exploitation of the country's vast oil reserves and who should control the revenue.

Among the contentious issues are to what extent oil exploration will be controlled by the Shiite-led government in Baghdad; how proceeds will be distributed among oil-rich and oil-poor areas; and to what extent foreign companies will be allowed to drill for oil.

Iraq's largest reserves are concentrated in the Kurdish north and in the predominantly Shiite south, which has led to squabbling among Iraqi leaders concerned that their constituencies might not benefit sufficiently from oil proceeds. Sunnis live mainly in central and western areas without oil reserves. More than 90 percent of the country's budget comes from oil.

U.S. officials have been pressing Iraqi leaders to send a bill to parliament, a step they see as crucial to strengthening the country's economy and reducing violence. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Iraqi leaders last week during a brief visit to Baghdad to reach a resolution on the draft.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had promised to get the measure passed by the end of 2006, but negotiations, primarily between Kurds and Shiite leaders, have stalled several times. The Kurds want to make sure they have enough oversight over the oil industry in their region and have expressed concern about the impact the legislation might have on contracts they have signed with foreign companies that recently began working in the relatively safe region.

It is unclear how quickly lawmakers, in a parliament beset with sectarian strife and general bickering, will turn the bill into law.

Hometown Fights For Soldier Charged In Iraq Slayings (LAT)

By David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

SWEETWATER, TENN. — The first fundraiser was down at the First Assembly of God church, where Bonnie Cleveland stood in the doorway with a collection basket in hand. She told everyone that the church music group's former teen drummer, Ray Girouard — now Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard — was in deep trouble.

The Army has charged Girouard, 24, with ordering the slayings of three Iraqi detainees in May, then orchestrating a coverup. He's in a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., awaiting court-martial.

"He's been fighting for our freedom, and now he needs our help," Cleveland, a schoolteacher and the wife of a dairy farmer, told fellow parishioners.

By the end of the service late last month, parishioners had contributed $6,600 to help hire a civilian lawyer for a church member who became an Army Ranger and served two tours in Iraq.

It was the beginning of an extraordinary outpouring of cash and tributes from this idyllic east Tennessee community of 6,000. The fund now stands at $19,000, fattened by residents who cannot reconcile the Army's portrait of a calculating killer with their memories of a polite and caring boy.

Sense of betrayal

DOJ_NMG_0136651

Sweetwater, a conservative community where American flags fly on porches and many residents are veterans, now finds itself at odds with the military. Many here say the Army has betrayed a young patriot who volunteered to fight for his country.

"The military kind of made it personal," said Tammy "Tot" Chapman, who's helping organize an antique car rally as a fundraiser. "When you mess with our boys, you have to deal with us."

Post 106 of the American Legion in Sweetwater is coordinating the contributions. Lloyd Langley, the post vice commander, says Girouard is being "railroaded" by the military.

"A soldier ain't worth a dime if he don't carry out his orders, and that's exactly what Ray was doing over there," Langley said.

Girouard, who enlisted right out of high school, is charged with premeditated murder and conspiracy. Three other soldiers also were charged in the deaths, which occurred during a combat mission May 9 on a marshy island on Tharthar Lake, 60 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Girouard's photo now graces bumper stickers, storefronts and restaurants in Sweetwater. A gazebo on the narrow main street bears a banner that reads, "Staff Sgt. Ray Girouard Fought For Us. Let's Fight For Him."

Just after the church fundraiser, Girouard's sister Joy Oakes delivered a passionate defense of her little brother at a rally Jan. 27 at City Hall, where residents contributed $1,700.

"The Army is doing everything they can to smear his name, his reputation and his legacy," she said that day. But the "truth will come out, and it will set Ray free," she added.

Oakes, 26, a mother of three, has set up what she calls the Ray Room in a bedroom of her grandfather's home. Inside is a computer where she maintains a website supporting her brother, stacks of court documents and a "media book" with news clippings about the case.

"This case is my whole life — I live it, I breathe it, 24 hours a day," she said.

Girouard and his two sisters were raised by their maternal grandfather, Ron Bentley, an Air Force veteran, after their mother died when Girouard was 6. Bentley calls his Ranger grandson "a true American hero." A sign on his front door reads: "Terrorism Is A Disease. Rangers Are The Cure."

Bentley says he is furious at the military for prosecuting Girouard for "doing what he was sent over there to do."

"What really got me going was seeing a picture of Raymond in shackles — after all he's done for his country," Bentley, 64, said as he sat hunched over his living room table, feeling faint from chemotherapy for lymphoma.

As Bentley spoke, Oakes answered a cellphone call. It was Girouard, calling from the brig on a $1-a-minute phone card. Oakes said he told her, as he had before, that he never ordered anyone to kill detainees and did not take part in a coverup.

She said Girouard also told her that his brigade commander, Col. Michael Steele, held "a big hoo-ah rally" the night before the mission and gave orders to kill every military-age male on the island. Steele's lawyer, Maj. Kris Poppe, said Steele "categorically rejects" the allegation.

A codefendant, Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, gave a similar account in a phone interview in October. But Jan. 25, Clagett entered a plea agreement with the government and testified that Girouard, the squad leader, told his men to kill the three Iraqis they had just detained.

Clagett said he and Spc. William B. Hunsaker cut plastic handcuffs off the men, told them to run, then shot them. He testified that Girouard punched him in the face and cut Hunsaker with a knife to make it appear that the detainees had attacked the soldiers while attempting to escape.

Hunsaker, the first to accept a plea deal, also testified against Girouard. Hunsaker and Clagett got 18 years. Girouard could get life without parole if convicted.

Clagett's plea was a stunning blow to Girouard's family, and to Sweetwater. The Clagett and Girouard families had teamed up to fight the charges. Clagett's mother, Melanie Dianiska, stayed at Bentley's home last year on her way to a court hearing at Ft. Campbell, Ky.

"I understand the pressure they were under from the government, but it's still hurtful the way they turned on Ray," Oakes said.

Dianiska and lawyer Paul Bergrin said they felt boxed in after Hunsaker's plea and reluctantly agreed to their own deal.

"I'll tell you one thing," Oakes said. "This family will not buckle. We will not take a plea deal. Ray will not plead guilty to something he didn't do."

Girouard's lawyer, Anita Gorecki of Fayetteville, N.C., said she intended to proceed to court-martial, scheduled for March 13, and would call Steele as a witness.

"He is eager to have his day in court," Gorecki said. "Our defense is simple: Sgt. Girouard did not give that order."

DOJ_NMG_0136652

John Canada, who taught Girouard in a Royal Rangers church program similar to the Boy Scouts, said many people in Sweetwater felt uncomfortable challenging the military. Even so, he said, "it bothers me that an American soldier could kill our enemy and have that construed as first-degree murder."

Still confident

Girouard's grandmother Pat Bentley said her grandson remained confident that he would be exonerated. "He's got it in him to fight," she said. "If he goes down, he's going to go down fighting."

Charlie Boyd, who heads the antique car club that is organizing a fundraiser, said U.S. soldiers faced the same problem he had faced when he fought in Vietnam: It is difficult to distinguish the enemy from civilians in a guerrilla war.

"Ray shouldn't get a court-martial," Boyd said. "He should get a medal."

By prosecuting soldiers for their actions during combat operations, the military is sending the wrong message, said Daniel Chapman, the car club's vice president.

"If our soldiers see someone like Ray going to prison, they'll be scared to death that they'll be prosecuted every time they open fire," he said. "They'll hesitate — and that'll get you killed."

Administrative Issues Cited At Walter Reed (WP)

By Steve Vogel, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Report From Long-Running Army Probe Notes Problems; Official Orders Fixes

The preliminary findings of a nine-month Army investigation confirm problems in the administrative procedures at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and other hospitals, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey has ordered the service to begin fixing them, a spokesman said yesterday.

The Army inspector general's probe said that the service needs to standardize its training of workers who assist patients, that its information-management databases are inadequate and that there are "policy disconnects" between Army regulations and Defense Department instructions.

After hearing recommendations from the inspector general's office on improvements, Harvey directed Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, to start implementing those steps that can be taken immediately, Army spokesman John P. Boyce Jr. said yesterday. The office's final report is not expected for several weeks.

"Look, this is very complex," Harvey said in a statement. "But this is too important and cannot wait for a report to be finished or a review to be completed. We'll fix as we go; we'll fix as we find things wrong."

The investigation, which began in April, was prompted by a Government Accountability Office study of the Army's system for evaluating the fitness of wounded soldiers to stay in the service.

Harvey's action followed the publication last week of a two-part series in The Washington Post on the challenges facing soldiers being treated as outpatients at Walter Reed. The articles depicted a system in which outpatients at the Army's premier medical facility often languish in a numbing bureaucracy, some forgotten, many overwhelmed.

The series touched a nerve with the public, politicians and the military. The resulting cascade of outrage underscored that, while the war in Iraq is an enormously divisive issue, it remains a tenet of faith among the public that wounded troops deserve the best of care.

President Bush demanded swift action to fix the problems, and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates declared the situation at Walter Reed "unacceptable" and promised that officials responsible would "indeed be held accountable."

The Army, meanwhile, has begun repairing facilities that house Walter Reed's outpatients.

Gates named an eight-member independent review group on Friday to review all rehabilitative care and administrative procedures at Walter Reed and at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda. Co-chaired by former Army secretaries Togo West and John O. Marsh Jr., the group will submit a report to the Pentagon within 45 days.

One member of the panel, John J.H. "Joe" Schwarz, a physician and former Republican congressman from Michigan, said yesterday that it had not yet met and that he was "awaiting marching orders" on how the review will proceed.

Battle Worn (WP)

By Paula Span

The Washington Post Magazine, February 25, 2007

After he was injured in Iraq, Richard Twohig found himself fighting an unexpected foe: the U.S. Army.

THE SHADES IN RICHARD TWOHIG'S GARDEN APARTMENT ARE DRAWN TIGHT AGAINST THE SUMMER SUN. This is partly because it's 94 degrees in Knoxville, Tenn., this afternoon, but also because light can trigger one of his bad headaches, the kind that make his knees buckle. His kids have grown accustomed to dimmed surroundings.

DOJ_NMG_0136653

They've been cavorting on the living room carpet, Lizzie with her fuzzy pink dog named Princess, her little brother, Damon, with his prized jeep. Their chirpy ebullience isn't unusual for a 6-year-old and a 3-year-old who haven't had much chance to romp outside today but noise can bring on Twohig's migraines, as well. "Why don't you go up and play a while?" he suggests mildly, and they troop upstairs to their shared bedroom.

The apartment, which the family moved into three weeks ago after a nomadic year, still feels a bit empty. There's a couch and a coffee table and a big TV in the living room, but the walls are bare. Twohig wishes he had a yard for the children and their real dog, a boisterous Great Pyrenees named Athena. Still, the place is clean and comfortable, and he can manage the $570 rent on the disability checks that the Department of Veterans Affairs sends each month.

"If I have a good day, I try to take them up to the park at the school," he says, knowing that the kids should probably be outdoors more. It's only a two-minute drive. But he doesn't have so many good days.

Since he was thrown from a moving armored vehicle in Baghdad in May 2003, and landed on his head, the former Army corporal says he has suffered from near-constant headaches. This afternoon's is the easier kind to take: He figures the throbbing registers a 6 or 7 on the 10-point scale that injured vets learn to use to quantify their pain. The more severe headaches come perhaps once a week now, he says, and even the heavy-duty drugs he takes can't really blunt them: "Before, I would pass out in the shower, things like that. You kind of learn when they're coming on. So when I feel lightheaded and my legs get weak, I crouch down" so he doesn't fall. Those are the sort he rates a 10.

The headaches are one of the disabling conditions Twohig incurred in the line of duty, the Army acknowledges, along with a "mood disorder with depressive features." He appears fit, in his patched jeans and T-shirt: 6-foot-2 and, now that the bloat from earlier drug regimens has dissipated, 180 pounds. Tattooed snakes and samurai, souvenirs of Fort Bragg, twine up his arms. With his blue eyes, cleft chin and crew cut, Twohig looks like the same paratrooper -- Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 325th Airborne Infantry Regiment, 82nd Airborne Division -- who easily handled 25-mile marches wearing a 35-pound pack and carrying an M4 rifle.

But he isn't. He often forgets what his mother, retired Marine Corps Maj. Belinda Twohig, tells him on the phone moments after she has said it. He's lethargic; he can't concentrate. If he has to enter a mall, he calculates which entrance will let him come and go with the least amount of human contact. A guy who used to happily devour an entire sausage pizza and some cheese sticks for dinner, he now has scant appetite and, troubled by nightmares, sleeps perhaps three hours a night.

He can't imagine holding a job in this condition. "What can I actually do?" he asks. "Physical work gives me migraines. I vomit all the time . . . I'm on morphine; I'm addicted. I'm just a mess."

Ask him his age, and he takes a long, thoughtful pause before replying. "Twenty-five."

Despite the migraines, the tinnitus (ringing in his ears), the chronic shoulder dislocation and other documented physical problems, he works hard at caring for the children, doing their laundry, cooking them simple meals, supervising them with great patience. (Their mother, from whom he is separated, serves with the Navy in Virginia.)

"Damon, either sit up in your chair or go upstairs and play," he cautions calmly, when the kids grow restive watching the Cartoon Network. "Do not sit on your sister." He rarely raises his voice.

In fact, Twohig's response to most things is muted. He doesn't laugh much, doesn't seem to take much pleasure in Lizzie and Damon's exuberant antics. It might be the meds or the pain or the prospect of a life in which he may never work, but there's a flatness to his personality that his family finds new and troubling.

One subject prompts a more animated response, though, rousing him to noticeable anger: the U.S. Army.

Like any member of the armed forces injured in the line of duty and no longer able to serve, Twohig has been grappling with a complicated disability system that determines whether he merits military retirement. Thousands of other soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines are dealing with the same process. With U.S. troops still in Afghanistan and the war in Iraq entering its fourth year, the annual caseload of troops injured severely enough to be considered for retirement has climbed nearly 53 percent since 2001, to about 23,000 a year. The great majority don't get it, which has made the disability system the object of confusion, apprehension and suspicion among injured veterans and their advocates.

In Twohig's case, an Army Physical Evaluation Board ruled in 2005 that he wasn't disabled enough to qualify, a decision that deprived his wife and children of health insurance through him. He and his family have been battling the finding since.

To Twohig, the fight is based not only on finances but also on principles. He enlisted; he trained; he followed every order "to a T," he says. He paid the price, and now it feels as though the Army is abandoning him.

"I have a son, and I wouldn't let him join the Army," Twohig announces, agitated. "They don't really care about soldiers. They got their mission, and if you're hurt, oh, well."

His voice tightens: "After we're no good to them, they just get rid of us."

RICHARD TWOHIG REMEMBERS LITTLE ABOUT HIS TIME IN IRAQ. His commanding officer, Capt. (now Maj.) Jeffrey Burgoyne, says that Bravo Company saw "a lot of firefights" in Fallujah and other towns as it made its way to Baghdad in late

DOJ_NMG_0136654

April 2003. But what Twohig can summon up from Iraq aren't battles but the heat and the odd quality of the sand ("it had been cooked so long that when you stepped on it, it broke into pieces") and the occasional K rations, "in big old metal things they heated up," that tasted better than meals-ready-to-eat.

Nor is much recorded about the accident that damaged Twohig -- not even the exact date it occurred. The Commander's Performance Statement, signed by Burgoyne, says Twohig was "on combat patrol" aboard a Bradley armored fighting vehicle, "going approximately 45 mph when it turned a corner in downtown Baghdad, causing Cpl. Twohig to be thrown from the vehicle. He fell on his head and lost consciousness."

Burgoyne now says that the vehicle wasn't a Bradley but a smaller, older M113 about to leave the unit's walled compound and thus going far more slowly. But Burgoyne was at a forward operating base five miles away and only heard of the accident by radio. In any event, "the guy fell off a moving truck; that's significant." And when the battalion learned that Twohig was being helicoptered to Germany, Burgoyne says, "that's when we realized it was more serious than we thought."

A neurology consultation at the Army hospital in Landstuhl, dated May 20, 2003, is the first record of Twohig's injuries, noting his head trauma, throbbing headaches and other symptoms, including memory loss. "I didn't remember my Social Security number or my unit or people I worked with," he says. He even, temporarily, forgot that his son had been born a few months earlier.

He was flown back to Fort Bragg a couple of weeks later. As he made the rounds of doctors at Womack Army Medical Center, Twohig says, his memory improved somewhat, but the headaches and psychiatric symptoms persisted. Belinda Twohig felt her hopes for a speedy recovery sink. She accompanied her son to a neurology appointment in which the doctor told them that when Richard's migraines struck, he should just take his meds and lie down in a quiet, dark room; there was no purpose in going to the emergency room, because nothing else could be done, no stronger medication prescribed. The prognosis was uncertain. After a concussion, the brain needs time to heal, the neurologist cautioned; it could take a year or two to see any improvement.

Meanwhile, Twohig's marriage was fraying under the strain. He says he was vomiting frequently, sleeping a lot and feeling depressed. He could no longer mow the lawn or help with errands; the house, despite his two young children, had to remain quiet. "It just changed the relationship," Twohig says. "She didn't understand and want to deal with my problems." His wife, Sang, did not respond to phone calls seeking comment. At times, he felt so lousy that he wouldn't even come to the phone when his mother called. "We had a close relationship; he always talked to me," Belinda says. "So the withdrawal was the first thing I noticed." When they did talk, she was aware of "confusion. I'd ask him something -- 'How was your day? Have you taken your meds?' 'Yeah, I think so' . . . Just a slow, lethargic answer. And this is not Richard."

Frightened as she was, she told herself that at least the Army would, in her words, "take care of him" and his family. After more than two decades in the service, she knew the outlines of the disability system, and she assumed he would be able to retire. For her son, though, this was uncharted territory.

The magic number, he quickly learned, is 30 percent -- the point at which a disability is considered to be severe enough to prevent someone from functioning normally in the workplace. Those with 30 percent or higher disability ratings can retire with benefits that include monthly checks for the rest of their lives, access to commissaries and post exchanges on military bases, travel on military aircraft and, most coveted, coverage by TriCare, the military's health insurance plan, for themselves and their dependents, present and future. Those rated below 30 percent usually receive a severance check from the military: two months' pay for each year's service, up to 12 years. They can then apply for benefits from Veterans Affairs, which also rates disabilities and provides monthly checks but doesn't offer the other advantages of retirement.

The practice of compensating injured soldiers dates to Colonial times, but the current system has its roots in World Wars I and II. Congress mandated the development of ratings for disabilities in 1917; the Career Compensation Act of 1949 then linked the amount of payments to the degree of disability, establishing the 30 percent threshold. "The thinking was, those rated less wouldn't be so handicapped as to warrant long-term disability pay," explains Rick Surratt, deputy legislative director of Disabled American Veterans. "A lump sum would hold them until they could get reestablished in the workplace."

Getting any rating at all can take many months, however. Once an injured service member is medically stable, he must wait for a military doctor to write a narrative summary of his condition. Then a board of physicians reviews the medical records -- often thick with test results, multiple diagnoses, lists of medications and addenda -- to decide whether he meets retention standards. If not, an informal Physical Evaluation Board assesses the severity of each disability that makes a service member unfit for duty and assigns it a numerical rating, based on detailed guidelines in the Veterans Affairs Schedule for Rating Disabilities.

"What we're attempting to do is approximate the average loss of earnings capacity," says Tom Pamperin, who oversees revisions to VA's guidelines, a nearly unceasing project. Amputation at the upper third of the thigh, for instance, merits an 80 percent disability rating. Amputation at the middle or lower third of the thigh: 60 percent. Mental disorder characterized by

"occupational and social impairment, with deficiencies in most areas, such as work, school, family relations, judgment, thinking or mood . . .": 70 percent. Migraines "with characteristic prostrating attacks occurring on an average once a month over the last several months": 30 percent.

Twohig picked up the gist of the process at the Fort Bragg gym, where he worked with other soldiers too disabled for regular duty. He checked ID cards and handed out towels four hours a day -- and says he found even that difficult, because the clanging of free weights and the thunking of basketballs brought on migraines. Meanwhile, he and his buddies pondered the mysteries of disability retirement. There was ample time to compare notes; the pace at which cases proceed can be exasperatingly slow, in violation of the Pentagon's own guidelines.

Twohig waited 17 months to receive the medical evaluation board report that found him no longer fit to serve. Meanwhile, he watched as others received ratings too low to qualify for retirement. One guy with what Twohig describes as "titanium vertebrae" got a 10 percent rating. Another received no severance.

In fact, the majority of injured soldiers fall short of the magic number; the informal evaluation board rates them below 30 percent. The Defense Department reports that the Army, which handles more than half of the military's disability cases, put less than 4 percent of the 10,460 active duty soldiers and reservists it evaluated last year on the permanent disability retirement list and less than 15 percent on the temporary list. (Temporary retirees undergo periodic reassessments of their condition for as much as five years before a final decision.) By comparison, the Navy (including the Marine Corps) retired about 35 percent of its injured, temporarily or permanently, and the Air Force about 24 percent, the Defense Department says.

The difference, the Army's disability agency says, may reflect a higher proportion of musculoskeletal injuries that can interfere with soldiers' duties but have "mild" impact on civilian employability, resulting in severance pay rather than retirement. The Army also has "a unique policy" of not granting retirement for pain that has "no clear cause or objective findings." But, the agency concedes, "it is not possible to state with certainty what might account for the difference" between the Army's and the other branches' retirement rates.

At Fort Bragg, soldiers sometimes find it hard to understand why some people qualified for disability retirement and others didn't. "You don't really know too much about it until you start doing it," says Twohig's friend Jacob Biehn, a former specialist who suffered multiple gunshot wounds in Iraq and eventually received a 30 percent disability rating -- which allowed him to retire but struck his comrades as minimal, given his injuries. "When you go to find out what they decided," he says, "it could be a good day or a bad day."

For Twohig, it was a bad day. He called his mother from Fort Bragg on Nov. 2, 2004, sounding "shaken up," she recalls. "He said: 'Mom, it came back 20 percent . . . How am I going to survive? How can I take care of my family?' I said, 'Son, calm down. We're going to fight this.'"

TWOHIG HAD THE RIGHT TO CONTEST HIS DISABILITY RATING BEFORE A FORMAL PHYSICAL EVALUATION BOARD, and his mother stood ready to help him. A lifelong Marine and a congenital optimist, Belinda felt more determined than discouraged, convinced that the system had erred and would correct itself.

Each branch of the military provides opportunities for injured service members to challenge their ratings, but most of the injured simply pocket their severance checks and go home. Only 20 percent of soldiers ask for a formal hearing, at which an attorney can present evidence and call witnesses, the Army says. Then only half of those soldiers proceed with the hearing.

Perhaps that indicates most injured soldiers are satisfied with their ratings. But veterans groups say that more wounded service members would challenge their ratings if it weren't so complicated and time-consuming.

"It's probably one of the most convoluted workman's compensation systems in the world," says Steve Robinson, government affairs director at Veterans for America.

Most of those hurt in the line of duty are young, weary of fighting and anxious to return to their civilian lives, Robinson and others point out. A severance check for $10,000 or $12,000 (the latter was Twohig's severance after 49 months of service) can seem to be a lot of money. If a case has already dragged on for months, seeking a formal hearing -- even if that's in a service member's best interest -- can require still more time and frustration.

All of which tends to discourage the injured from taking on the system -- and some veterans advocates suspect that the Pentagon, openly worried about ballooning health-care costs, prefers it that way. Medical benefits are not discretionary; the Defense Department must pay the tab. "Increasingly, it's having a direct impact on the department's ability to meet its needs for equipment, replacement equipment, personnel," says William Winkenwerder, assistant secretary of defense for health affairs. "The costs of retirees, the health-care costs, are a great concern to us."

Nevertheless, the Defense Department says that each disability case "is evaluated on the basis of relevant clinical information," and the Army vehemently denies that its evaluation boards award lower ratings because of pressure, direct or indirect, to hold down costs.

DOJ_NMG_0136656

"No one has discussed that financial burden with me at all," says Col. Carlton Buchanan, the new deputy commander of the Army's Physical Disability Agency, which oversees its evaluation system. "Nobody has said I have a particular requirement or a goal or a quota or a threshold that I can't surpass . . . I feel no pressure whatsoever to set limits on disability. We will do what's right."

Still, civilian attorneys who argue military disability cases see a pattern in the ratings.

"The informal board will tend to lowball," says Vaughan Taylor, who practices in Jacksonville, N.C., and has argued dozens of disability cases. Like many of the small fraternity of civilian lawyers who specialize in military cases, he is a former military lawyer, or judge advocate, himself. "It's almost as if the informal board exists to give out the standard 10 percent, and then see who squawks."

"The unwritten guidance seems to be: Push these people over to the VA, and let them pay for this," agrees Joseph W. Kastl, a former Air Force lawyer who now calls his Bethesda firm the Military Defender.

Sometimes, service members find the system works well for them. One of Taylor's clients, former Marine Sgt. Eric LeClair of Swansboro, N.C., was unhurt during the first wave of the Iraq invasion, only to take a bad landing during a martial arts test aboard the USS Iwo Jima in September 2003. His list of injuries was pages long: a traumatic brain injury, nerve palsy, bone spurs and degenerated discs. "I can't lift a half-gallon of milk above my waist, and it's been like that for two years," LeClair said this past summer.

The night before he was scheduled to learn his disability rating, he and his wife were too jittery to sleep. They had seen other seriously injured Marines "going through it and getting the shaft," in LeClair's opinion. Despite the pages of additional material and independent physicians' findings that his lawyer had amassed, LeClair expected the same result. But the next morning, to his surprise and his wife's enormous relief, he was placed on the temporary retirement list with a 60 percent rating -- no formal hearing needed.

Former Master Sgt. John Alden Millan of Newland, N.C., had to go a step further. An MP with the Army National Guard, he injured his neck jumping from a truck the day his unit arrived in Iraq. Despite surgery, he says, he still suffers from back pain and severe headaches. When he received a disability rating of 20 percent, he and his attorney, Jack Gately, asked for a formal evaluation board hearing. After Gately presented testimony and Millan answered questions, the board told Millan that his injuries warranted a 40 percent rating. "I said, 'I concur, sir,' signed my paperwork and left," Millan says.

But formal boards reject cases, too. Former Maj. Lionel Walton, who lives in Prince George's County, already had a 20 percent disability from past injuries but had chosen to remain in the Army Reserves ("I bleed green," he says), eventually serving 24 years. In Iraq, he says, he hurt his knee jumping from a truck and running from rockets and car bombs, and injured his back loading heavy cases. Now, at 46, "I can't walk 30 yards without having to sit down; I'm at level 8 pain every day," Walton says. He also struggles with post-traumatic stress disorder.

When his informal evaluation board found him 20 percent disabled -- the same rating he'd had before Iraq -- Walton hired Kastl. In September, the formal evaluation board at Walter Reed Army Medical Center declined to raise his rating. He was stunned: "My government, my country, should do better by me."

Refusing to back down, Walton appealed the formal board's decision to the Physical Disability Agency, and enlisted the help of Maryland Senator Barbara Mikulski's office. He's convinced that her involvement eventually helped raise his rating to 60 percent, and that infuriates him. "It's a shame," he says. "I fought to the end, but a lot of soldiers have given up because of this nonsense."

NORMALLY, THE TWOHIGS AREN'T THE SORT OF PEOPLE INCLINED TO TAKE ON THE MILITARY. Both Richard Twohig's parents were career Marines; his younger brother, Chris, has enlisted in the Marines and shipped off to Parris Island. This is a family that believes every young person should serve this country.

Belinda Twohig trusted so fully in the military's commitment to caring for its own that the idea of looking beyond an Army attorney to represent Richard didn't initially cross her mind. But when she called a friend who was a judge advocate, he warned, "Belinda, you don't fight the Army with the Army." What she needed, he said, was a civilian lawyer specializing in military cases. After a little research, he sent her a name: Mark Waple, a West Point graduate and former judge advocate who practices in Fayetteville, N.C.

Waple has argued perhaps 200 physical evaluation board cases, going back to the Vietnam War era. For most of that time, he says, the evaluation boards "tried very hard to be as fair as possible." Now he describes the system as "broken."

Wounded service members are supposed to be guided through the confusing thicket of disability regulations by physical evaluation board liaison officers, universally known as PEBLOs, whose job is to explain the process, advise service members of their rights and assemble their files. But service members complain that documents get lost, that files are incomplete; some report that the liaisons discourage appeals and the use of outside attorneys.

DOJ_NMG_0136657

"Sometimes I feel half of what I do is explain what a PEBLO should have already explained," says Danny Soto, a national service officer for Disabled American Veterans, the only vets organization permitted an office at Walter Reed.

Liaison officers handle many cases; in the Army, for example, they counsel an average of 15 to 30 people a day, not including phone calls. Twohig only remembers meeting his liaison officer once: the day she told him he wouldn't be retired.

The Army has tried to keep up with the sharp rise in disability cases, expanding the Physical Disability Agency staff by 50 percent since 2003, and adding 40 percent more liaison officers and assistants. The Army's caseload, however, has soared by more than 80 percent since 2001.

At Walter Reed, where two part-time Army lawyers handled disability cases in 2003, three lawyers and a paralegal now work full time presenting cases to the formal evaluation board. These lawyers get high marks from their civilian counterparts and from vets groups for knowledge and competence, but low grades on having enough time to put together strong cases, which can involve preparing witnesses and gathering further medical documentation. Each lawyer at Walter Reed handles an average of 256 cases each year, and often doesn't meet a client until the day before the evaluation board hearing, when the attorney spends an hour or so preparing the soldier to testify.

"I don't know how you can prepare adequately for a hearing, a full and fair hearing, if you pick up the case file the day before, two days before," says civilian lawyer David Sheldon, who has a military practice in the District.

The Army disagrees. "Lengthy e-mail messages and in-depth phone calls from the paralegal and the attorney ensure that adequate contact is made in sufficient time before the hearing," says Lt. Col. Samuel Smith, Walter Reed's supervising staff judge advocate, via e-mail because the Army barred in-person interviews with any legal staff or with evaluation board members.

Few of the injured hire their own attorneys to contest findings, even though they have that right. A key barrier is money: A civilian lawyer specializing in military cases will likely charge $5,000 or more to prepare for a formal hearing, with no guarantee of success.

Waple was blunt about that when the Twohigs went to see him in early 2005. He thought Richard was clearly entitled to retirement. But migraines are hard to get rated for, because sufferers can rarely document how frequently they occur, something the physical evaluation board wants to know. Richard would have been better served, Waple said, if his neurologist had told him to go to the emergency room whenever he had an incapacitating headache, or even advised that he keep a diary. Waple, however, could call a witness -- Belinda -- who could explain why there was no record of how often Richard's headaches struck.

Richard's psychological symptoms presented a different problem. Waple knew the board might not give much credence to his mood disorder.

The way the military rates psychiatric injuries -- or doesn't -- is a sore subject among veterans groups and civilian lawyers who handle disability cases. The incidence of mental health problems among those returning from Iraq appears high. An Army research team, reviewing the records of more than 300,000 soldiers and Marines, reported last year that more than one-third of Iraq veterans had visited mental health clinics at least once in their first year at home; they were considerably more likely to show signs of psychological distress than those who had served in other overseas locations such as Afghanistan or Bosnia. Yet critics charge that evaluators are particularly skeptical about diagnoses of post-traumatic stress disorder and other psychological injuries.

"If they've been shot five times and need multiple surgeries, and it's very obvious to the doctors what's wrong, then it's a lot easier," says Charlotte Cluverius, a Washington attorney who represents service members at disability hearings. "The burden on the service member is much, much higher with psychological issues, even though those can be just as devastating and incapacitating."

Danny Soto agrees. At Walter Reed, where he counsels dozens of soldiers each week, he thinks that just 40 to 50 percent are being rated correctly for their injuries. When it comes to clear-cut physical problems, something as visible and inarguable as amputation, "they get that right," Soto says. "If you're talking traumatic brain injuries, psychiatric injuries, it drags on."

The Army rejects the notion that large numbers of injured soldiers aren't being rated correctly. Its Physical Disability Agency reviews 25 to 30 percent of informal and formal evaluation board decisions, and is satisfied with its work.

David Armitage, the agency's senior medical adviser, acknowledges that correctly evaluating post-traumatic stress syndrome and other mental disorders -- or any self-reported disability -- can be difficult. "It's a fact-finding matter," he says. "We look for supportive evidence." Otherwise, a condition such as migraine headaches "is too easily conjured up or exaggerated." But he adds, "that's true throughout the entire disability world, not just in the military . . . I think we're doing better every day."

Waple wasn't so sanguine. He told the Twohigs that he wasn't having much success with the Army and that the odds weren't high that the formal evaluation board would raise Richard's rating to 30 percent. Besides, Waple's services, including the fee for the independent forensic psychologist's evaluation he recommended, would cost about $6,000. Belinda, who had just paid lawyers' fees to divorce Richard's father, blanched. But they agreed to proceed, with each parent paying half the cost.

Richard's case would be heard at Walter Reed, where the evaluation board scheduled the hearing for a day when Waple had a court appearance elsewhere and then refused to grant a five-day delay. That meant Waple would prepare Twohig's case but that an Army lawyer would have to present it.

Still, the Twohigs felt hopeful. Once the board heard the full story, Belinda was sure, "they are going to realize that there was wrong done. They're going to see and say, 'Okay, Richard should be 30 percent.'"

BELINDA ACCOMPANIED RICHARD TO WASHINGTON FOR HIS HEARING IN MARCH 2005. For one thing, he was in no condition to drive, she says, "from the stress and all the meds he was on." In addition to the pain drug Dilaudid, he was taking medications for his migraines, for nausea and sleeplessness, and for depression. Belinda would also be a witness, able to testify about the changes in her son and about what his neurologist had advised.

It was a stressful time. Belinda, who had been teaching ROTC at Florida A&M University, was newly divorced and about to retire from the Marines after 28 years, forgoing an expected promotion to lieutenant colonel. She planned to sell her house in Tallahassee and look for a job in Tennessee, where she would be near Richard and her grandchildren.

"My children have sacrificed a lot for my career," Belinda says. "There were deployments; there were a lot of long hours." She can still tick off her absences: the 10 weeks her two boys stayed with her sister while she was at Officer Candidates School, the six months' further training at Quantico when she got home every other weekend, a stint at Guantanamo . . . "I wasn't always there for them, I feel."

Now, she intended to be. So while Richard lay in the back seat of her '94 Mustang, she drove north, stopping at a highway rest area when a headache nauseated him and he needed to vomit.

This wasn't the son she had raised. Growing up mostly in Jacksonville, N.C., he was the kind of kid who was happiest outdoors, a deer and duck hunter, a year-round surfer at nearby beaches, a halfback on a traveling soccer team. "Richard always had friends; Richard used to joke a lot," she remembers. She wasn't pleased, when she and her husband went off one weekend, to learn that Richard had invited his soccer buddies over for a beer bash that drew the police. But the incident does remind her that back then, "he liked to be around people. He was always dragging someone home."

He went off to North Carolina A&T to study business management, and, toward the end of freshman year, met a young woman in a club. He and Sang, the daughter of Cambodian immigrants, went out for a while, had Lizzie when they were both 19, then married. Twohig left school and took jobs flushing radiators at Jiffy Lube and loading United Parcel Service trucks, but he had trouble earning enough for a family, and none of his employers supplied benefits. The military would. It might be "the best option to get my degree and help the family," he thought. "My mom did it that way, went in the Marine Corps, got her education. So did my dad." And the Army was offering $20,000 signing bonuses. He walked into the recruiting station in Jacksonville and enlisted in early 2001. When he graduated from boot camp, his mother swore him in, an officer's prerogative and an act she now sometimes regrets.

Twohig was sure after September 11 that he'd be sent to Afghanistan. But his unit remained at Fort Bragg until Iraq, a war whose political dimensions he gave little thought to. "I looked on it more as a job," he explains. "You're supposed to do it. Your feelings don't really matter."

He had been a good soldier, his mother thought, and he was a good man. She had faith, and not solely in the military.

In the months since his accident, Belinda, a churchgoing Catholic, prayed the rosary as she walked around the track at Florida A&M each morning. She was praying again as they rounded the Beltway and headed for a hotel in Silver Spring.

THAT AFTERNOON, THE TWOHIGS MET WITH ASSIGNED MILITARY COUNSEL DAVID WHITE, who, using Mark Waple's brief and materials, would represent Richard at the hearing next day. White explained the procedure and, as Belinda remembers it, said Richard stood a decent chance of having his 20 percent rating raised.

Richard hardly slept that night. When they reported to Building 7 at Walter Reed the next morning, both in uniform, he felt ill and vomited a little in a hallway water fountain; Belinda fished some tissues from her briefcase and cleaned up the mess. To ward off an approaching migraine, he took his anti-nausea pills and Dilaudid, which tended to undermine his already-diminished ability to concentrate. "He looked like a zombie," his mother says.

The Physical Evaluation Board at Walter Reed is one of three meeting around the country for the Army; the others are at Fort Lewis in Washington state and Fort Sam Houston in Texas, sometimes supplemented by a mobile board. (The Navy and Air Force have their own physical evaluation boards.) A typical board has three members, one of whom is a physician. But that doesn't mean anyone on the board has had previous experience in evaluating disabilities; the physician hearing about brain injuries could be a dermatologist or an obstetrician. Members of the Army board take a five-day classroom course before they start adjudicating cases; the rest of their training comes on the job.

Inadequate training is among the problems that investigators have repeatedly cited in calling for improvements to the disability system. For nearly two decades, studies by both military and civilian teams -- the Army Audit Agency, the Defense Department's Inspector General, the Rand Corp. -- have criticized the system's inconsistencies, its delays, its lack of oversight and quality control. The latest report, issued by the Government Accountability Office last year, sounded many of the same themes, and the Defense Department didn't disagree. The Pentagon says a number of improvement efforts are now underway, including the long-planned computerization of all health records.

The Army, however, insists that it is already doing a good job. Armitage, who helped develop the Army's five-day training course, defends the members of the evaluation boards and their preparation. "These are people who know what soldiering is all about; they know the stresses that soldiers undergo; they know what the requirements are for soldiers to perform," he says. "They've been there."

The evaluation board that met to consider Twohig's case included a longtime infantry officer as president (he has since retired), a retired Navy psychiatrist as the medical member and a personnel management officer who had served in Iraq. They met in Room 235, a small space hung with Army insignia and posters of the human spine. Each of the three members and the soldier had a microphone on the table before him so that the hearing could be recorded on a CD.

It's supposed to be a non-adversarial proceeding. Some soldiers find it intimidating, nonetheless. For Twohig, it mostly seemed perplexing. The transcript shows that several times, as the attorney had him describe his injuries or board members chimed in with questions, he sounded muddled, not quite able to grasp what was being asked.

Physical Evaluation Board president Col. James Babbitt (after Twohig testified that he had trouble concentrating): If the 1st Sergeant tells you, "Go to 1st Platoon and find the Platoon Sergeant and tell him I want to see him at 2 o'clock," can you do that?

Twohig: Yes.

Babbitt: If he says, "Go find the 1st Platoon Sergeant, tell him I want to see him at 2 o'clock, find the 1st Squad Leader and tell him I need to see him right now, and tell the 2nd Squad Leader I'll see him tomorrow," would you have any problem delivering those messages?

Twohig: What?

Belinda Twohig also testified, speaking at length about the changes she had seen in her son since his accident, his isolation and memory problems, his physical incapacity. "There is depression, because he feels he is incapable or cannot achieve any dreams that he had before," she said. "I think that the depression is coming because he doesn't know how to get better, and, you know, I don't either . . ."

But Babbitt prevented her from testifying about what the neurologist had said about not needing to seek further medical attention when the migraines hit. "We've brought that out already," he said. "That's not necessary. That's just duplicious."

After nearly two hours, the board recessed briefly. Then Babbitt read its decision: that Richard was physically unfit to perform his duties, that he had "post-concussive syndrome associated with headaches, dizziness, bilateral tinnitus, nausea, decreased concentration and forgetfulness" that "limit his activities of daily living." That he took "a narcotic substance, mood stabilizing and antidepressant medications." That he further had "mood disorder with depressive features manifest by chronic irritable mood, insomnia, decreased appetite, social withdrawal and low self-worth."

It sounded to the Twohigs as though the board saw things their way. Then Babbitt read Richard's rating: 10 percent.

After thanking Richard for his service, the board adjourned; the recording equipment was turned off.

Belinda Twohig remembers erupting in shock. "I don't believe this!"

"Mom, what happened? What are they saying?" Richard didn't understand.

"I gave the Army a perfectly capable young man, and what you give me is somebody incapable of working, and you tell me that's only worth 10 percent?" Belinda exclaimed.

The board president said he understood her distress.

"I don't believe we are not taking care of him," she said.

"That's what the VA is for," she remembers Babbitt saying.

One board member, Lt. Col. Nick Gnemi, disagreed with the finding and announced he would submit a minority report, a rare occurrence. As the Twohigs waited in the anteroom while Gnemi wrote it, Richard was anxiously wondering how he could take care of Sang and the kids. They would have to sell the house they had bought just two years earlier. "He was just ripping inside," Belinda says.

Sounding stronger than she felt, she told him not to worry, that they would get through this. She didn't want Richard to see her in tears, and she didn't want to show emotion before the other officers, "especially that president." So she found a corner downstairs, wept briefly, dried her face.

Gnemi handed them a copy of his two-page minority report, explaining his disagreements with the rating and concluding, "This combat veteran needs to be given the benefit of the doubt and be placed on TDRL [temporary disability retirement list] to continue additional rehabilitation and medical care." He told the Twohigs he hoped it would help.

Enervated, they left Walter Reed and started the long trip home. Richard was feeling sick.

"Do you want to stop?" Belinda asked.

DOJ_NMG_0136660

"No, I just want to get the hell out of here."

So she paused just long enough for him to open the car door at a stop sign, lean out and vomit. Then she drove on.

RICHARD TWOHIG IS VERY QUIET on the 40-mile drive out to his mother's farm in Sweetwater, Tenn. It's the first time he has left the apartment in a couple of days.

Smoking Newports, he steers his SUV off the interstate, along a two-lane blacktop that climbs past fields of Queen Anne's lace and dairy cows in fenced pastures. Belinda first visited this area during a vacation in the Smokies, and bought her tract of fields, creeks and woodland six years ago. She hadn't expected to move here this soon, but now that seems the best solution for everyone.

Her plan is to raise, breed and sell alpacas. She already owns eight, currently boarded in Georgia while she prepares paddocks and barns. Richard, always an animal lover, has spent time learning to care for them. Alpacas are one of the few subjects for which he can, sometimes, summon real enthusiasm -- talking about how "they're real skittish" until you've worked with them for a while, how "they love kids," how their fleece comes in lots of colors, "gray, silver, black, white."

So Belinda's great hope is that he and the kids will move into a log cabin she's building on the property, where she can help raise her grandchildren while her son helps raise her flock.

"Daddy! Daddy!" Lizzie and Damon, who have spent the night with Belinda ("Grammy") and her fiance, Robert Rhyne, come dashing over as Twohig pulls into the drive. "Did you bring our water guns?"

"I didn't think of it," he says. He has a headache, one of the milder ones, but he sits on the front porch of the cabin -- Belinda and Robert are hanging kitchen cabinets inside -- and plays several rounds of tic-tac-toe with Lizzie. "No more," he says, after a few minutes. He watches Damon run his battery-powered truck up the pile of dirt next door to the cabin.

He and the children bounced around a good deal after his hearing and separation from the Army. The Veterans Affairs office in Winston-Salem, N.C., processed his benefits application at near-record speed -- probably helped along by an article in the Fayetteville Observer about his plight. The VA often assigns higher ratings; it uses the same guidelines as the military but applies them according to its own regulations and practices. It found Twohig 100 percent disabled, including a 50 percent rating for his headaches and 70 percent for his cognitive and mood disorder, with lower ratings for several other physical problems. "It is clear," its report says, "that you are unable to acquire and/or maintain substantially gainful employment in either a physical or sedentary setting . . ."

But while the VA began paying him $2,700 a month, it also -- by regulation -- deducted the Army's severance payment from his checks until the entire $12,000 was repaid. Unable to maintain a household on so little income, Richard sold the family's brick ranch in Fayetteville, and he and the kids lived for a while with his mother in Florida, then with his father in Tennessee and with Sang in Virginia. When he and Sang separated this past summer, they agreed that Richard should take the children because he wasn't working and could be at home.

He wouldn't get higher monthly income as a retiree than he currently gets from the VA. But TriCare insurance would let him see local civilian doctors; he would not have to drive nearly two hours to the VA hospital in Johnson City, Tenn. And it would cover Lizzie and Damon. Providing them with health insurance is the reason his estranged wife enlisted, so they're okay for now, but Sang has said she isn't loving the Navy. What happens if she leaves?

An appeal filed with the Physical Disability Agency was denied in April 2005, but Waple said he was willing to take Twohig's case to the ultimate level, the Army Board for the Correction of Military Records.

Even after Waple reduced his normal fee ("These people have been through hell," he explains), the appeal would cost another $2,500. "Mom, don't waste your money," Twohig urged. But Belinda considered that a reasonable investment if it brought her grandchildren health insurance until adulthood. "If I don't do this for the kids' sake, for their medical benefits, I'll regret it for the rest of my life," she decided.

So in July, Waple filed a petition arguing that the physical evaluation board failed to award the appropriate disability percentage, based on the regulations and the evidence presented. A decision could still be months away.

Belinda remains optimistic. "If I was sitting on that board and this was not my son, and I looked at everything," she says, "I would give him that 30 percent."

Meanwhile, the farm is taking shape. Belinda teaches ROTC in a Knoxville high school, and on weekends she and Robert, a jovial former contractor, do as much of the construction work themselves as they can. The main house, a dormered colonial of clapboard and fieldstone, is going up just across the meadow from the cabin. It will have three bedrooms upstairs and one on the main floor for Belinda's mother.

The cabin, where soon everyone is eating sandwiches and sitting on lawn chairs and upended spackle buckets on the porch, is just 400 square feet. Belinda can use it for meetings with prospective buyers and seminars on alpaca-raising. But it has a kitchen and a bathroom and could easily be expanded, which is her not-very-secret plan.

She's treading carefully, trying not to pressure Richard; she knows he needs to make his own decisions. She's mindful of the time she offered to ferry Lizzie to and from school each day -- the elementary school is near the high school where she's teaching -- and her son objected, "Mom, I have to have a purpose in life." Sometimes, beset by pain and depression, he says caring for his children is all that keeps him going. So Belinda hasn't pushed for a decision.

"I'm just in transition," Twohig says. "I don't know what I'm doing." In the coming months, as he turns 26, he'll move out to a rented house near the farm -- but not onto it.

Nevertheless, when Belinda stands on the porch and looks out at her property, a quiet haven without another house in sight, she envisions building a couple of bedrooms onto the cabin for Richard and the kids and the dog. He could help with the alpacas, with feeding and watering, shearing, trimming toenails. And when he had a bad day, Belinda and her mother would be just a few hundred feet away, ready to care for the kids until he recovered.

He'd never have to contend with crowds or noise or pressure or bosses. He could raise children and alpacas, and she'd have his back. He could, perhaps, be happy.

Lives Entwined By War Enter A Long, Arduous Chapter Called Recovery (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

Petty Officer Third Class Dustin E. Kirby, a Navy corpsman whose efforts to save a wounded marine in Iraq and his own wounding by a sniper on Christmas were covered by The New York Times, has returned home to Georgia and expects a nearly full recovery, he and his family said.

He returned escorted by a police honor guard early this month, after his discharge from the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., and four operations during five weeks of care.

Petty Officer Kirby, 23, was struck by a bullet in the left side of the face while near a bunker on the roof of Outpost Omar, a Marine position in Karma, a city in Anbar Province.

His injury mixed the worst of luck with an uncanny stroke of good fortune.

The bullet, which he said was an armor-piercing 7.62 millimeter round fired from a Dragunov-style sniper rifle at a range of 400 to 600 yards, passed through his head and exited at the side of his mouth. In traveling this path, it did not strike his brain, spinal column or major veins or arteries, he said.

Immediately after the bullet's impact, Petty Officer Kirby remained conscious and could walk. He communicated by writing notes. But his condition deteriorated, he and officers in his battalion said, from blood loss and trauma to the roof of his mouth and the base of his skull.

Although officers in the unit to which he was assigned, Second Battalion, Eighth Marines, initially thought he had lost his ability to speak, since undergoing the operations he has recovered a voice that is only slightly slurred.

"I'm doing a lot better than most people would expect," he said by telephone from Hiram, Ga.

Petty Officer Kirby had been assigned as a trauma medic to the battalion's weapons company. In early November he was the subject of an article that described his work and prayers to save the life of his friend, Lance Cpl. Colin Smith, a machine gunner in the vehicle's turret who was shot through the skull by a sniper in Karma in late October.

Lance Corporal Smith, 19, survived, and is undergoing treatment and full days of intensive therapy at the Veterans Affairs Medical Center in Minneapolis. His father, Bob Smith, said by telephone that while his prognosis is unclear he has made significant progress.

The bullet, the same type that struck Petty Officer Kirby, destroyed the top regions of both frontal lobes of Lance Corporal Smith's brain. But since being medically stabilized and beginning a range of therapies, he has begun to walk with assistance and a four-pronged cane, to smile and to mimic sounds and repeat words he hears, his father said.

Mr. Smith also said his son recognized relatives and was in very good spirits, often laughing, acting playfully and twinkling his eyes.

"The essence of him is there," Mr. Smith said. "It is not always easy for him to communicate, but it is there."

Because of damage to areas of the brain that control speech, Mr. Smith said, it was not clear how fully Lance Corporal Smith would recover his ability to converse. Similarly, he has extremely limited movement on the right side of his body. It is too soon to predict how much range of motion and strength would return.

"You never know when the healing process will plateau," Mr. Smith said, but added, "Every day you can see him improve."

Petty Officer Kirby's therapy and treatment are less extensive. The bullet tore away seven teeth, the right side of his lower jaw, several patches of nerve and a section of his tongue. It also shattered part of his lower skull, near the roof of his mouth.

Surgeons have rebuilt his face with bone and skin from one of his legs, he said, and secured the damaged tissues with 14 metal plates.

DOJ_NMG_0136662

"The plates are just kind of holding everything together and allowing it to grow back to what it was," he said.

He said he expects to have three or four more operations in the next six months, and will require therapy to recover his speech in full.

His mother, Gail Kirby, said that his prognosis is good, and that his attitude is, too.

"At his first meeting with the local speech therapist, he walked in and said, 'Supercalifragilisticexpialidocious,' " she said, using the word made famous by Julie Andrews in "Mary Poppins." "Then he said, 'There. Can I go now?' "

Petty Officer Kirby said he intended to return to active duty when his doctors allow, and hoped to become an instructor at a military school, training other corpsmen in combat medical duties.

As the two men have continued to convalesce, their battalion completed its tour in Iraq and moved out of the country through Kuwait. Its last members returned to its home base, Camp Lejeune, N.C., on Feb. 21. Petty Officer Kirby said he hoped to rejoin them.

Mr. Smith, Lance Corporal Smith's father, said his son's platoon sergeant was planning to visit him in March.

In Hiram, Petty Officer Kirby's mother said that for now she was simply grateful he was home.

For months, she said, she barely slept, and constantly checked e-mail messages, news reports from Iraq and Web sites that track American casualties in Iraq.

"Now I can just walk into the room," she said, "and see him."

More Sabers To Rattle, Perhaps Fewer To Thrust (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

WITH just enough flourish to give North Korea something to think about, a squadron of radar-evading F-22 Raptors landed in Japan a week ago, the first overseas deployment of the United States Air Force's new ground-attack jet.

In a decision intended to give Iran similar pause, a second aircraft carrier arrived last week in waters within easy sail of the Persian Gulf.

These moves seemed like perfectly logical geopolitical responses to heightened dangers. But they also helped mask another reality. Because the military today does not have enough available ground troops to use for intimidation, the moves were pretty much the only options rather than choices among several.

In the past, certain Army brigades were designated to be on standby, ready to rush to global hot spots in 18 to 72 hours. But the Army and Marines are carrying out the mission in Iraq and Afghanistan with large and sustained deployments, so warplanes and warships are replacing boots on the ground elsewhere.

Senior military planners do not deny that last week's deployments reflect a deep concern in the Pentagon that the United States simply may not have enough ready and available resources to go around. Moves like these have become necessary to offset enemy notions that being tied down in Iraq and Afghanistan have made America weak and in no position to exert any kind of force outside of those conflicts.

There is ample cause for concern. In addition to a shortage of available ground troops, military planners worry, armor and other combat gear being rushed to Iraq might not be around for use in another crisis.

Just last week, the nation's highest-ranking officer, Gen. Peter Pace, secretly upgraded to "significant" the risk the military faces this year in carrying out its full national security mission. He unwaveringly stated that the armed forces would succeed at any mission ordered by the president; the response would just be slower, less elegant, more dangerous.

Taken together, the active-duty military and the reserves number more than two million, but the military is struggling to fill a roster of about 160,000 troops to carry out President Bush's strategy in Iraq. Part of the strain is simple inefficiency. As Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the departing Army chief of staff, has said, the military deployment system is like a keg of beer, with the tap put too near the top to drain the whole barrel.

In a reflection of these strains, the Army is preparing this week to go public with its detailed plans for training and equipping the five Brigade Combat Teams being rushed to Iraq under Mr. Bush's stabilization strategy — the so-called surge.

"Those B.C.T.'s are needed in Iraq sooner than the Army had planned to have them ready, and that increases the risk, of course," said one senior Army officer.

To meet the orders to deploy, and to reassure the troops and their families that every soldier landing in the desert will be certified ready for the mission, those brigades will focus on training relevant only to the counterinsurgency effort in Iraq, leaving for another day the full spectrum of training desired by the Army to have its units prepared for any emergency, a senior officer said.

"At the end of the day, strategy is the management of risk, whether personal or military strategy," said Jeffrey D. McCausland, a retired Army colonel now a senior fellow at the Carnegie Council in New York. "The question is, how much risk are we willing to live with? We are taking a significant amount of strategic risk today because, if you look at our ground forces, we have pulled almost everything out of the box already. So if a major problem arises somewhere else, what do we turn to?"

As a consequence, he said, the United States has lost much of its historic military flexibility. "We know that," he said. "So do our adversaries. To some degree, Iran and North Korea can play this round of poker more boldly."

American military planners are adapting to this new world of threat by deciding that its forces are fungible, and that the role traditionally assigned to the ground brigades designated for emergency deployment can be filled by other parts of the military. Aircraft and ships are the moving pieces to thrust and parry on the global chess board.

That, and billions in new spending. Money has been requested to increase the military by 92,000 people over the number in uniform on Sept. 11, 2001, with new money to recruit soldiers and entice experienced ones to stay longer. The 2007 budget has new allocations of $17.1 billion to reset Army equipment and $5.8 billion for Marine gear, with a separate fund of $13.9 billion in emergency spending power to replace or repair gear destroyed, damaged or worn in combat.

The debate over readiness and how to mitigate the current risk played out in secret this past week. Dated Feb. 20, a six-page document with red trim on the cover was quietly delivered to both houses of Congress, fulfilling a legal obligation for the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in odd-numbered years, to give his unvarnished assessment of the nature and magnitude of the current risks to carrying out the nation's military strategy. That is the report in which General Pace told Congress that the risk had increased to "significant," from "moderate" in the previous assessment.

The chairman's risk assessment is based on hard facts: numbers of troops deployed in combat zones, recruiting successes and shortfalls, armored vehicles to be replaced or repaired or drawn out of emergency depots to fulfill the Iraq mission, availability of transport planes, aerial refueling tankers, remotely piloted surveillance vehicles.

But there are important intangibles, mostly of perception. While General Pace's assessment is classified, he has said in public that potential adversaries like Iran or North Korea should not miscalculate because the United States retains the military capability to carry out any mission ordered by the president.

A range of officials who read the assessment noted with concern that it did not factor in the 20,000-plus troops ordered to Iraq in January.

While the armed forces labor to keep the lid on Iraq and Afghanistan (and there is clear if cautious optimism on the part of senior officers), there are plenty of other bad neighborhoods: the Straits of Hormuz, where Iran could try to shut off global oil supplies in retaliation for efforts to curtail its nuclear ambitions; the straits dividing China and what it views as a renegade Taiwan; the tense demilitarized zone between South Korea and a newly nuclear-capable North, which can strike Japan, one of America's most important allies, with missiles.

And here are some of the less-talked-about what-ifs that keep military planners awake at night: How does the American military respond if Fidel Castro dies and hundreds of thousands of Cubans set sail for the Gulf Coast of the United States? What if violent Islamic extremists seek to topple oil-rich American allies in the Persian Gulf, especially Saudi Arabia? What if the next assassination attempt on President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, whose country has the bomb, is successful?

In fact, the Pentagon detailed its efforts to mitigate the risks described by General Pace in a parallel document from Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that, by law, is required to accompany the chairman's assessment whenever the classified report judges that the risk to carrying out the mission has become "significant."

The document from Mr. Gates described the Pentagon's continuing efforts to increase the size of the military, replace lost or worn equipment, prepare the reserves for more efficient mobilization and modernize the force.

"There is no doubt that we can still conduct all of the missions assigned to us under the national military strategy," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman. He noted that when the active-duty military, the reserves and Pentagon civilians are tallied, the rolls top three million, and that is without any call to national mobilization.

Al Qaeda Resurgent (NYT)

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

Almost five and a half years ago, America — united by the shock of 9/11 — understood exactly what it needed to do. It had to find, thwart and take down the command structure of Al Qaeda, which was responsible for the deaths of 3,000 innocent people on American soil. Despite years of costly warfare in Afghanistan and Iraq, America today is not significantly closer to that essential goal.

At a crucial moment, the Bush administration diverted America's military strength, political attention and foreign aid dollars from a necessary, winnable war in Afghanistan to an unnecessary, and by now unwinnable, war in Iraq. Al Qaeda took full advantage of these blunders to survive and rebuild. Now it seems to be back in business.

DOJ_NMG_0136664

As our colleagues Mark Mazzetti and David Rohde reported last week, American intelligence and counterterrorism officials believe that Al Qaeda has rebuilt its notorious training camps, this time in Pakistan's loosely governed tribal regions near the Afghan border. Camp graduates are fighting in Afghanistan and Iraq — and may well be plotting new terrorist strikes in the West.

The same officials point to more frequent and more current videos as evidence that Al Qaeda's top leaders, Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri — once on the run for their lives and unable to maintain timely communications with their followers — now feel more secure. Al Qaeda is not as strong as it was when its Taliban allies ruled Afghanistan. But, the officials warn, it is getting there.

Al Qaeda's comeback didn't have to happen. And it must not be allowed to continue. The new Qaeda sanctuaries in Pakistan do not operate with the blessing of the Pakistani government. But Pakistan's military dictator, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has not tried very hard to drive them out. In recent months he has virtually conceded the tribal areas to local leaders sympathetic to Al Qaeda. President Bush needs to warn him that continued American backing depends on his doing more to rid his country of people being trained to kill Americans.

Washington also has to enlist more support on the Afghan side of the border. NATO allies need to drop restrictions that hobble their troops' ability to fight a resurgent Taliban. Afghan leaders need to wage a more aggressive campaign against corruption and drug trafficking. And Washington needs to pour significantly more money into rural development, to give Afghan farmers alternatives to drug cultivation. One reason General Musharraf has been hedging his bets with the Taliban and Al Qaeda is his growing doubt that Washington is determined to succeed in Afghanistan.

Having failed to finish off Al Qaeda in Afghanistan, Washington now finds itself fighting Qaeda-affiliated groups on multiple fronts, most recently in Somalia. Al Qaeda's comeback in Pakistan is a devastating indictment of Mr. Bush's grievously flawed strategies and misplaced Iraq obsession. Unless the president changes course, the dangers to America and its friends will continue to multiply.

Where Were You That Summer Of 2001? (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

"UNITED 93," Hollywood's highly praised but indifferently attended 9/11 docudrama, will be only a blip on tonight's Oscar telecast. The ratings rise of "24" has stalled as audiences defect from the downer of terrorists to the supernatural uplift of "Heroes." Cable surfers have tuned out Iraq for a war with laughs: the battle over Anna Nicole's decomposing corpse. Set this cultural backdrop against last week's terrifying but little-heeded front-page Times account of American "intelligence and counterterrorism officials" leaking urgent warnings about Al Qaeda's comeback, and ask yourself: Haven't we been here before?

If so, that would be the summer of 2001, when America pigged out on a 24/7 buffet of Gary Condit and shark attacks. The intelligence and counterterrorism officials back then were privately sounding urgent warnings like those in last week's Times, culminating in the President's Daily Brief titled "Bin Laden Determined to Strike in U.S." The system "was blinking red," as the C.I.A. chief George Tenet would later tell the 9/11 commission. But no one, from the White House on down, wanted to hear it.

The White House doesn't want to hear it now, either. That's why terrorism experts are trying to get its attention by going public, and not just through The Times. Michael Scheuer, the former head of the C.I.A. bin Laden unit, told MSNBC's Keith Olbermann last week that the Taliban and Al Qaeda, having regrouped in Afghanistan and Pakistan, "are going to detonate a nuclear device inside the United States" (the real United States, that is, not the fictional stand-in where this same scenario can be found on "24"). Al Qaeda is "on the march" rather than on the run, the Georgetown University and West Point terrorism expert Bruce Hoffman told Congress. Tony Blair is pulling troops out of Iraq not because Basra is calm enough to be entrusted to Iraqi forces — it's "not ready for transition," according to the Pentagon's last report — but to shift some British resources to the losing battle against the resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan.

This is why the entire debate about the Iraq "surge" is as much a sideshow as Britney's scalp. More troops in Baghdad are irrelevant to what's going down in Afghanistan and Pakistan. The surge supporters who accuse the Iraq war's critics of emboldening the enemy are trying to deflect attention from their own complicity in losing a bigger battle: the one against the enemy that actually did attack us on 9/11. Who lost Iraq? is but a distraction from the more damning question, Who is losing the war on terrorism?

The record so far suggests that this White House has done so twice. The first defeat, of course, began in early December 2001, when we lost Osama bin Laden in Tora Bora. The public would not learn about that failure until April 2002 (when it was uncovered by The Washington Post), but it's revealing that the administration started its bait-and-switch trick to relocate the enemy in Iraq just as bin Laden slipped away. It was on Dec. 9, 2001, that Dick Cheney first floated the idea on "Meet the Press" that Saddam had something to do with 9/11. It was "pretty well confirmed," he said (though it was not), that bin Laden's operative Mohamed Atta had met with an Iraqi intelligence officer in Prague months before Atta flew a hijacked plane into the World Trade Center.

In the Scooter Libby trial, Mr. Cheney's former communications aide, Catherine Martin, said that delivering a message on "Meet the Press" was "a tactic we often used." No kidding. That mention of the nonexistent Prague meeting was the first of five times that the vice president would imply an Iraq-Qaeda collaboration on that NBC show before the war began in March 2003. This bogus innuendo was an essential tool for selling the war precisely because we had lost bin Laden in Afghanistan. If we could fight Al Qaeda by going to war in Iraq instead, the administration could claim it didn't matter where bin Laden was. (Mr. Bush pointedly stopped mentioning him altogether in public.)

The president now says his government never hyped any 9/11-Iraq links. "Nobody has ever suggested that the attacks of September the 11th were ordered by Iraq," he said last August after finally conceding that Iraq had nothing to do with 9/11. In fact everyone in the administration insinuated it constantly, including him. Mr. Bush told of "high-level" Iraq-Qaeda contacts "that go back a decade" in the same notorious October 2002 speech that gave us Saddam's imminent mushroom clouds. So effective was this propaganda that by 2003 some 44 percent of Americans believed (incorrectly) that the 9/11 hijackers had been Iraqis; only 3 percent had seen an Iraq link right after 9/11.

Though the nonexistent connection was even more specious than the nonexistent nuclear W.M.D., Mr. Bush still leans on it today even while denying that he does so. He has to. His litanies that we are "on the offense" by pursuing the war in Iraq and "fighting terrorists over there, so that we don't have to fight them here" depend on the premise that we went into that country in the first place to vanquish Al Qaeda and that it is still the "central front" in the war on terror. In January's State of the Union address hawking the so-called surge, Mr. Bush did it again, warning that to leave Iraq "would be to ignore the lessons of September the 11th and invite tragedy."

But now more than ever, the opposite is true. It is precisely by pouring still more of our finite military and intelligence resources down the drain in Iraq that we are tragically ignoring the lessons of 9/11. Instead of showing resolve, as Mr. Bush supposes, his botch of the Iraq war has revealed American weakness. Our catastrophic occupation spawned terrorists in a country where they didn't used to be, and to pretend that Iraq is now their central front only adds to the disaster. As Mr. Scheuer, the former C.I.A. official, reiterated last week: "Al Qaeda is in Afghanistan and Pakistan. If you want to address the threat to America, that's where it is." It's typical of Mr. Bush's self-righteousness, however, that he would rather punt on that threat than own up to a mistake.

That mistake — dropping the ball on Al Qaeda — was compounded last fall when Mr. Bush committed his second major blunder in the war on terror. The occasion was the September revelation that our supposed ally, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, president of Pakistan, had negotiated a "truce" with the Taliban in North Waziristan, a tribal region in his country at the Afghanistan border. This truce was actually a retreat by Pakistan, which even released Qaeda prisoners in its custody. Yet the Bush White House denied any of this was happening. "This deal is not at all with the Taliban," the president said, claiming that "this is against the Taliban, actually." When Dana Priest and Ann Scott Tyson of The Washington Post reported that same month that the bin Laden trail was "stone cold" and had been since Mr. Bush diverted special operations troops from that hunt to Iraq in 2003, the White House branded the story flat wrong. "We're on the hunt," Mr. Bush said. "We'll get him."

Far from getting him or any of his top operatives dead or alive, the president has sat idly by, showering praise on General Musharraf while Taliban attacks from Pakistan into Afghanistan have increased threefold. As The Times reported last week, now both bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, are believed to be "steadily building an operations hub" in North Waziristan. We know that last year's London plot to bomb airliners, like the bus-and-subway bombings of 2005, was not just the work of home-grown jihadists in Britain, but also of Qaeda operatives. Some of the would-be bombers were trained in Qaeda's Pakistan camps much as their 9/11 predecessors had been trained in Afghanistan.

All of this was already going on when Mr. Bush said just before the election that "absolutely, we're winning" and that "Al Qaeda is on the run." What's changed in the few months since his lie is that even more American troops are tied down in Iraq, that even more lethal weapons are being used against them, that even more of the coalition of the unwilling are fleeing, and that even more Americans are tuning out both the administration and the war they voted down in November to savor a referendum that at least offers tangible results, "American Idol."

Yet Mr. Bush still denies reality. Ten days ago he told the American Enterprise Institute that "the Taliban have been driven from power" and proposed that America help stabilize the Pakistan border by setting up "Reconstruction Opportunity Zones" (remember that "Gulf Opportunity Zone" he promised after Katrina?) to "give residents the chance to export locally made products to the United States, duty-free." In other words, let's fight terrorism not by shifting America's focus from Iraq to the central front, but by shopping for Taliban souvenirs!

Five years after 9/11, the terrorists would seem to have us just where they want us — asleep — even as the system is blinking red once again.

No, He Wasn't A Good Manager (WP)

By Andrew Cockburn

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Defending Donald H. Rumsfeld in the face of a furious critique by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Vice President Cheney paid tribute last week to the former defense secretary's "superb job in managing the Pentagon under extraordinarily difficult circumstances."

Cheney's is not a unique view. Even many of Rumsfeld's detractors tend to assume that he was an effective manager, however disastrous his decisions on Iraq may have been. Throughout his Pentagon tenure, he carried the useful reputation, bolstered by his well-advertised spell as a college wrestler and his experience as a corporate CEO, of being a tough executive who brooked no nonsense from trembling subordinates to get the job done.

"Let them hate me so long as they fear me," boasted the emperor Caligula. Rumsfeld appeared to profit by the same leadership principle.

Anyone doubting this had only to listen to generals lamenting their master's disregard for professional military opinion, his rudeness and the terrible things that happened to anyone who stood in his way. But an examination of his record reveals that, in fact, Rumsfeld was a very poor manager. Despite his gruff theatrics, he shirked the task of leadership at the Defense Department, failing to restrain the services in their pursuit of parochial agendas. Though he spewed ideas and injunctions daily, he routinely neglected to follow them up. Pledged to the "transformation" of the cold war military establishment in 2001, he left it six years later almost entirely untransformed, save for the wreckage wrought by the Iraqi adventure. Even in concept, his program for "transformation" amounted to little more than notions articulated as bumper stickers, and poorly thought out ones at that.

Although he inherited dead wood in the senior ranks of the military, Rumsfeld dismissed not a single general, either for poor performance or for defying his edicts. No Iraq commander was summoned home as punishment for the unfolding disasters there.

Civilians were slightly more vulnerable. Army Secretary Thomas White was ultimately fired for his egregiously mutinous behavior over the cancellation of the Army's Crusader gun program.

The case of former Army chief of staff Eric K. Shinseki is instructive. It is widely believed that he sacrificed his career by speaking the truth in public about the inadequate number of troops being sent to invade and occupy Iraq. The true story gives little credit to Rumsfeld, but it also doesn't exactly accord with the legend.

Shinseki made his remarks about "several hundred thousand soldiers" being required to occupy postwar Iraq as an offhand response to a question at a Senate hearing in late February 2003, less than a month before the invasion. Eight months earlier, Rumsfeld and then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz had agreed to a suggestion by adviser Steve Herbits that they leak the name of the next Army chief of staff, though Shinseki still had more than a year to serve.

The two officials, irked by Shinseki's opposition to their plan to cut Army force sizes -- and, it seems, by his personality -- saw the leak as undercutting the Army chief's authority. They expected that he would resign promptly rather than submit to the humiliation of lame-duck status. But Shinseki failed to oblige. He stolidly served out his term although, apart from that moment in front of the Senate, he took no apparent advantage of his eminent official position to contest the ongoing invasion plan.

The notion that Rumsfeld at least exercised tight control of the sprawling Pentagon bureaucracy is encapsulated in his well-known use of "snowflakes," short memos of injunction, query or complaint that he dictated and distributed in manic quantities. True, junior officials may have quaked at the sight of a Rumsfeld emissary approaching with the dreaded missive in hand. As often as not the note reflected some querulous Rumsfeld whim, such as the July 2001 complaint, notorious among his personal staff, regarding the width of the lemon slices served with the secretary's iced tea. Over time, subordinates came to realize that their fearsome chief seldom followed up on these memos. Once written (and there were often more than 100 a day) they were often forgotten.

The missives usually set a date, sometimes within a day, for confirmation that the assigned task had been completed. "In the beginning," said one formerly high-ranking individual who routinely received scores of snowflakes, "I'd work late to get the job done and respond by the set time. Then I started letting it slide for a week, and no one seemed to notice." Eventually he stopped responding altogether, and still heard nothing.

This striking contrast between the superficial aspects of Rumsfeld's management style, all sound and fury, and the lack of follow-through to ensure constructive results, was summed up for me by another veteran of the secretary's management team: " 'Stir the pot,' Don would tell us, 'Stir the pot.' But no one was making soup."

Why did the senior military apparently quiver in their boots in fear of Rumsfeld's wrath for so long? When Rumsfeld derided as "absurd" the military's initial recommendations on troop levels for Iraq in November 2001, Gen. Richard B. Myers, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Marine Gen. Peter Pace, then vice chairman; and Marine Lt. Gen. Gregory Newbold, then of the Pentagon's Joint Staff, made no effort to rebut his assertions, though they were all aghast at Rumsfeld's pronouncement. "Shame on us," Newbold commented to me ruefully in describing the session. (In November 2002, unable to stomach the misguided rush to war in Iraq, Newbold quietly resigned, the sole senior officer to do so on principle.) This sort of behavior may well emanate from a careerist culture increasingly discernable in the officer corps, in which the gratification of superiors is the surest path to promotion, while obdurate adherence to principle can end chances of higher rank.

Rumsfeld was crafty enough to advertise his close supervision of the promotions process, interviewing all candidates for three- and four-star rank. That, combined with an aggressive personal manner, may have been enough to earn him the appearance of dominance. Every bully needs quiescent victims, and Rumsfeld found plenty at the Pentagon.

Andrew Cockburn is a Washington journalist. His book, "Rumsfeld: His Rise, Fall and Catastrophic Legacy," will be published this week by Scribner.

DOJ:

Dismissed U.S. Attorneys Praised In Evaluations (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24 — Internal Justice Department performance reports for six of the eight United States attorneys who have been dismissed in recent months rated them “well regarded,” “capable” or “very competent,” a review of the evaluations shows.

The performance reviews, known as Evaluations and Review Staff Reports, show that the ousted prosecutors were routinely praised for playing a leadership role with other law enforcement agencies in their jurisdictions.

The reviews, each of them 6 to 12 pages long, were carried out by Justice Department officials from 2003 to 2006. Each report was based on extensive interviews, conducted over several days with judges, other federal law enforcement agencies and staff members in each office.

It had been known that the reports were mostly favorable, but the reports themselves had not been made public.

Over all, the evaluations, which were obtained from officials authorized to have them, appear to raise new questions about the rationale for the dismissals provided by senior Justice Department officials. The officials have repeatedly cited poor job performance to explain their decisions to oust the eight prosecutors, all of them Republicans appointed by President Bush in his first term.

On Saturday, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who has led a Congressional investigation into the dismissals and has been briefed on the evaluations, said the reports showed that new legislation was needed to keep the Justice Department from politically motivated firings.

“As we feared, the comprehensive evaluations show these U.S. attorneys did not deserve to be fired,” Mr. Schumer said. “To the contrary, they reveal they were effective, respected and set appropriate priorities.”

In response, a senior Justice Department official said the reviews, which focused on management practices within each United States attorney’s office, did not provide a broad or complete picture of the prosecutors’ performance.

The official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the confidential nature of personnel information, said, “The reviews don’t take into account whether the U.S. attorneys carried out departmental priorities.”

Referring to the 94 United States attorney’s districts, the official said, “You can’t have 94 different sets of priorities,” suggesting that the dismissed prosecutors had failed to follow priorities set by the Justice Department in Washington.

However, each case report included a statement that each of the ousted prosecutors had established strategic goals set by the Justice Department in high priority areas like counterterrorism, narcotics and gun violence.

Of the dismissed prosecutors who have spoken publicly, all have said they were given no reason for their dismissal. At first, most appeared willing to leave quietly with the understanding that they were presidential appointees who could be replaced at any time.

But their willingness to step down without complaint changed abruptly when Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said at a Senate hearing earlier this month that most of the dismissals were carried out to correct performance problems, according to associates of several prosecutors.

In recent days, several of the prosecutors have described conflicts with the Justice Department over death penalty cases and pending political corruption investigations as a possible factor in their firings. Justice Department officials have denied such issues were a factor.

DOJ_NMG_0136668

One of the most glowing evaluations was given to H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas, who was asked to leave last summer. Mr. Cummins was replaced temporarily by J. Timothy Griffin, a military and civilian prosecutor who also had close ties to Karl Rove, the senior White House political adviser. Mr. Griffin has since withdrawn his name from consideration as Mr. Cummins's permanent successor.

A report dated Jan. 23-27, 2006, said, "United States Attorney Cummins was very competent and highly regarded by the federal, judiciary, law enforcement and civil client agencies." It said Mr. Cummins's office had a "well-managed" antiterrorism program and "very successful" counternarcotics efforts.

Another report, dated Feb. 7-11, 2005 evaluating the performance of Carol C. Lam, who was dismissed as the United States attorney in San Diego, concluded that she was "an effective manager and respected leader in the district."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Options Scandal Ensnaring HR Executives (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Associated Press

AP, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As lawsuits and federal prosecutions mount over suspect timing of stock option awards at American public companies, corporate human resources executives are increasingly being caught in the gears of cases.

With stock options widely used as perks to attract talent, personnel staff regularly were brought into executives' machinations on options awards - often signing the relevant paperwork, such as memos to employees or letters making job offers. That means their fingerprints are on documents that can enter into the paper trails that prosecutors are using to build options-dating cases.

"HR people have to be careful," said John Gamble, a lawyer at Fisher & Phillips, an Atlanta firm specializing in labor and employment law. "Sometimes they get assignments that they need to think twice about."

Among the handful of executives who have been charged with fraud by federal prosecutors in the wave of options investigations is Stephanie Jensen, the former vice president for human resources at Brocade Communications Systems Inc. Jensen and Gregory L. Reyes, who was Brocade's chief executive, pleaded not guilty in August.

The Justice Department prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission allege that Reyes and Jensen regularly backdated minutes of board of directors' meetings so it appeared that the stock-options committee granted options on dates when Brocade's share price was relatively low. The two executives also are accused of having letters of job offers backdated so employees would receive options that were dated at low points in the company's share price that predated their first day of work.

Stock options allow the recipients to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price - and pocket the difference.

Options can be made more lucrative by backdating their exercise price to a historically low point in the stock's value.

Backdating options can be legal if disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board or shareholders. But unauthorized compensation from options is deemed illegal and can bring fraud charges if documents are falsified in a backdating scheme or information is concealed from the board. If companies backdate options without properly accounting for the move, it can cause profits to be overstated and taxes to be underpaid.

E-mails uncovered in court records in the case of Mercury Interactive Corp., one of the first Silicon Valley companies to acknowledge stock options manipulation, show exchanges between a payroll manager named Susie Fregoso and company executives concerning dating of options. At one point in August 2000, according to an account of the e-mails in Tuesday's Wall Street Journal, Mercury's assistant controller told Fregoso the company will use the "magic backdating ink" of Sharlene Abrams, a former chief financial officer.

A telephone message left for a Susie Fregoso in California by The Associated Press was not returned. An attorney representing Abrams has declined to comment, citing a confidentiality order the judge issued in the California court case.

About 130 public companies are under investigation by the Justice Department and the SEC in the affair, which has been roiling corporate America. More than $5 billion in company earnings has been erased by restatements necessitated by options-dating problems, and more than 60 senior officers and directors - including 18 chief executives - have lost their jobs.

In other situations touching on human resources executives:

Stephen Landry, who was the human resources director at Sycamore Networks Inc., alleges in a lawsuit that he was forced out of his job in 2000 because he complained about the company's options award practices to superiors. An internal company memo filed in his lawsuit showed employees discussing manipulating option grant dates to enrich themselves and ranking individuals' chances of being caught by auditors.

An internal audit at Broadcom Corp. found that executives bearing substantial responsibility for improper options-granting practices included Nancy M. Tullos, a former vice president of human resources. Tullos' attorney has said his client relied on others at the company for guidance and did not select any of the favorable grant dates.

BEA Systems Inc. announced earlier this month that after a review of its options practices, it will record a charge against earnings of $340 million to $390 million, restructure its general counsel office and human resources department, and find a new senior vice president of human resources.

Eight Volumes Speak Strategy (DENP)

By Andy Vuong And Greg Griffin

Denver Post, February 25, 2007

Herbert Stern, author and lead attorney for the ex-Qwest CEO, will stress key points and try to get jurors to argue his case too.

Herbert Stern, Joe Nacchio's lead attorney, will come out firing in the criminal insider-trading trial of the former Qwest chief executive.

Stern will lay out his case early in his opening statement. He will move through his points quickly but will make sure the jury hears his most important material more than once. He'll "hitchhike" - or extract helpful information from the prosecution's witnesses during cross-examination.

And during closing arguments, he'll try to teach his "friends" - jurors who believe Nacchio is not guilty - how to argue against others in the jury room.

Stern offers those tips, and many others, in an eight-volume set of books titled "Trying Cases to Win." The first was published in 1991, the last in 2004.

Stephen A. Saltzburg, co-author of three of the books, said Stern will follow the framework outlined in his books.

"He's going to do exactly what he writes that you should do," said Saltzburg, a professor at George Washington University School of Law in Washington, D.C., who has known Stern for more than 25 years.

Stern declined to comment.

Nacchio's trial is set to begin March 19 in U.S. District Court in Denver. If convicted, he faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine on each of the 42 counts of illegal insider trading.

Saltzburg said prosecutors would gain an advantage by reading Stern's books before the trial.

"It's always a good idea to read what your adversary has written," he said. "It's kind of like having tried a case against somebody who you've known before. You have an idea how they approach litigation."

Department of Justice spokesman Jeff Dorschner declined comment when asked whether any of the attorneys on the Nacchio case has read Stern's books.

Ten- and four-hour-long videotaped lectures covering key points in Stern's books are available at the Justice Department's education facility in Columbia, S.C., which trains federal, state and local prosecutors.

Stern served as a federal prosecutor and judge in New Jersey for many years before going into private practice.

Attorneys who have read Stern's books give them high praise.

"The author's comments on direct and cross-examination are cogent, well-organized and practical," University of Florida law professor and former attorney Bob Dekle writes in a review on Amazon.com. "The rookie advocate would do well to heed his teachings, and the old warhorse could also pick up a thing or two to help hone his techniques."

"It's obvious he knew what he was talking about," Dekle added in an interview.

San Francisco attorney Robert Spanner said the books were helpful to him but are "not wildly popular."

"I don't think I recall a single person who has referred to those books in any context," said Spanner, who has practiced law for 30 years.

Swaths of testimony

Many of the books feature large swaths of testimony from old cases.

Stern begins one of the volumes with a 12-page prologue examining the 1820 adultery trial of Queen Caroline of England. The point? Lawyers should be careful about what they say in court. A verbal misstep by one of her lawyers nearly cost her the crown.

Many of the other trials Stern quotes at length were his own during his time as a federal prosecutor in New Jersey, where he put away corrupt politicians and mobsters.

In the fifth volume, the entire transcript of a case is printed and dissected.

Spanner said the most important tip he got from reading the books is to not "make your case a response to the other side's case because that puts you on the defensive."

Among other points, Stern writes that the opening argument is more important than the closing.

"If you have a defense, open on it," he writes. "Open on it fully, powerfully, proclaiming it as the truth."

Thus, Stern's opening argument in the Nacchio trial may serve as a billboard for the rest of his defense, Dekle suggests. "Listen to the first paragraph or two of his opening statement and you can probably glean his case theory from that," he said.

If he follows his own advice, Stern won't call any of the prosecution's witnesses liars during the opening argument because he fears he won't be considered a gentleman if he does so. He'll save that for the end of the trial.

"Most of us grow up in court with the advice to never call anyone a liar during your opening because you will not be considered a lady or a gentleman; wait until summation," Stern writes.

Stress key evidence

When dealing with jurors, Stern writes that attorneys should often repeat the significance of key evidence.

"It is essential that your jury, or for that matter your judge, hear your important material more than once," he writes. "Every seasoned trial lawyer knows not only that once is not enough but that even twice may be insufficient."

He stresses the importance of moving quickly and not calling a case complicated.

"Legend has it there are two kinds of trial lawyers: the quick and the dead," he writes.
